We do not conceive it to be necessary, in our view of the main question submitted for decision, to pass upon the proposition whether the effect of the court's order permitting the board of directors to levy an assessment upon the stock was to modify the injunction referred to, or whether the action of the court thus complained of merely involved an act, consistent with the injunction, designed to facilitate the liquidation or the winding up of the affairs of the corporation to the best interests of the depositors, creditors, shareholders, etc. It may be suggested, however, that an injunction in such case is, as a rule, merely an ancillary or incidental remedy in aid of the purposes of liquidation and is usually directed solely against the misuse or misappropriation of the property and assets of the corporation and to prevent the doing of any new business by the directors or officers with the public for the corporation. But, however that may be, we do not, as stated, intend to decide that question here, because we do not think it necessary to a decision in this case to do so.

We have been aided very little by counsel in reaching a conclusion in this case. While counsel for the appellant has cited a long list of cases which he insists sustain his position that it was the duty of the court to compel the receiver to register his name in the stock book as a stockholder of the corporation, counsel for the respondent have contented themselves with the treatment of their positions on the several questions presented here as obviously sound, and have distinguished the cases cited by appellant from the case at bar by the declaration in effect that they obviously apply to "going corporations" only, or corporations not in course of liquidation and not, therefore, to insolvent corporations in custodia legis. In short, counsel for respondent have neither cited authorities, if any on the points involved are available, nor advanced any argument in support of their bald statement that their contentions are right and that the cases referred to by appellant have no application to the facts of this case.

We have very often found it to be true—at least it has been so found by the writer—that among the most troublesome tasks imposed upon reviewing tribunals are those involved in those cases in which the attorneys concerned conceive the propositions contended for by them to be so obvious as to require neither the citation of authorities, if any are to be had, nor the presentation of argument to support them. There may be sound legal reasons why the court below, under the circumstances which are disclosed by the petition, should not allow the name of the petitioner to be registered in the corporation books as a stockholder; but, if so, those reasons have not been presented in the briefs and argument here.

It may be conceded, for the purposes of this case, that, under the order of the court permitting the assessment of the stock of the corporation, the sale of said stock for the purpose of enforcing payment of the assessment so levied was void, and that the petitioner therefore did not acquire a legal or any title to said stock by reason of such sale. But the petitioner does not rely alone upon the title, if any, thus acquired to the stock referred to in his petition. He alleges that, in addition to buying said stock at said assessment sale, he acquired title thereto by the assignment thereof to him by the owners of said stock.

We have been shown neither any rule of law nor any reason which precludes an owner of stock in an insolvent corporation in process of liquidation from transferring the same to whomsoever he pleases. The law provides that shares of stock in a corporation, to evidence which certificates are issued, constitute personal property and may be transferred. Section 324, Civ. Code. Stock in such corporation may possess little, if any, intrinsic value; but it is, nevertheless, property, and its transfer carries with it whatever rights that would accrue to the original owner thereof. Having purchased the stock of the owners thereof in the corporation involved here and thereby become entitled to whatever rights accompanied such ownership, we can at the present time conceive of no reason why the petitioner should not be registered in the stock book of the corporation as the owner of the stock so transferred to him, and therefore as a stockholder in the concern.

There is nothing in the averments of the petition indicating that the stockholders were placed under the ban of the injunction referred to in said petition. The stockholders cannot be held to have become any less the owners of their stock or any less stockholders in the corporation simply because of the proceedings in liquidation, nor is their power or right to dispose of it, if they choose to do so, destroyed or impaired or curtailed in the slightest measure for that reason. Of course, the sale of stock by a stockholder would under no circumstances release his personal or individual liability for his proper proportion of all its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred during the time he was a stockholder (section 3, art. 12, Const.; section 322, Civ. Code); but, as stated, his stock is property which he may sell or transfer at any time or under any circumstances, so long as he is not prevented from doing so by some legal process or proceeding, involving either his rights as to such stock or the rights generally of the corporation.

[3] But respondent contends that this proceeding should have been brought against the directors of the corporation and not against the receiver, for the reason, as before stated, that it is not within the duties or powers of the last-named officer to register transfers of stock in the books of the corporation. The proceeding is directed against both the receiver and the corporation, and it is alleged that the receiver has in his possession all the books, papers, etc., of the corporation, and that he has refused "and still refuses to allow said petitioner, or the defendant corporation, to enter petitioner's name as a stockholder in the said books," etc. This allegation necessarily implies that the corporation is willing and ready to enter the name of the petitioner in the stock book as a stockholder if permitted to do so by the receiver who has sole possession of said book and all books of the corporation, and the relief asked is merely that an order be made allowing petitioner's name to be properly so registered in the proper book. The proceeding against the corporation is sufficient without making the directors parties thereto. The latter are mere agents of the corporation, and their acts as such are always those of the corporation. And, obviously, the latter can act only through its agents, and, where a corporation is compelled to do some act which it is its legal duty to perform, it can perform that act only through its duly authorized agent or agents. Therefore, if the receiver is required by the order of the court to allow the corporation to enter the name of the petitioner in the stock book as a stockholder, it will follow that that act will be performed by those of its officers or any officer upon whom, under the circumstances, that duty must necessarily rest.

[4] If it be true, as the petition alleges, that there are now no directors or officers of the corporation, then we can perceive no valid reason why the court should not require its receiver to perform the physical act of registering the name of the petitioner in the stock book as a stockholder by reason of his ownership of the stock mentioned in the petition. The corporation and its property and books are in the possession and control of the receiver for the court, and the receiver may, among other things, do and perform any acts respecting the property of the corporation that the court may authorize. Section 568, Code Civ. Proc. At any rate, as we have declared, we are satisfied that the petitioner is entitled to have the evidence of his ownership of the stock described in the petition and of his corresponding rights as a stockholder of the corporation, whatever such rights may amount to, duly and properly preserved in the book of the corporation maintained for such purpose.

The order is reversed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

PIERCY v. PIERCY. (Civ. 923.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 25, 1912. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court June 24, 1912.)

1. DEEDS (§ 211*)—GRANTOR'S MENTAL CAPACITY—EVIDENCE.

In an action to set aside a deed to the grantor's son, evidence held to warrant a finding of mental incapacity of grantor.

2. DEEDS (§ 211*)—EXECUTION—UNDUE INFLUENCE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action to set aside a deed to the grantor's son, evidence held to warrant a finding that he exercised undue influence over her.

3. DEEDS (§ 196*)—EXECUTION—UNDUE INFLUENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action to set aside a gift of land to grantor's son on the ground of undue influence, the burden was on him to show that the gift was made freely and voluntarily and with full knowledge of the effect of the transfer.

4. DEEDS (§ 208*)—DELIVERY—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action to set aside a deed, evidence held to warrant a finding of nondelivery.

5. DEEDS (§ 208*)—DELIVERY—QUESTION OF FACT.

An issue whether a deed was delivered presents a question of fact to be determined by the circumstances surrounding the particular transaction.

6. DEEDS (§ 56*)—DELIVERY—ESSENTIAL ELEMENTS—INTENT.

Intention of the grantor to pass title is essential to a valid delivery of a deed.

7. DEEDS (§ 59*)—DELIVERY—SUFFICIENCY.

The recording of a deed is not a delivery by the grantor, unless the deed comes from his hand or some one claiming under him.

8. WITNESSES (§ 206*)—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS—ATTORNEY AND CLIENT.

In an action to set aside a deed on the ground of undue influence over deceased grantor, testimony of an attorney as to a conversation participated in by decedent, defendant, and himself was not incompetent as involving a privileged communication, whether the attorney acted for decedent alone or for both decedent and defendant.

9. DEEDS (§ 203*)—EXECUTION—UNDUE INFLUENCE—EVIDENCE.

In an action to set aside a deed to the grantor's son on the ground of undue influence, evidence of his conduct in attempting to keep secret the recording of the deed was properly admitted.

10. EVIDENCE (§ 268*)—MENTAL CONDITION—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Where a person's mental condition at a particular time is in issue, a showing may be made of his condition both before and after as indicative of his probable condition at the particular date, and hence, in an action to set aside a deed to the grantor's son on the ground of undue influence, declarations made by the deceased grantor after the date of the deed were admissible to show the relation of the parties, especially where defendant offered proof tending to show that decedent was unwilling to prosecute the suit.

11. EVIDENCE (§ 268*)—EXECUTION—GRANTOR'S MENTAL CONDITION.

To be admissible to show the state of a grantor's mind when he executed a deed, declarations made by him need not be part of the res gestæ.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by Andrew J. Piercy, as Mary J. Piercy's administrator, against Edward M. Piercy. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Williamson, for appellant. J. E. Alexander, W. W. Burnett, and Beasley & Fry, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. By a verified complaint this action was begun by Mary J. Piercy to set aside a deed in which she was the grantor and her son, Edward M. Piercy, the grantee, and after her death, the administrator, another son, was substituted as the party plaintiff. The consideration for the deed was "love and affection."

[1] The trial court found in favor of plaintiff, adjudging the deed void on the ground that it was obtained by undue influence. There was also a finding that the deed was not delivered. Both theories were adequately presented in the complaint, and it is manifest that the finding as to each is sufficient to uphold the judgment. From an examination of the record we are satisfied also that it must be held that the material findings of the court are amply supported by the evidence.

The following facts, fairly deducible from the testimony, favorable to respondent—some of which are indeed not disputed—are sufficient to reveal the character of the controversy: On March 30, 1901, the date on which the deed was signed by Mary Piercy, she was 85 years old or over. For 10 or 12 years prior thereto she could not walk without assistance, could not dress herself, and she was most of the time in bed. She was not able to attend to her household duties. If she walked from one room to another, she would be exhausted, and she was not able to get about without having some one with her. She was afflicted with a kidney or bladder disease that was the occasion of constant trouble and annoyance. At the time of the transaction in reference to the deed she was bedfast and was so weak that she had to be helped to sit up in bed to sign the instrument. As to her bodily condition, looking through the testimony of her children, we behold an old lady, enfeebled by years and disease and trouble, needing constant assistance, unable to supply her own wants, and entirely dependent upon the care of others. The court therefore properly found that, on the 30th day of March, 1901, she was and "for a long time prior thereto had been feeble in body and physically weak."

On said date she was subject to peculiar lapses of memory. In February preceding, at the funeral of her son David, she talked in a loud, childish way, showing no appreciation of the occasion. She was forgetful and "all at sea" about property affairs during the early part of 1901. Her mind was very changeable. She would be "of one mind one day and of an entirely different mind the next day." She would order things and forget immediately whether she had paid for them. She could not remember things that happened two or three days before. If she was sick with a bilious spell, she would think some one was poisoning her. A few days before the deed was signed, an attorney, Mr. Rhodes, accompanied by a notary, went to her room with the deed to obtain her signature and acknowledgment. The attorney said to her: "We have come out to—he (referring to the notary) has come out with me to take your acknowledgment to the deed from yourself to Ed." She replied: "What deed? I do not know what you are talking about. I do not want to make any such deed as this now." Mr. Rhodes then said: "This is the deed that you and Ed and I have been talking about here, and that you are to make to him conveying to him the land that came to you from the estate of your deceased son, David J. Piercy." And she replied: "Why, I do not propose to make any such deed. I do not want to do it. I am not going to do it. Why should I do it? I do not understand this. I won't do it." Other circumstances appear, but the foregoing are sufficient to justify the finding of the court that by reason of her old age and mental weakness she was incapable of transacting or understanding business transactions "in a thoroughly intelligent manner and was particularly incapable of properly understanding the nature, effects, and consequences of any act regarding the transfer of real property without independent advice and careful explanation thereof."

[2] As already seen, Edward M. Piercy was the son of Mary J. Piercy. Moreover, they lived in the house together. He hired her servants, and for a long time he had been the manager of her property and for years her agent, holding her general power of attorney. The confidential relation, therefore, so conspicuous in legal literature, existed between them in its most exacting form. The foregoing facts would warrant the inference of undue influence, and they constitute sufficient support for the judgment of the lower court. The burdens and obligations imposed by the "confidential relation" and the significance of the elements of want of consideration and of physical and mental weakness in cases like this are fully considered and the authorities reviewed in the decision of this court in Nobles v. Hutton, 7 Cal. App. 21, 93 Pac. 292. Therein it is declared that: "It is a well-settled rule of equity jurisprudence that all gifts, contracts, or benefits, from a principal to one occupying a fiduciary or confidential relation to him are constructively fraudulent and void." And furthermore that: "Persons standing in a confidential relation toward others cannot entitle themselves to hold benefits which those others may have conferred upon them, unless they can show to the satisfaction of the court that the person by whom the benefits have been conferred had independent advice in conferring them, and the advice should be given in private by some one of her own selection, and when the grantor is not surrounded with dominating influences favoring the transfer." See, also, Payne v. Payne, 12 Cal. App. 251, 107 Pac. 148; Moore v. Moore, 56 Cal. 89; Ross v. Conway, 92 Cal. 635, 28 Pac. 785; Allore v. Jewell, 94 U. S. 506, 24 L. Ed. 260.

[3] But granting that, in the absence of independent advice, under the other conditions mentioned such conveyance might be upheld, it will not and cannot be disputed that the burden is cast upon the donee to show to the entire satisfaction of the court that the gift was made freely and voluntarily with full knowledge of the facts and with entire understanding of the effect of the transfer, and, in the absence of such clear and convincing proof, the conveyance is presumed to have been obtained by undue influence and to be void.

As we view the case, it is impossible to hold that the lower court should have been convinced, or that it should have determined, that said presumption was overcome and the asserted conveyance should be held valid. Indeed, aside from the weight to be attributed to the foregoing considerations, we find in the record evidence of other circumstances affording additional support for the judgment of the lower court. Among these is the important fact, embodied in the findings, that "neither at the time of nor prior to the date of signing said deed did the said Mary Piercy have any legal or other advice except from persons acting for and in the interest of said Edward M. Piercy in reference to the said transaction or with reference to the nature, effects, and consequences to herself of her said act and deed." A distinguished lawyer, who had been for many years a friend of Mary J. Piercy, and in whom, no doubt, she had confidence, visited her and advised the execution of the deed; but the court was justified in concluding that the adviser was employed by appellant and was zealous to promote the cause of his client. The circumstance of said friendship and confidence would, of course, naturally and properly excite in the mind of the trial judge a greater distrust of the occurrence. Other facts are detailed by witnesses which strengthen the inference that appellant exercised a dominating influence over the mind of his mother and that he took advantage of the situation for his personal aggrandizement. As illustrative of these, we refer to the following incidents: At times he refused to allow the friends and neighbors to visit her. Both before and after the signing of the deed he prevented her relatives from seeing her on different occasions. In this connection the wife of plaintiff testified that, shortly before the deed transaction, she visited Mary J. Piercy, and appellant ordered her not to come there any more and not to hire any more help, as he intended to take care of that himself, and that his manner was rough and brutal, and that he subsequently ordered her out as before, saying: "You get out. Either go the back or front of the house, but you get away from here." That he intimidated his mother into signing papers, one incident being given by the last-mentioned witness, as follows: "Ed Piercy came into the room where his mother was and said to her, 'Here, come sign this paper.' She said, 'What for?' He says, 'Never mind, sign it, I tell you,' and she seemed to object again, and he demanded her again to sign it, and she did sign it. His manner was rough and cross, and she seemed to fear him." Miss Annie Higgins also testified that: "Ed Piercy was very rough spoken towards his mother. She would be frightened and would not say a word, and she would do just what he told her to do." On one occasion she was taking milk to Mrs. Piercy, and Edward Piercy said to her, "I don't want you coming over here any more." She said, "All right, why?" and he answered: "Never mind, I tell you not to come over here any more." Furthermore: "Mary Piercy spoke to Ed Piercy in my presence regarding the locking up of the gate or fence. She asked him what he did that for, and he said: 'That is my business.'" The witness testified also that she was present at different times when E. M. Piercy presented papers for his mother to sign. "He said: 'I need some money, Mother; sign this paper.' So she signed it for him. I saw him bring in papers two or three times. He would not read the papers nor explain them to his mother. He was very rough spoken and coarse. He used vulgar language toward his mother, and she would be frightened, and she would do anything he would tell her to do."

Again appellant did not record the deed for over six months after it was signed, and then he attempted to conceal the recordation from the newspapers. When Mrs. Piercy, however, learned that it was recorded, she employed an attorney, J. C. Black, to bring this action. Mr. Black testified that, after bringing the action, he received a message from Mrs. Piercy's house, and when he went there he found her in bed, and "Ed Piercy came out of the adjoining room and handed his mother a folded paper in my presence and demanded that she give it to me, and she asked Ed what it was. 'No matter,' he says, 'hand it to Mr. Black,' and his manner was decidedly excited and angry and threatening. The paper was a demand that I dismiss the suit that had been commenced against Ed Piercy." Thereafter the deposition of Mrs. Piercy was taken. Respondent says, "It is the most remarkable deposition ever submitted to a court." Our information is manifestly too limited to verify this, but the appearance of the document is certainly peculiar and calculated to excite a degree of suspicion as to its integrity. The unusual feature about it is that there are so many interlineations that contradict the original transcription. Of this, two examples will suffice. She was asked this question: "Then it is alleged here in the complaint filed by Mr. Black that on the 30th day of March last you made a deed of your interest as heir of David J. Piercy to the property; I want you to tell why you made that deed, if you made it, did you make it?" The answer as transcribed was: "I don't remember any deed making it." When corrected, this was stricken out, and the word "Yes" substituted. Again she was asked: "Well, then, I understand you to say you don't know whether or not the deed conveyed to Eddie the property that he conveyed to you?" The answer as taken down was: "No, I don't know nothing about it. I know whether or not—I don't know what you are—the meaning of what you are driving at." As corrected, the answer is "Yes." It appears also that she several times appealed to her son Edward for answers to the questions, and it is quite manifest that she was not free from the dominating influence of his stronger personality. After securing the discharge of Mr. Black, appellant procured friends of his own to represent his mother in the litigation, and the cause was tried with a result favorable to defendant. Hon. A. L. Rhodes, the trial judge, however, granted a motion for a new trial upon the ground of "irregularity in the proceedings of the defendant by which the plaintiff was prevented from having a fair trial of the action." The "irregularity" was shown by an affidavit of R. M. F. Soto to the effect that "through the wrongful procurement of defendant the action was, so far as the plaintiff's side thereof was concerned, practically tried as a mere formal matter, without any full and complete presentation of her case, and with the understanding on the part of those representing her at the trial, both that the transaction between the parties was entirely regular and valid, and that the real object of the trial was to dispose of any question as to the validity of the deed and confirm the title of defendant to the land described therein; such representatives being without knowledge as to material evidence which could have been produced in support of the cause of action stated in the complaint." Piercy v. Piercy, 149 Cal. 165, 76 Pac. 508. The cumulative effect of the foregoing circumstances upon the mind of the trial judge in the determination of the question of undue influence can be easily appreciated.

[4-6] The finding as to nondelivery, we think, can be said also to have substantial support. The question whether the deed was delivered is a question of fact and must be determined by the circumstances surrounding each particular transaction. Ken-niff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 40, 73 Pac. 803; Moore v. Trott (Sup.) 122 Pac. 462. The actual fact to be ascertained is the intention of the grantor as to passing title. Brown v. Westerfield, 47 Neb. 399, 66 N. W. 439, 53 Am. St. Rep. 532; Huse v. Den, 85 Cal. 399, 24 Pac. 790, 20 Am. St. Rep. 232.

[7] The recording of a deed is not a delivery by the grantor to the grantee unless the deed comes from the hand of the grantor or some one claiming through or under him. Barr v. Schroeder, 32 Cal. 609. "A delivery may be effected by a grantor doing something and saying nothing, or doing nothing and saying something, or by both doing and saying something." Flint v. Phipps, 16 Or. 437, 19 Pac. 543. The court below might rationally conclude that the grantor neither did nor said anything to indicate an intention to deliver the deed or to pass the title, and that by reason of her weakened physical and mental condition she had no definite purpose in relation to the matter. That she did not actively and consciously participate in the transfer is not an unreasonable inference from the testimony of Mr. Rhodes, who said that he presented the deed to her and she signed it; that "the deed was not read to her, but its contents were explained. She was helped to sit up in bed because of her physically weak condition. After Mrs. Piercy had signed the deed, the notary took the car from her house, went down to his office, put his acknowledgment and seal on the deed, and I took it to my office. While it was being signed, of course, it was in Mrs. Piercy's hands. After it was signed, it went into the notary's hands, and from the notary's hands it went into my hands, and from my hands it went to Ed Piercy. During all the time it was at the Piercy house I saw it. Mrs. Piercy said nothing about the deed at the time she affixed her signature. She said nothing to me or Mr. Brundage or any other person after she had signed the deed. At the time of and after signing the deed Mrs. Piercy did not say anything to me or in my presence concerning the delivery of the deed." After a considerable period of time, appellant asked Mr. Rhodes for the deed, and it was given to him. From this testimony it is not unreasonable to conclude that in the transaction Mrs. Piercy was a mere passive instrument acting rather as an automaton manipulated by the agency of others than a willing and conscious actor in the formal transfer with a clear understanding and purpose that the title to the property should be vested in the grantee. As to the rulings upon the admissibility of evidence, we may say we find no prejudicial error committed by the court during the progress of the trial.

[8] Objection was made to the testimony of Mr. Rhodes as to a conversation participated in by him, Mrs. Piercy, and appellant, on the ground that it was a privileged communication by reason of his relation as attorney for Mrs. Piercy. There is a controversy as to whether said testimony was not stricken out; but, at any rate, we cannot say that the ruling was erroneous, if for no other reason, because it does not appear that he was her attorney. It is not made clear for whom he was acting. Of course, if he was the attorney for neither party, the communication was not privileged. But, assuming that he was the attorney of Mrs. Piercy, the conversation was not privileged because Edward M. Piercy was present and heard what was said. If he was the attorney for both parties, in any controversy between them the same condition would prevail. "When two parties address a lawyer as their common agent, their communication to the lawyer as far as concerns strangers will be privileged. But as to themselves, they stand on the same footing as to the lawyer, and either can compel him to testify against the other as to their negotiations. 1 Wharton on Evidence, § 587; Hanlon v. Doherty, 109 Ind. 37 [9 N. E. 782]; Greenleaf on Evidence, § 244; Michael v. Foil, 100 N. C. 178 [6 S. E. 264, 6 Am. St. Rep. 577]. In the latter case it was held that an attorney who wrote a deed could be examined as to what was said by the parties at the time relative to the transaction, whether he was acting as attorney for the one who called him or for both." In re Bauer, 79 Cal. 312, 21 Pac. 762. See, also, Murphy v. Waterhouse, 113 Cal. 467, 45 Pac. 866, 54 Am. St.

Rep. 365; Harris v. Harris, 136 Cal. 379, 69 Pac. 23.

[9] That the conduct of appellant in attempting to keep secret the recording of the deed was a proper subject for inquiry seems entirely clear. It was some evidence—open, however, to explanation—of the consciousness of fraud in connection with his acquirement of the deed. Secret, equivocal, or evasive conduct, either precedent or subsequent, is often of persuasive force in the determination of the good faith of a transaction. So, subsequent concealment or secrecy as to the deed would be indicative of knowledge of the dishonesty of the original transaction and might indicate a purpose to avert any suit to set aside the conveyance until after the death of the grantor. The principle is as true now as it ever was that "men love darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil."

[10] The court admitted evidence of the declarations of Mary Piercy made subsequent to the date of the deed. These declarations were received for the purpose of showing the "relation of the parties." It is contended that the relation of the parties existing after the deed transaction was consummated is entirely immaterial. But it is a familiar rule of evidence that, when a person's mental condition at a certain time is in issue, a showing may be made of his condition both before and after, as indicative of his probable condition at the particular date in question. Some of the evidence along this line was offered in rebuttal of an affidavit introduced by appellant. This affidavit purported to have been made by Mrs. Piercy and was to the effect that she was an unwilling plaintiff in this action, that she had not employed Mr. Black as her attorney, that she did not know that she was bringing the action, and did not fully understand the nature of the proceedings. In contradiction to these assertions, it was certainly proper for respondent to show that Mrs. Piercy did understand the situation, and that her purpose was as indicated by the complaint, which was filed. This could be shown only by evidence of her acts and declarations at the time—she being dead—and we can see no legal objection to the evidence. It is clearly within the rule declared by section 1850 of the Code of Civil Procedure that "where, also, the declaration, act or omission forms part of a transaction which is itself the fact in dispute, or evidence of that fact, such declaration, act, or omission is evidence, as part of the transaction." Words so connected with and illustrative of an act as to elucidate and define its character are considered as appertaining to the act or situation and, like expression on the human face indicating the character of the man, are received in evidence to clarify a situation that might otherwise remain obscure. Cooper v. State, 63 Ala. 80.

[11] As to the other evidence of Mrs. Piercy's statements, it may be said generally that it is brought within the principle of the decisions holding in effect that: "Declarations by the maker made subsequent to the execution of wills or deeds are admissible as showing his state of mind. Such declarations need not be part of the res gestæ, but are admissible because from a fair inference from all the circumstances such declarations show the party's mind at the time of the execution, his susceptibility to influence and his relations with those around him and the persons who are beneficiaries of his bounty. It is only necessary that the matters testified to should be sufficiently near in point of time that the testimony may be of value in determining the question directly in issue. The question of remoteness is one for the court to determine, and the weight of the testimony is to be governed according to the facts." Chambers v. Chambers, 61 App. Div. 299, 70 N. Y. Supp. 483; In re Denison's Appeal, 29 Conn. 399; Shailer v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112; Miller v. Livingston, 31 Utah, 415, 88 Pac. 338; Lane v. Moore, 151 Mass. 87, 23 N. E. 828, 21 Am. St. Rep. 430. The rule is recognized by our Code (section 1870, Code of Civil Procedure, subdivision 4). There is some conflict in the authorities whether such evidence is admissible upon the issue of undue influence; but as to this, Wigmore, in volume 3 on Evidence, § 1738, declares that it "requires a consideration of many circumstances, including his state of affection or dislike for particular persons, benefited or not benefited by the will; of his inclination to obey or to resist these persons; and in general of his mental and emotional condition with reference to its being affected by any of the persons concerned. All utterances and conduct, therefore, affording any indication of this sort of mental condition, are admissible, in order that from these the condition at various times (not too remote) may be used as the basis for inferring his condition at the time in issue. This use of such data is universally conceded to be proper." The question necessarily involves two elements as pointed out by Dixon, J., in Rusling v. Rusling, 36 N. J. Eq. 603: First, the conduct of him who is charged with exercising the undue influence; and, second, the mental state of the other produced by said influence, which may require a disclosure of his strength of mind and of his purpose as to the disposition of the property both immediately before the conduct complained of and while subject to its influence. In order to show his "mental state at any given time, his declarations at that time are competent because the conditions of the mind are revealed to us only by its external manifestations, of which speech is one. Likewise the state of mind at one time is competent evidence of its state at other times, not too remote, because mental conditions have some degree of permanency."

Here the competency of the grantor to understand any business transaction was directly in issue, and it was the contention of respondent that the dominating and coercive influence of appellant extended over the entire period of inquiry. It would seem therefore that the ruling of the court admitting the declarations is unquestionably correct.

The principle is not that involved in the case of Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 Pac. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186, and Ord v. Ord, 99 Cal. 523, 34 Pac. 83. In the former it was said that the declarations and acts of the grantor "made and done in his own interest months after the deed was delivered are not admissible as indicating his intentions in delivering the deed," and, in the latter, that a "grantor will not be permitted to disparage his deed by declarations made or acts done by him in his own interest subsequent to its execution." But in those and other similar cases there was no issue as to fraud or the mental condition of the grantor, and the testimony was offered as evidence of the truth of the facts asserted in it and was clearly self-serving and hearsay. In a case like this it is plain the witness is permitted to detail declarations which he has heard, not as evidence of the truth of the fact asserted, but of a spontaneous and unreflecting expression of the mental and emotional condition of the declarant. The distinction is marked and vital and recognized by the authorities.

An examination of the record convinces us that from a legal and equitable standpoint it would be wrong to reverse the judgment. It is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CHUTUK. (Cr. 245.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 36*)—MANSLAUGHTER—EVIDENCE.

Defendant and deceased engaged in a controversy over the construction of a sewer, which deceased claimed unnecessarily infringed on his rights of ingress and egress to his property. At the conclusion, deceased turned to go to his house, when defendant struck him a violent blow with his fist on the side of the jaw and neck, causing a fracture of both jaws and of the thyroid and cricoid cartilages, resulting in decedent's death shortly thereafter. Held, that the killing resulted from an unlawful act, not amounting to a felony, and, though unintended, constituted manslaughter.

2. HOMICIDE (§ 340*)—APPEAL—PREJUDICE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where accused was convicted of manslaughter only, he was not prejudiced by error in instructions with reference to murder in the first and second degrees.

3. HOMICIDE (§ 307*)—MANSLAUGHTER—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the blow that killed deceased was struck in sudden anger, the court properly charged that when the blow, though unlawful, is struck in the heat of passion, excited by a quarrel, sudden and of sufficient violence to amount to adequate provocation, the law, out of forbearance for the weakness of human nature, will disregard the actual intent, and will reduce the offense to manslaughter, that in such a case, though the intent to kill exists, it is not the deliberate and malicious intent which is an essential element of murder, but that if the intent exists, and the killing is unlawful, it will be murder, even though done on a sudden quarrel or heat of passion, unless there was adequate provocation which is not produced by opprobrious, contemptuous actions or gestures without an assault on the person, or trespass against lands or goods.

4. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SELF-DEFENSE.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, it appeared that the killing was the result of a difficulty between defendant and deceased, the court properly charged that self-defense is not available to a defendant who has sought a quarrel with the design to force a deadly issue, and thus, through his fraud, contrivance, or fault, to create a real or apparent necessity for the killing.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 789*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REASONABLE DOUBT.

An instruction that, while accused could not be convicted unless his guilt was established beyond a reasonable doubt, still the law did not require demonstration, or proof, excluding possibility of error, producing absolute certainty, because such proof was rarely possible, and that moral certainty only was required, or that degree of proof which produces conviction in an unprejudiced mind, was proper.

6. HOMICIDE (§ 293*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where a difficulty over defendant's construction of a sewer near decedent's residence resulted in defendant's killing deceased, an instruction that the sewer, during the progress of its construction, was as much the property of the defendant as if it consisted of a house and lot, was properly refused.

7. HOMICIDE (§ 269*)—INTENT—INSTRUCTIONS—PROVINCE OF JURY.

The intent with which defendant struck the blow that killed deceased being a matter for the jury, the court properly refused to instruct with reference thereto.

8. HOMICIDE (§ 338*)—APPEAL—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

Where accused was convicted of manslaughter only, he was not prejudiced by the overruling of objections to certain testimony, the effect of which tended to show malice against decedent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Joe Chutuk was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Schweitzer & Hutton, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ALLEN, P. J. The defendant and appellant was informed against by the district attorney of Los Angeles county for the crime of murder. He was convicted of manslaughter, and the judgment of the court was that he suffer imprisonment in the state prison for the term of two years. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying a new trial.

[1] There is evidence in the record tending to establish these facts: The defendant, a sewer contractor, on the date of the homicide was engaged in superintending the work of excavation in front of the property of one Webb. A controversy arose between the contractor and Webb with reference to the manner in which the work was done; Webb claiming that there was an unnecessary infringement of his rights of ingress and egress to his property. Both parties seem to have become very angry over the controversy. Both were unarmed. Webb, however, at the conclusion turned to go to his house, when defendant and appellant struck him a violent blow with his fist on the side of the jaw and neck, causing a fracture of both jaws and the thyroid and cricoid cartilages. Webb from the injuries received from the blow shortly thereafter died. There can be no question but that the record discloses the unlawful killing by defendant. It may not have been intended, but resulted from an unlawful act, not amounting to a felony, and was therefore manslaughter. People v. Munn, 65 Cal. 214, 3 Pac. 650; People v. Stokes, 11 Cal. App. 760, 106 Pac. 251.

[2] Appellant specifies as error certain instructions of the trial court with reference to murder in the first and second degree. Inasmuch as defendant was acquitted of murder in the first and second degree, no prejudice is manifest. As said in People v. Quimby, 6 Cal. App. 487, 92 Pac. 493: "The jurors must be presumed to be possessed of such a degree of intelligence as to enable them to comprehend and understand the pertinency to the evidence of the court's declaration of the law, and that, under the evidence, their verdict could not be founded upon any consideration of the elements constituting the higher grades of the offense." See, also, People v. Woods, 147 Cal. 273, 81 Pac. 652, 109 Am. St. Rep. 151; People v. Chaves, 122 Cal. 140, 54 Pac. 596. The fact that the defendant was acquitted of murder in the first and second degree renders it unnecessary to consider the specification with reference to the refusal of the court to charge that such offense had not been made out.

[3] We see no error in the action of the court charging the jury: That "when the mortal blow, though unlawful, is struck in the heat of passion, excited by a quarrel, sudden and of sufficient violence to amount to adequate provocation, the law, out of forbearance for the weakness of human nature, will disregard the actual intent, and will reduce the offense to manslaughter; in such case, although the intent to kill exists, it is not that deliberate and malicious intent which is an essential element in the crime of murder." That "if the intent exists and the killing is unlawful, it will be murder, even though done upon a sudden quarrel or heat of passion, unless there was adequate provocation." That adequate provocation is not produced by opprobrious, contemptuous actions or gestures, without an assault upon the person, or trespass against lands or goods. These charges and others with reference to the intent with which the blow was struck, and which was a question of fact for the jury, were not improper.

[4] Nor do we see any error in the charge of the court to the effect that self-defense is not available as a plea to a defendant who has sought a quarrel with the design to force a deadly issue, and thus, through his fraud, contrivance, or fault to create a real or apparent necessity for the killing. Under the facts of the case, it was for the jury to determine whether or not this controversy had been sought by the defendant and his intent and purpose in connection therewith. Those instructions of the court with reference to the use of deadly weapons, and referring to the higher grades of the offense, could not in any degree have prejudiced defendant. As before said, he was acquitted of such charges, and the court properly charged the jury as to the presumption attaching to acts voluntarily and willfully done, and the intent as to the natural, probable, and usual consequences thereof. People v. Besold, 154 Cal. 368, 97 Pac. 871.

[5] The court properly charged the jury that, "while the defendant cannot be convicted unless his guilt is established beyond a reasonable doubt, still the law does not require demonstration; that is, such a degree of proof as, excluding possibility of error, produces absolute certainty because such proof is rarely possible. Moral certainty only is required, or that degree of proof which produces conviction in an unprejudiced mind." This was a correct exposition of the law, and no error is apparent in connection therewith.

[6] We see no error of the court in refusing an instruction to the effect that the sewer, during the process of construction, was as much the property of the defendant as if it consisted of a house and lot. We can conceive of no theory upon which such an instruction, under the record, would be permissible.

[7] The court properly refused to instruct the jury as to the intent with which the blow was struck; that was a matter for the jury to determine. Taking the instructions together, we think they fairly presented the law to the jury, and that there was nothing therein which could have a tendency either to mislead the jury or to prejudice the rights of defendant.

[8] We see no prejudicial error in the action of the court overruling objections to certain testimony, the effect of which might tend to show malice upon the part of the defendant. The jury by its verdict acquitted the defendant of any malice, and the error, if any, was harmless.

Defendant's criticism of the action of the district attorney we think unwarranted. There is nothing in the record indicating that any statement made by the district attorney was not based upon proper and logical inferences from the testimony adduced.

A careful examination of this record indicates to our minds that the defendant was clearly shown to have been guilty of manslaughter, and through the verdict and judgment there was no miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MARKET STREET BANK et al.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. April 18, 1912. Rehearing Denied May 18, 1912. Denied by Supreme Court June 17, 1912.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 65*)—LIQUIDATION—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

Pending proceedings to liquidate an insolvent bank, a corporation organized to rehabilitate the bank issued to creditors bonds in exchange for claims against the bank. A creditor of the bank who became owner of about $8,000 worth of bonds of the corporation in exchange of claims was indebted to the bank for rent for $875. The creditor filed a claim with the receiver of the bank for about $8,000 in anticipation of redelivering the bonds to the corporation and receiving from it the claims against the bank. Subsequently the creditor and the corporation made an agreement for the return of the bonds held by the creditor in exchange for the claims against the bank. To carry out the agreement, the president of the corporation delivered to the receiver claims against the bank for about $6,000 to receive a 50 per cent. dividend on the amount of claims and paying the same to the creditor. The creditor delivered to the receiver bonds on the face value of $1,750 to enable him to retain the rent due. The receiver delivered the bonds to the corporation, and they were marked, "Paid." The receiver, with the acquiescence of the corporation, selected claims to the amount of $1,750, and retained a dividend in settlement of the rent, and delivered to the president of the corporation a check for $1,500 as part payment of the dividend on the remainder of the claims. The president tendered the check to the creditor, who refused to accept it, claiming that he was entitled to a dividend on the whole $6,000 worth of claims. Held, that the corporation receiving nothing from the creditor under the agreement could refuse to proceed further in the transaction; the creditor not obtaining any valid title to the claims.

2. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 77*)—LIQUIDATION—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

The court properly permitted the receiver of the bank to retain the $875 dividend on $1,500 worth of claims delivered to him by the president of the corporation, since the creditor had assigned to the receiver so much of his claims as such dividend would represent, and the fact that at the time he did so he had no title to the claims did not prevent the assignment from becoming operative on the corporation subsequently delivering the claims to the receiver for the benefit of the creditor.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Proceeding by the People against the Market Street Bank and others to liquidate the affairs of the bank, in which Louis H. Mooser was appointed receiver. From orders denying relief to Kelleher and Browne, claimants, they appeal. Affirmed.

Percy L. Shuman, for appellants. W. G. Harrison, J. C. Campbell, Louis H. Mooser, and Stratton & Kaufman, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. On June 25, 1908, the Market Street Bank of San Francisco, a corporation, was adjudged insolvent, and Louis H. Mooser was appointed receiver thereof to liquidate its affairs. Shortly thereafter certain persons interested in various ways with the bank conceived a plan of rehabilitating that institution, and for the purpose of carrying out that plan organized a corporation under the name of the Market Street Securities Company. That corporation issued to the creditors and depositors of the Market Street Bank bonds in exchange for claims and accounts against the bank, the ultimate purpose being to buy in, if possible, all of the bank's outstanding obligations. Subsequently the Securities Company passed a resolution and gave public notice to the effect that, if the proposed rehabilitation of the insolvent bank was not successful, it would return the claims, consisting of bank books and other evidences of indebtedness, to the parties who had assigned them to the Securities Company, upon the return of the bonds issued therefor, subject to the condition that the bonds returned must be the identical bonds issued to the depositor or creditor in exchange for the assignment of his claim.

The terms of this resolution are not contained in the transcript, but its existence seems to have been recognized by the parties to the litigation, and its terms are to be gathered from the briefs of counsel. It has, however, but a remote bearing upon the questions involved in the appeal, as the rights of the appellants, if any, arise out of a specific agreement alleged to have been made between them and the Securities Company.

Among other creditors of the insolvent bank who entered into the plan of its rehabilitation was the firm of Kelleher & Browne, appellants herein, who became the owners of some $8,000 worth of the bonds of the Securities Company issued as indicated, part thereof being in exchange for their deposit account with the insolvent bank, and the remainder having been acquired by them either directly from the Securities Company in exchange for assignments of other accounts against said bank, or intermediately from persons to whom they had been directly issued. Kelleher & Browne were tenants of the Market Street Bank, and it is undisputed that they were indebted to Louis H. Mooser, as receiver, in the sum of $875 for unpaid rent. Upon a sale of the assets of the insolvent bank, the court, on or about February 4, 1909, declared a dividend of 50 cents on the dollar to be paid to the owners and holders of claims against said bank. On January 7, 1909, the appellants, although they at this time were merely the owners of bonds of the Securities Company, filed a claim with the receiver of the insolvent bank for some $8,000, apparently in anticipation of redelivering their bonds to the Securities Company and receiving from it the claims and accounts for which the bonds had been issued, and they indorsed upon this claim an assignment of the sum of $875 thereof to Receiver Mooser to enable Mooser to retain this sum out of any money becoming payable by him to the appellants.

In the month of June, 1909, appellants arrived at an agreement with the Securities Company, through its president, F. M. Meigs, for the return to that company of the bonds held by them in exchange for the claims against said insolvent bank for which the bonds had been issued. In order to carry into effect this agreement, Meigs delivered to Receiver Mooser claims against the insolvent bank amounting to something over $6,000 for the purpose of receiving from Mooser the 50 per cent. dividend upon said amount of claims and paying the same to appellants, the latter in the meantime retaining their bonds. About this time appellants delivered to Receiver Mooser bonds of the face value of $1,750, for the purpose of enabling Mooser to retain, in payment of the rent due him from them, the sum of $875—the amount of the dividend payable on the claims represented by said bonds. Mooser delivered these bonds to the Securities Company, the secretary of which marked them "Paid," and it was upon this day or about this time that Mooser received from the Securities Company the $6,000 worth of claims above referred to. Out of this amount of claims Mooser, with the acquiescence of the Securities Company, selected certain of them to the amount of $1,750, and retained the dividend payable upon them—amounting to $875—in settlement of the rent due from Kelleher & Browne, giving them credit accordingly. He also delivered to Meigs, said president, a check for $1,500 on account of and as part payment of the dividend payable on the remainder of said claims. Meigs brought this check to appellants, who refused to accept it, claiming to be entitled to the dividend upon the whole $6,000 worth of claims. Shortly thereafter, by reason of an injunction suit, the payment of this check was stopped, and William Greer Harrison, who in the meantime had been appointed receiver of the Securities Company, refused to recognize the agreement made between Meigs and appellants, and now claims to be entitled, as receiver of the Securities Company, to the unpaid dividend on the remainder of said claims.

Petitions were filed by both Harrison and the appellants, each claiming to be the owner of the whole of said claims and entitled to the dividend thereon. Receiver Mooser answered, setting up the payment to himself as receiver of the $875 as aforesaid in satisfaction of the rent due from the appellants, and leaving himself at the disposition of the court as to whom he should recognize as to the owner of the claims upon which the dividend was still unpaid. The court, after hearing the testimony, made two orders, one approving the action of Mooser in retaining the said $875, and the other ordering him to turn over to Harrison, as receiver of said Securities Company, the remainder of said claims delivered to him by Meigs as aforesaid.

Kelleher & Browne appeal from both said orders. They claim, as against Harrison, to be the owners of the claims, and, as against Mooser, that he accepted certain specific bonds of the face value of $1,750 in payment of his rent, and that the claims the dividend upon which he paid to himself were not those for which said bonds were issued, but were claims issued against bonds owned and still in the possession of appellants, from which it is argued that the receiver has twice been paid the rent due him. We think both the orders appealed from were correct and proper.

[1] As to the order concerning Harrison, the execution of the agreement between Meigs and appellants did not proceed far enough to give to the latter any valid title to the claims. If, instead of allowing the transaction to proceed as it did, the appellants had themselves taken from the Securities Company a reassignment of the claims, and redelivered to that company the bonds, the transaction would have been complete, and would have resulted in substituting appellants as the owners of said claims. But the transaction followed a different course. Meigs proceeded himself to collect the dividend on the claims—undoubtedly with the intention of turning it over to appellants and receiving from them the bonds when he should do so. He even offered them the first and only payment that he received from Mooser on account of the dividend; and this the appellants very ill advisedly rejected. The Securities Company had received nothing from the appellants under this agreement, and, upon the rejection by appellants of the check for $1,500, it had the right not to proceed any further in the transaction—which course Receiver Harrison, who was subsequently appointed, chose to pursue.

[2] As to the order permitting Mooser to retain the $875, dividend on $1,750 worth of claims delivered to him by Meigs, it must not be overlooked that the appellants had themselves assigned to Mooser so much of their claims as this dividend would represent; and, although at the time they did so they had no title to the claims, yet, when the Securities Company subsequently delivered such claims to him for the benefit of the appellants, the assignment became operative, and immediately vested in him the right to retain the dividend on the amount of claims covered by the assignment. The contention that Mooser accepted $1,750 in bonds of the Securities Company in payment of the rent is untenable. While the reading of the receipt given by Mooser for the bonds might lend color to this contention, yet it is quite apparent that appellants contemplated that the possession of the bonds entitled Mooser to the same value in claims to be received from the Securities Company. The Securities Company turned over to Mooser all the claims which the appellants claimed to be entitled to by virtue of their ownership of bonds, if the exchange arranged with Meigs should be effected; and out of such claims Mooser selected only sufficient to pay him the amount due from appellants. The claim is made by appellants' counsel that Mooser surrendered the $1,750 of bonds to the Securities Company without receiving anything therefor—intending it to be inferred that appellants suffered some prejudice thereby, and that the claims, for which the particular bonds surrendered had been issued, were negligently left with the Securities Company. An examination, however, of the record shows that the majority of the claims issued for this particular $1,750 worth of bonds were among the $6,000 of claims delivered by the Securities Company to Mooser. That Mooser did not select these particular claims on which to pay himself the dividend did not work any prejudice whatever to the appellants, for, had he done so, the claims and accounts on which he did actually pay himself the dividend would be included in the amount ordered by the court to be turned over to Receiver Harrison.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

DAVIDSON v. ALL PERSONS. (Civ. 930.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 23, 1912.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 145*)—VACATING JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT—MERITORIOUS DEFENSE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, which provides that, when a summons in an action has not been personally served, the court may allow defendant, or his legal representative, at any time within one year after judgment, to answer to the merits of the original action, a defendant who has not been personally served and who moves to vacate a default judgment in an action to quiet title brought under the McEnerney act (St. 1906 [Ex. Sess.] p. 78) must show facts constituting a defense on the merits.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 160*)—VACATING JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT—AFFIDAVIT OF MERIT.

On a motion under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, by a defendant not personally served, to set aside a default judgment in an action to quiet title under the McEnerney act (St. 1906 [Ex. Sess.] p. 78), an affidavit which alleges that plaintiff's intestate had a half interest in a part of the property involved and the sole interest in another part, all of which facts were known to plaintiff at the time of the commencement of the action, sufficiently alleged a good defense to the action on the merits, without stating the source of the title claimed to have been in plaintiff's intestate.

3. LIS PENDENS (§ 25*)—EFFECT—PERSONS BOUND BY JUDGMENT.

The McEnerney act (St. 1906 [Ex. Sess.] p. 78), relating to the quieting of title against the claims of all persons against whom jurisdiction is obtained by publication, by section 9 required a notice of the pendency of the action to be filed with the complaint without stating its effect, and Code Civ. Proc. § 409, makes a lis pendens constructive notice of the pendency of the action to subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers, but only of its pendency as against parties designated by their real names. Held, that the notice intended by the Legislature was the lis pendens provided by the Code of Civil Procedure with the same effect as in other cases, and that all parties defendant were bound by the notice whether designated by their real names or not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Lis Pendens, Cent. Dig. §§ 47-57; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

4. QUIETING TITLE (§ 19*)—ACTIONS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The purpose of the McEnerney act (St. 1906 [Ex. Sess.] p. 78) is to enable the title existing at the time the action is commenced to be quieted against the claims of all persons.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. § 48; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

5. JUDGMENT (§ 145*) — VACATION BY DEFAULT JUDGMENT—AFFIDAVIT—ADVERSE INTEREST AT COMMENCEMENT OF ACTION.

On a motion under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, to set aside a default judgment against a defendant not personally served, obtained in an action to quiet title, brought under the McEnerney act (St. 1906 [Ex. Sess.] p. 78), the affidavit must show that defendant had some interest in the property at the commencement of the action adverse to that asserted by the plaintiff.

6. JUDGMENT (§ 145*)—VACATION OF DEFAULT JUDGMENT—GROUNDS.

The McEnerney act for the quieting of titles (St. 1906 [Ex. Sess.] p. 78) by section 5 provides that plaintiff shall make affidavit that he does not know, and has never been informed, of any other person who claims any interest in the property adversely to him, and by section 6 provides that, if the affidavit declares the name of any person claiming any adverse interest, the summons shall be personally served. Code Civ. Proc. § 473, provides that, when summons in an action has not been personally served, the court may allow defendant or his legal representative within one year after judgment to answer to the merits of the original action. A defendant not personally served on motion to vacate a default judgment unequivocally stated in his affidavit that the plaintiff at the commencement of the action, and at the time judgment was rendered therein, knew that defendant had an interest in the property, and by stipulation filed the answer therein which presented issues of fact as to ownership of the property, setting forth the source of the title claimed to have been in defendant's intestate prior to the commencement of the action, and also alleged that the facts stated in the decree were not true, and that affiant had a good and meritorious defense to the action. Held, that defendant's motion to vacate a default judgment should be granted.

Action to quiet title by Rebecca E. Davidson against all persons, etc., defendants. Judgment by default for plaintiff and Isabelle Davidson, administratrix of the estate of Hallie B. Davidson, deceased, moved for an order setting aside such judgment. Motion denied, and Isabelle Davidson appeals. Order reversed.

Henry C. Schaertzer, for appellant. Stafford & Stafford, H. I. Stafford, and W. P. Caubu, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action to quiet title to certain lots in the city and county of San Francisco, under the so-called McEnerney act (Stats. 1906, p. 78). The complaint describes four separate lots.

The summons was served by publication, as provided for in the said act. It does not appear that personal service was made on any defendant, and the judgment recites that no appearance was "made by any defendant," and, "proof having been adduced of all the facts alleged in the complaint and other papers and pleadings on file herein, * * * it is hereby ordered, adjudged and decreed that said plaintiff * * * is the owner in fee simple absolute and in the actual and peaceable possession of the real property hereinafter described, and the whole thereof; that no other person has any interest * * * in or to said real property; * * * and that her title thereto be, and the same is hereby, established and quieted as against all the world." This judgment was entered and filed on October 27, 1909. On October 15, 1910, appellant served and filed her notice of motion for an order setting aside said judgment, "based upon all the files, records and papers on file in said matter, upon this notice of motion, and upon the affidavit of Isabelle Davidson, administratrix of the estate of Hallie B. Davidson, deceased."

The affidavit of appellant alleges the death of Hallie B. Davidson to have occurred on December 4, 1909, less than two months after entry of said judgment, her appointment, duly made, as administratrix of his estate, on June 29, 1910, and, as to the interest of said deceased in said lots, states as follows: "That said Hallie B. Davidson, deceased, had an interest in the property hereinafter described at the time of his death and at the time the judgment hereinafter mentioned was rendered in the above-entitled action and still continued to so have said interest in the said property hereinafter described, and that said interest in said hereinafter described property was a half interest in the property described in paragraphs 1, 2, and 3, and that, as to the lot described under paragraph marked 4, was and is a sole interest, and that he was the sole and only owner of said lot described herein as No. 4, all of which facts were fully known to the said plaintiff at the time of the commencement of the above-entitled action, and also at the time said action was heard by said superior court of the state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and at the time the decree hereinafter mentioned was entered by the above-mentioned court." Then follow certain recitals in said decree, not now material, and concluding as follows: "That the facts stated in the said decree are not true; that the said Rebecca E. Davidson is not the sole and only owner, nor has she any further or greater interest in any part or parcel of said property than a one-half interest in lots set forth and described as Nos. 1, 2, and 3, and that said Rebecca E. Davidson knew at the date of the said judgment and decree that she had no further or greater interest therein than a one-half interest in said lots and no interest whatever in the lot described herein as lot No. 4; that no personal service of summons in the above-entitled action was ever made on Hallie B. Davidson, deceased, and the said Hallie B. Davidson was never personally served with the summons issued in the above-entitled action; that the said Rebecca E. Davidson knew at the time of the commencement of said action that the said Hallie B. Davidson claimed an interest in all of the said property hereinabove mentioned, and that he, the said Hallie B. Davidson, was a party in interest in said property, and that he claimed a portion and certain parts of said property as his sole and exclusive property; that your affiant has stated all the facts in relation to this matter to her counsel, and has fully and fairly stated to him each and every and all of the matters and things and facts relating thereto, and after such statement her counsel has advised her that she has a good and meritorious defense to the above-entitled action."

[1,2] The appeal is from the order denying the motion to vacate and set aside the default judgment. Among the remedial sources of relief which may be resorted to that justice may be furthered, section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, provides as follows: "When from any cause the summons in an action has not been personally served on the defendant the court may allow, on such terms as may be just, such defendant or his legal representative at any time within one year after the rendition of any judgment in such action to answer to the merits of the original action." Gray v. Lawlor, 151 Cal. 352, 90 Pac. 691, 12 Ann. Cas. 990, was a case arising under the McEnerney act, where the defendant petitioned to have the default judgment set aside under this section. One of the questions there was the same as the principal question here, namely: Does the affidavit show that the defendant has a good defense to the action on its merits? Said the court: "From the fact that the relief to be afforded is the privilege of answering 'to the merits of the original action,' the condition is implied that the defendant must have a good defense to the action on its merits. This being one of the conditions of the statute, the defendant must show that such defense exists. The defendant in this case has complied with this rule. He avers in his affidavit that he is now, and at all times mentioned for more than 10 years last past has been, the owner of and entitled to the possession of the property described in the complaint. This, if true, is a complete defense to the cause of action sued on." We have examined the affidavit filed in that case, and find that the defendant made no attempt in his affidavit to disavow title or give its source. All that he deposed to on that subject is stated in the opinion of the court in the language of the affidavit. And apparently the averment as to ownership of the property was in itself deemed a sufficient compliance with section 473, and not only justified, but required, the vacation of the default judgment. There were some averments in the affidavit as to the long continued residence of the defendant in the city and county of San Francisco and to his being well known there and that his name was in the city directory, but these facts seem not to have influenced the decision. Respondent contends that the affidavit in the present case was insufficient because it does not state the source of the title claimed to have been in Hallie B. Davidson; that the affidavit should show at least the facts required to appear in plaintiff's affidavit. This may be true of the answer, but the affidavit on this motion is not made under the McEnerney act, but under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, if something more than appeared in Gray v. Lawlor is to be required in the affidavit, the rule must come from the court that decided that case. Respondent cites Hoffman v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. 386, 90 Pac. 939, where the court, referring to section 473, stated that the defendant must show facts "constituting a good defense to the proceeding—that is, facts sufficient to show that he has a valid adverse interest in the property." And it is hence claimed that the affidavit was insufficient. The two cases cited were decided about the same time—Hoffman v. Superior Court following Gray v. Lawlor—and the earlier case is cited as authority for the statement found in the later case. We discover nothing in the Hoffman Case inconsistent with or changing the rule stated in Gray v. Lawlor. A "valid adverse interest" must necessarily result from an allegation of ownership.

[3-5] Section 11 of the act provides that the judgment rendered in all such actions "shall be binding and conclusive upon every person who, at the commencement of the action, had or claims an interest, right, title or estate in and to said property or any part thereof, and upon every person claiming under him by title subsequent to the commencement of the action." Respondent makes the point that the affidavit fails to state that defendant's intestate had any interest in the property at the commencement of the action. A lis pendens was filed with the complaint, the effect of which was to impart constructive notice of the pendency of the action to subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers, but, as the section provides, "only of its pendency as against parties designated by their real names." Section 409, Code Civ. Proc. See, also, sections 479, 1908. Section 9 of the McEnerney act requires a notice of the pendency of the action to be filed "at the time of filing the complaint," but does not state its effect. It must be assumed, we think, that the Legislature intended the notice to be the notice referred to in section 409, and that the same effect is to be given to it as in other cases where it may properly be filed. It is true that the defendants were not "designated by their real names," nor was any one so designated. But the very exigency which gave rise to the act required that all persons having any interest in the property should be made defendants by the general designation of "All Persons," etc., and being thus designated, the court acquired jurisdiction of the person upon publication of the summons. Unless it be held that all persons having or claiming to have an interest in the property are subject to the operation of the notice of the pendency of the action, any person, not designated by his real name, could assert an interest acquired a day short of a year after judgment, and, under section 473, have the judgment vacated, and the provisions of the statute that the judgment shall be binding and conclusive upon every person who at the commencement of the action had or claimed any estate or interest in the property, would be shorn of all their force. Indeed, appellant contends that "Hallie B. Davidson, whom the affidavit shows to have had his interest at the time of the rendition of the judgment, could have acquired that interest subsequently even to the rendition of the judgment from one of the defendants who was not personally served, and still have had a right to move for and obtain a vacation of the judgment." We cannot accept this view of the statute.

In the case of Gray v. Lawlor, supra, the plaintiff showed in his affidavit that he was the owner of the property at the commencement of the action, and for some time prior thereto. The purpose of the act is to enable titles existing at the time the action is commenced to be quieted against the claims of all persons. That all persons claiming an interest in the property may be brought in by publication of summons, without personal service, and the title of the plaintiff conclusively decreed to be free from the claims of the whole world as of the date of the commencement of the action, has been settled by our Supreme Court. Title, etc., Co. v. Kerrigan, 150 Cal. 289, 88 Pac. 363, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 682, 119 Am. St. Rep. 199. Speaking of the substituted service by which all persons are made defendants, the court said: "Where, as here, the summons describing the nature of the action, the property involved, the name of the plaintiff and the relief sought, is posted upon the property, and is published in a newspaper for two months, and a lis pendens containing the same particulars is recorded in the recorder's office and entered upon the recorder's map of the property, we cannot doubt that, so far as concerns possible claimants, who are not known to plaintiff, the notice prescribed by the act is as complete and full as, from the nature of the case, could reasonably be expected." It seems to us that we must, in order to preserve the integrity of the act, give to the lis pendens the same effect to all defendants, whether named or not named, and, doing so, a defendant, seeking relief under section 473, must show that he had some interest in the property at the commencement of the action, adverse to that asserted by the plaintiff.

[6] Appellant claims that such an interest appears from her affidavit by necessary implication to have existed in her intestate. It is averred in the affidavit that appellant's intestate was the owner of a certain interest in the property at the time the judgment was rendered, "all of which facts were fully known to the said plaintiff at the time of the commencement of the above-entitled action, and also at the time the said action was heard by said superior court, * * * and at the time the decree hereinafter mentioned was entered by the above-entitled court." It is further averred: That plaintiff "knew at the time of the commencement of said action that the said Hallie B. Davidson claimed an interest in all of the said property hereinabove mentioned, and that he, the said Hallie B. Davidson, was a party in interest in said property, and that he claimed a portion and certain parts of said property as his sole and exclusive property." The implication contended for may not clearly appear, although there is some force in the suggestion that, if plaintiff knew at the commencement of the action that Davidson had an interest in the property, he must then have claimed an interest therein. However this may be, it would seem to us unconscionable to deny the motion in view of the facts alleged. Section 5 of the act requires that the plaintiff shall make affidavit, "fully and explicitly setting forth and showing" certain facts, and, among them: "(3) That he does not know and has never been informed of any other person who claims or who may claim, any interest in, or lien upon, the property or any part thereof, adversely to him, or, if he does know or has been informed of any such person, then the name and address of such person," and section 6 provides that, "if the said affidavit discloses the name of any person claiming an interest in, or lien upon, the property adverse to the plaintiff, the summons shall be personally served upon such person if he can be found in the state, together with a copy of the complaint and a copy of said affidavit." We do not think the findings and decree should be held to be conclusive of the truth of the affidavit as against a person not served who asks relief under section 473, and directly and unequivocally states in his affidavit that the plaintiff knew at the commencement of the action and when he took his decree that affiant had an interest in the property. It appears by the stipulation of the parties that "Isabelle Davidson, administratrix as aforesaid, submitted and placed in the hands of the court, the hereunto attached answer, which she requested in said motion to be allowed to file." This answer is verified and distinctly presents issues of fact as to the ownership of said property, setting forth the source and nature of the title claimed to have been in appellant's intestate prior to the commencement of the action. The notice of the motion did not specifically refer to this answer, but it is in the record and was before the trial court when the motion was heard and appellant in her motion requested leave to file it. While strictly not made a part of the record on the motion, the learned trial court might well have so considered it, and, under the circumstances, we think should have given it its proper weight in determining the motion. But, irrespective of this consideration, we are clearly of the opinion that appellant presented facts sufficient to show that she had a good defense to the action on its merits, and that her motion should have been granted.

Section 473 expressly extends to "the legal representative" of the defendant the right "to answer to the merits of the action." See, also, section 1582, Code Civ. Proc.

The order is reversed.

PEOPLE v. SELBY SMELTING & LEAD
CO. (Sac. 1,847.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 12, 1912.
Rehearing Denied July 12, 1912.)

1. NUISANCE (§ 84*)—PUBLIC NUISANCE—ABATEMENT—JURISDICTION.

Under St. 1899, p. 103, authorizing the district attorney of any county in which a public nuisance exists to sue to abate it, the district attorney of a county, over which fumes from a smelter located in another county escaped in such manner as to constitute a nuisance, may maintain a suit in the first-mentioned county to abate the nuisance.

2. NUISANCE (§ 84*)—PUBLIC NUISANCE—

Under St. 1899, p. 103, which authorizes suit by the district attorney of a county to "abate" a public nuisance existing therein, suit lies to enjoin maintenance of a public nuisance by permitting noxious vapors to escape from a smelter, though, strictly construed, the words "abate" and "enjoin" have technically different meanings.

3. NUISANCE (§ 84*)—PUBLIC NUISANCE—ABATEMENT.

In a suit to enjoin maintenance of a public nuisance by permitting noxious vapors to escape from a smelter, it was not an abuse of discretion to make the decree for plaintiff effective immediately without further opportunity to defendant to experiment to determine whether smelting could be conducted without producing the injuries complained of, where more than three years intervened between the filing of the suit and entry of the decree.

4. NUISANCE (§ 84*)—PUBLIC NUISANCE—DECREE—VALIDITY.

A decree enjoining operation of defendant's smelter "as conducted by defendant" in permitting escape of noxious gases and smoke, etc., was not objectionable as enjoining more than that which constituted a nuisance.

5. NUISANCE (§ 84*)—PUBLIC NUISANCE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In a suit to enjoin maintenance of a public nuisance by permitting vapors to escape from a smelter, evidence held to warrant a finding that the quantity of noxious vapors discharged had increased.

Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; L. G. Harrier and A. J. Buckles, Judges.

Action by the People of the State of California against the Selby Smelting & Lead Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

Chickering & Gregory and F. W. Hall (Curtis H. Lindley and Henry M. Hoyt, 2d, of counsel), for appellant. J. M. Raines, T. T. C. Gregory, and Houghton & Houghton, for the People.

MELVIN, J. This is an action prosecuted in the name of the state by the district attorney of Solano county for the abatement of a nuisance. Judgment was in favor of the state. By it the defendant corporation was enjoined and restrained from permitting fumes from its smelting works to blow over and upon parts of Solano county. From this judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial defendant appeals.

[1] The first question presented here relates to the jurisdiction of the superior court of Solano county over the cause of action. The prosecution was instituted under the authority of the statute passed in 1899 (Stats. 1899, p. 103), which provides that "the district attorney of any county of this state in which a public nuisance may now or hereafter shall exist may * * * bring a civil action in the name of the people of the state to abate said nuisance." Appellant contends that since the source of the odors and gases found to be injurious to the inhabitants and crops in a part of Solano county was the smelter located in Contra Costa county, and since the enjoining order must of necessity operate upon this place of production of the noxious vapors, therefore the statute gave the power of suing to abate the nuisance to the district attorney of Contra Costa county and not to the district attorney of Solano county. Appellant's attorneys argue that the nuisance, if any, was the misuse or abuse of the processes used in carrying on the business of smelting ores; that as such it existed in the county of Contra Costa alone; and that, even if injurious to persons and property in another county, the nuisance as such did not exist in any county except where the tortious acts were performed. They insist that the district attorney is a county officer who may only act within the limits of his own county. The cause of action, they say, being not for damages but to abate a nuisance, it is strictly local, and the nuisance only "exists" for the purposes of its abatement in the county in which the objectionable fumes and gases are liberated into the air during the processes of smelting ores. They are of the opinion that, under the language of the statute, both the existence and the abatement in such cases must be local to the same county. Authorities are cited in support of the position taken by appellant that the jurisdiction of an action to abate a nuisance is in the place where the nuisance has its genesis. Undoubtedly that is the law in some jurisdictions. In re Eldred & Ford, 46 Wis. 545, 1 N. W. 175, was a matter arising out of an application made by persons who had been indicted for maintaining a dam not authorized by law, in such way that it obstructed a public highway by causing water to stand thereon. The court, after an elaborate analysis of the cases, held that the offense was indictable only in the county in which the dam was maintained and not in that in which the particular injury was averred. This case, however, seems to be no longer authority in Wisconsin. In the later case of Lohmiller v. Indian Ford Co., 51 Wis. 683, 8 N. W. 601, which was an action for the abatement of a dam alleged to be a nuisance, the court said: "In support of the first of these causes of demurrer, the learned counsel for the defendant insists that there is an improper joinder of causes of action for the reason that the lands injured are in Jefferson county, while the dam which occasions the injury is in Rock county; consequently the causes of action so united required different places of trial. The gravamen of the complaint, surely, is for an injury to the plaintiff's land in Jefferson county occasioned by a dam in Rock county. * * * We are inclined to think the action was properly brought in the county in which the subject of the action was situated. * * * Under section 1, c. 123, Tay. Stats. It is true, the cause of the injury is in another county." In Horne et al., Water Com'rs, v. City of Buffalo, 49 Hun, 76, 1 N. Y. Supp. 801, the action was one brought to restrain the authorities of the city of Buffalo from depositing filth in Niagara river so that it should be carried by the current to a place in another county where it would pollute the water supply of the city of Suspension Bridge. In that case the court held that the cause of action was in Erie county, in which Buffalo is situated, and not in Niagara county, where the water was taken from the river for use for the inhabitants of Suspension Bridge. The conclusion reached in that case seems to be dependent, in part at least, upon the particular statute involved, for the court said: "The intention of the Legislature to (make) an action for the abatement of a nuisance local is clearly manifested by classifying it with actions which are in their nature local, such as ejectment and waste. I am clearly of the opinion that the nuisance described in the complaint is situated in the county of Erie, at the place where the defendants are in the habit of dumping foul substances in Niagara river." Appellant also cites Stillman v. White Rock Mfg. Co., 3 Woodb. & M. 539 (Fed. Cas. vol. 23, p. 83), in which it was held that, where injury to property in Connecticut was caused by an unwarranted canal maintained in Rhode Island, the jurisdiction pertained to the circuit in which Rhode Island was situated; but the exclusive remedy sought was injunction, and the court held that, the canal being in Rhode Island, its use could be enjoined only in the circuit in which that state was included. In the case at bar there is no such clash of jurisdictions. If the district attorney of Solano county is authorized to institute the action in that county, the superior court, which has powers that are state-wide, may stretch forth the hand of equity into any county, and restrain the operation of a nuisance-creating agency. In Rickey Land & Cattle Co. v. Miller & Lux, 152 Fed. 16, 81 C. C. A. 207, Stillman v. White Rock Mfg. Co., supra, is cited with apparent approval. Other interesting cases are called to our attention by appellant; but we need not review them here, as we are of the opinion that the weight of authority, especially in California, is against appellant's view of the law. Our statute defining "nuisance" does not refer to that which produces the injurious substance as the nuisance. The offensive gases, and not the factory emitting them, would come within the definition given by section 3479 of the Civil Code. That section is, in its essential part, as follows: "Anything which is injurious to health, or is indecent or offensive to the senses, or an obstruction to the free use of property, so as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life or property, * * * is a nuisance." Under this section it seems clear that the offensive matter, and not its source, is regarded. Section 392, C. C. P., provides that an action for injury to real property must be tried in the county in which the property is situated. In the case of City of Marysville v. North Bloomfield Gravel Min. Co., 66 Cal. 343, 5 Pac. 507, in the opinion of the court the following language is found: "This action was brought to abate a nuisance, which it was alleged was causing injury to real property in the county of Yuba, where the action was commenced and is still pending. An action for injuries to real property must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action or some part thereof is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as provided in the Code. C. C. P. § 392. Being an action 'for injuries to real property,' it is not within the class of cases which 'must be tried in the county in which the defendants, or some of them, reside at the commencement of the action.'"

It has been held that an action for an injunction to prevent a defendant from diverting water from a ditch located partly in one county and partly in another may be maintained in the county in which the consequential damage is sustained, although the actual cause of diversion is not in that county. It has also been held that an action to prevent the erection of a dam in one county which, when completed, would cause damage to real property in another county, should be tried in the latter county. Drinkhouse v. Spring Valley Waterworks, 80 Cal. 309, 22 Pac. 252; Last Chance Water Ditch Co. v. Emigrant Ditch Co., 129 Cal. 277, 61 Pac. 960.

In American Strawboard Co. v. State, 70 Ohio St. 140, 71 N. E. 284, the Supreme Court of Ohio was considering an indictment found in Sandusky county for nuisance consisting in the pollution of a stream flowing through that county. The actual corruption of the stream occurred in Seneca county. A statute of Ohio gave jurisdiction of the offense in any county where its inhabitants were aggrieved thereby, but it was urged that this law was in violation of the constitutional provision that an accused shall be tried "by a jury of the county or district in which the offense is alleged to have been committed." This objection was held unsound, the court saying, among other things: "The gravamen of the complaint made in this indictment is not that the American Strawboard Company polluted a water course known as the Sandusky river, but the gist of the complaint is that it so corrupted and polluted the same to the 'damage, prejudice, and common nuisance of the citizens of Sandusky county.' While the offense so charged may grow out of, and may result from, an unlawful act of said Strawboard Company done or committed in Seneca county, yet the specific crime charged is consummated, completed, and takes effect only in Sandusky county. Until such consummation, the crime charged was incomplete; and, until such time as the rights of the citizens of Sandusky county were actually invaded, the particular crime charged in this indictment was not committed." See, also, State v. Lord, 16 N. H. 357; Stamm v. City of Albuquerque, 10 N. M. 491, 62 Pac. 973. The case at bar was properly commenced in Solano county, and there was therefore no error committed by the superior court in overruling the demurrer to the complaint.

[2] By the judgment of the superior court the defendant was enjoined and restrained from permitting the injurious fumes emitted from its works to blow over and upon the premises described in the complaint. Appellant insists that, whatever may be the powers of the court when the Attorney General sues for the elimination of a nuisance, under the statute giving limited power to a district attorney to institute such an action as this, the court could grant no other relief than that of abatement, which alone is mentioned in the act; that the failure to specify the remedy by injunction indicates, under the doctrine "expressio unius est exclusio alterius," that the Legislature never intended to confer upon the district attorney the right to set the machinery of the law in motion for the removal of any nuisances except those necessarily susceptible of abatement. Appellant's attorneys therefore contend that the judgment rendered was beyond the power of the court and void, and that, however desirable it might be in an action of this sort to give the court the power to enjoin the operation of the works producing the nuisance, such power has been withheld and cannot be lawfully exercised. While it is undoubtedly true that, strictly considered, the words "abate" and "enjoin" have technically different meanings (Ruff v. Phillips, 50 Ga. 133), in California the rule is well established that in proper cases injunctive relief, which accomplishes the purposes of abatement without its harsh features, is permissible. In Sullivan v. Royer, 72 Cal. 248, 13 Pac. 655, 1 Am. St. Rep. 51, abatement was the remedy prayed for in plaintiff's bill, and the jury found, as part of their verdict, that the nuisance should be abated. The judgment enjoined defendant from continuing the nuisances complained of. The court said: "An abatement of a nuisance is accomplished in a court of equity by means of an injunction proper and suitable to the facts in each case. Wood on Nuisances, §§ 777-794." See, also, McCarthy v. Gaston Ridge Mill & Min. Co., 144 Cal. 546, 78 Pac. 7; City of Fresno v. Fresno Canal & I. Co. et al., 98 Cal. 184, 32 Pac. 943; Byers v. Colonial Irr. Co., 134 Cal. 555, 66 Pac. 732. The judgment rendered was within the power conferred by the statute in reliance upon which the district attorney instituted the action.

[3] Appellant asserts that the injunction is too sweeping in its terms and assigns that alleged fact as error. The first objection made in that behalf is that the injunction operates immediately, thus giving no opportunity to appellant for experiments to determine whether or not smelting of ores with sulphur bases may be conducted without producing the injuries to property in Solano county for the prevention of which the action was commenced. Our attention is called by counsel for respondent to the fact that the complaint was filed March 14, 1905; the cause was tried in August, 1906; the findings were filed in April, 1907; and the judgment was entered in July, 1908. Evidently the appellant was given ample time and opportunity for experimentation, and there was no abuse of discretion by the chancellor in making the final decree.

[4] The next criticism is that the decree enjoined more than that which constituted a nuisance. An examination of its language, however, fails to convince us that the criticism is well founded. The decree commands that the operation of defendant's works "as conducted by defendant in liberating at and therefrom into the air sulphurous and other injurious and noxious gases and smoke and also smoke and fumes and gases, so in the findings of fact herein found to be so offensive to the senses so as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life and property in the manner and to the community and neighborhood as in the said findings of fact set forth and described, generated or produced by such operations without condensing or otherwise disposing of the same or eliminating the same before reaching open air, is as to said city of Benicia and said portion of said Solano county mentioned and referred to in said findings, a public nuisance for the period commencing at or about the middle of the month of March of each year, for eight months in each and every year including the latter half of said month of March." The abatement of the nuisance is then decreed, and defendant and its officers, agents, and servants are enjoined from operating upon ores during the period in each year of the prevalence of the wind blowing from the defendant's factory towards Benicia without condensing or otherwise disposing of smoke, fumes, and certain enumerated kinds of noxious and injurious gases "so found to be so offensive to the senses, * * * in such a manner so that the same will not reach the open air and will not be blown or carried by said winds over or into or upon the city of Benicia." Read as a whole, the judgment does not restrain the operation of the works except in such manner as to produce smoke, fumes, and gases offensive to the senses and destructive of the property of the people residing in and around Benicia. In other words, appellant is enjoined from maintaining the same sort of nuisance that had proved injurious in the way charged in the complaint and proved on the trial. Judson v. Los Angeles Sub. Gas. Co., 157 Cal. 173, 106 Pac. 581, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183, 21 Ann. Cas. 1247.

In their discussion of the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial, appellant's attorneys have abandoned all exceptions taken to the admission of evidence during the trial save the first one, which raises the same question as that presented by the demurrer to the complaint. As we have previously disposed of that question herein, we need discuss it no further.

[5] One of the findings is attacked on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence. It was to the effect that during the three years before the trial, and prior thereto, defendant had gradually increased the size of its works, and that the amount of sulphurous and other noxious fumes and gases had been "increased during such time." Appellant calls our attention to the fact that Mr. Von der Ropp, a witness, said at the trial that the smelting plant was giving off $5\frac{1}{2}$ tons of sulphur a day as against 12 tons formerly poured into the atmosphere. But the same witness testified that there was a gradual increase in the quantity of fumes emitted from the furnaces up to 1895; that since that time it had been "fairly steady"; and that the increase in production due to the remodeling of the entire plant had been going on "right along." It is true that a decrease in the amount of sulphur-bearing ores roasted at the works of appellant was shown. This was due to the sending of certain ores to other mills, but the decrease occurred after the complaint was filed and could have no effect upon the findings which are made as of the time of the commencement of the action. It is true that the proof showed a practical elimination of all danger from the escape of lead fumes into the air due to the construction of a bag house. But the evidence showed that the damage was caused principally by sulphurous gases. It makes no difference that other actions against this defendant by private persons were based upon the theory that the lead fumes caused damage to people and stock. Neither the allegations nor proof of plaintiff here nor the court's findings were limited to that theory or its establishment. The finding, which is attacked, was supported by the evidence. No other findings are specifically criticised by appellant's counsel in their brief. Therefore we proceed to the consideration of that part of the motion for new trial based upon the assertion of newly discovered evidence.

[6,7] We pass respondent's contention that the affidavits of newly discovered evidence are not properly authenticated in the record. Our examination of them has been such that we are prepared to pass upon the merits of the claim that the court abused its discretion in refusing to grant a new trial. By a series of experiments appellant sought to show, and offered affidavits tending to prove, that complaints were made by residents of Benicia and vicinity of the nuisance produced by fumes from the smelter on days when it was not in operation; and that the disagreeable odors were traceable to sources other than the Selby smelter, notably to the petroleum refineries of the Union Oil Works. But these facts were all such as might have been produced by due diligence before the trial. Indeed, at the trial there was testimony upon the part of Prof. O'Neill, Mr. F. E. Wyman, Mr. W. D. Hyde, Prof. Osterhaut, Mr. Albert S. Colton, and Mr. Von der Ropp, to the effect that disagreeable fumes were emitted by the refineries of the Union Oil Works and other manufactories on the shores of the bay. Evidence of later experiments would be at best but cumulative. Evidence of complaints on days when the smelter was inactive tended merely to show that other causes of discomfort existed—another phase of the evidence adduced at the trial regarding the oil refineries. Proof that such complaints had been erroneously made against appellant would be likewise cumulative. After a careful examination of these affidavits, we cannot say that they exhibit so strong a defense that the court below abused its discretion in failing to grant a new trial. Undoubtedly, affidavits presenting evidence of a cumulative character may, and often do, cause a trial judge to grant a motion for a new trial; but, whether such motion receives favorable or adverse ruling, the whole matter is addressed to the judge, whose discretion will not by this court be interfered with except in cases of manifest abuse. Oberlander v. Fixen Co., 129 Cal. 692, 62 Pac. 254.

Appellant seeks the benefit of the doctrine of comparative injuries, sometimes known as "the balance of hardship," asserting that since the discomfort and injury caused to the inhabitants of Solano county by the fumes from the smelter are much less than the hardship suffered by the corporation in the partial suppression of its business, injunctive process should be denied. A similar question was discussed in one of the opinions in Hulbert v. California Portland Cement Co., 118 Pac. 931, but that opinion was not signed by a majority of the court, as the matter was not regarded by some of the justices as being essential to the determination of the proceeding then before the court. As this is an "appeal on the merits," and as the question is now squarely presented, we adopt the views expressed in the above-mentioned opinion.

It follows from the foregoing discussion that the judgment and order from which the defendant has appealed must be affirmed.

WORLEY v. SPRECKELS BROS. COMMERCIAL CO. (L. A. 2,864.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 11, 1912. Rehearing Denied July 11, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 528*) — RECORD — SUFFICIENCY—ACTION ON MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

A record containing a copy of a minute order denying a motion for a new trial, properly certified by the clerk in his certificate attached to the transcript, sufficiently shows an order denying a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2374, 2384-2388; Dec. Dig. § 528.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 129*)—INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

In an employé's personal injury action, there can be no recovery on account of defective machinery or appliances, or unsafe place in which to work, unless the same was the proximate cause of the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 257-263; Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 129*)—INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

In an action for injury to a longshoreman who was crushed between iron rails on one side of a car and a load which was being hoisted from a ship, caused by a winch driver moving the load in the wrong direction, the presence of the rails cannot be deemed the proximate cause of the injury.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 173, 177*)—FELLOW SERVANTS—EMPLOYER'S LIABILITY.

An employer of a longshoreman is not liable for injury to him while unloading a vessel, caused by mere negligence of a fellow employé in operating a winch, but is liable if the fellow employé was incompetent, and if the employer knew of such incompetency or could have known of it by ordinary care in employing or retaining the fellow employé.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 307, 343-346, 352-353; Dec. Dig. §§ 173, 177.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—REVIEW—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Findings sustained by substantial evidence are conclusive on appeal, however strongly the evidence may be opposed to other evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3935-3937; Dec. Dig. § 1002.*]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 279*)—INJURY TO LONGSHOREMAN—INCOMPETENCY OF FELLOW EMPLOYÉ—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action for injury to a longshoreman while unloading a vessel caused by a winch driver moving a load in the wrong direction, evidence held to sustain a finding that the winch driver was incompetent and that defendant was negligent in employing him.

7. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 170*)—FELLOW SERVANTS — EMPLOYMENT — "ORDINARY CARE."

The "ordinary care" exacted in employing servants is that degree of care that a man of ordinary prudence would use in view of the nature of the employment and the consequences of employing an incompetent person.

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 297*)—FINDINGS —CONSISTENCY WITH GENERAL VERDICT.

In an employé's personal injury action, special findings that the condition of a flat car, the failure of a fellow employé to obey a signal, his incompetency and negligence in his employment, each was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, are not so inconsistent as to vitiate a general verdict for plaintiff; it appearing that the jury meant that all those things contributed to the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1195-1198; Dec. Dig. § 297.*]

9. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 264*)—INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—LIABILITY—GROUNDS.

Recovery may be had against an employer for injury caused by negligence in providing an unsafe place to work, or negligence in employing an incompetent servant; proof of both kinds of negligence being unnecessary.

10. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 271*)—INCOMPETENCY OF FELLOW EMPLOYÉ—EVIDENCE.

Generally evidence of particular acts tending to show negligence or incompetency of a fellow employé is admissible to show that he was unfit or incompetent, and hence in an action for injury to a longshoreman who was caught between a load which was being moved from a ship onto a flat car, through a winch driver moving the load in the wrong direction on receiving a signal, testimony that the winch driver on a previous occasion had "smashed up some furniture or boxes" was admissible as tending to show that he was unfit or incompetent for his duties.

11. WITNESSES (§ 380*)—ADVERSE WITNESSES —SURPRISE.

That a party was surprised by a witness' failure to give testimony expected of him does not entitle the former to show statements made by the witness inconsistent with his testimony, where the testimony is not adverse.

12. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1048*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF TESTIMONY.

On an issue of the incompetency of a fellow employé, a winch driver, through whose negligence plaintiff was injured, any error in permitting plaintiff to ask his own witness whether witness had not said that he "had to keep after the winch driver all the time," and that "there was always something wrong," to show statements contradicting unexpected testimony that witness could not say whether the winch driver was competent, was harmless to defendant, where the witness answered that he did not remember stating that "there was always something wrong" and testified that he had "to keep after" all winch drivers.

13. WITNESSES (§ 390*)—IMPEACHMENT—INCONSISTENT STATEMENTS.

Testimony that a witness made statements out of court inconsistent with his testimony is admissible to impeach him, though the impeaching evidence be inadmissible for any other purpose; but the inconsistency must appear prima facie before the impeaching declaration can be introduced.

14. WITNESSES (§ 390*)—IMPEACHMENT—INCONSISTENT STATEMENTS.

Where on an issue of incompetency of a winch driver, through whose negligence in moving a load plaintiff, a fellow employé, was injured, a witness for defendant testified that, when the winch driver worked for him, he never had any difficulty in understanding witness' orders, and that witness never heard any complaint against him, plaintiff was properly permitted to show that witness had said to him that he did not want to be "drawn into this case," but that he would not have a fellow like the winch driver drive a winch for him unless he had to.

15. PLEADING (§ 356*)—ANSWER—AMENDMENT—FILING—LEAVE—NECESSITY.

An amended answer filed after joinder of issue and without leave of court, or consent of plaintiff, is properly stricken on plaintiff's motion.

16. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 681*)—REVIEW—AMENDMENT OF PLEADING.

A ruling refusing to allow an amended answer to be filed is not reviewable where the nature of the amendment desired does not appear.

17. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 220*)—INCOMPETENT FELLOW SERVANT—EMPLOYER'S RESPONSIBILITY.

In an action for injury to a longshoreman, based on incompetency of a fellow employé, a winch driver, through whose negligence plaintiff was injured, it was no defense that plaintiff and the winch driver were comembers of a longshoremen's union, and that plaintiff made no objection as to the winch driver's competency.

18. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 294*)—INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injury to a longshoreman through incompetency of a fellow employé, it was proper to instruct that, as to any obligation which the law imposes upon an employer, all of which had been specified in prior instructions, the employer is liable notwithstanding neglect to perform it is that of an agent to whom he has delegated performance, even though the employer used due care in selecting the agent.

19. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an employé's personal injury action, any error in an instruction on assumption of risk was harmless where the jury found that the injury was proximately caused by negligence of a fellow employé in employing whom the employer was negligent.

20. TRIAL (§ 199*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REFUSAL.

In an employé's personal injury action, an instruction that, if the proximate cause of the accident was the furnishing of an unsafe place in which to work, plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and the jury must find for defendant, was properly refused where the evidence was not such as to make the question of contributory negligence one of law for the court.

21. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REFUSAL—PREJUDICE.

In an employé's personal injury action, it was not prejudicial error to refuse to instruct that plaintiff and another employé, through whose negligence plaintiff was injured, were fellow servants, where the jury found that such other employé was incompetent and that defendant employer had knowledge thereof.

22. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REFUSAL—MATTER COVERED.

An instruction covered by other instructions given is properly refused.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. R. Guy, Judge.

Action by H. O. Worley against Spreckels Bros. Commercial Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

gence of defendant. Plaintiff had verdict and judgment. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. There is no force in the objection made by plaintiff to a consideration of the defendant's bill of exceptions.

[1] Counsel for plaintiff is in error in his statement that the record does not show that an order has been made denying defendant's motion for a new trial. It does contain a copy of the minute order to that effect, properly certified in his certificate attached to the transcript by the clerk. Mendocino County v. Peters, 2 Cal. App. 24, 28, 82 Pac. 1122.

At the time he received the injuries on account of which this action was brought, namely, on July 20, 1909, plaintiff, who was a longshoreman, was working for defendant as a slingman in helping unload the steamer Nevadan at San Diego. He had been engaged in this particular work only since about 2:30 o'clock of the preceding afternoon. The ship was lying at a wharf, and loads of merchandise were being hoisted from its hold by a steam winch and lowered to flat cars on the wharf, whence they were trucked into a warehouse a few feet away. The ship was being unloaded from its three hatches, two winch drivers and a slingman being allotted to each hatch. Plaintiff's duty was to receive the loads coming from hatch No. 3 as they were lowered to a flat car, and to there unhook them, and in the performance of this duty it was necessary for him to stand on the car. The winches were operated by steam power, and caused to either go ahead or reverse by the use of a lever after turning a screw which let in the steam. At hatch 3 one Vargas, a longshoreman who had been assigned to this particular duty, was acting as "amidships winch driver," and another man was acting as "burden winch driver." There was evidence to support a conclusion that plaintiff did not know that Vargas was acting as the amidships winch driver. The load is raised from the ship by the amidships winch and lowered to the flat car by the burden winch. When, so being lowered, it reaches its destination, it may easily be unhooked if the rope has been sufficiently slackened. If this has not been done, it becomes necessary for the amidships winch driver to slacken the rope by moving his winch in the opposite direction from that in which it was moved in hoisting the load from the ship. The winch drivers operated in response to signals, made by the hand or by words, given either directly by a hatch tender on the ship, or by the sling tender on shore, through the hatch tender or directly. The usual directions by words were "come back," "go ahead," and "hold it," and when the load had been lowered by the burden winch, and it was desired that the rope should be slackened, "come back on the amidships," a direction to the amidships winch driver to reverse, or "come back." At the time of the accident, the hatch tender had gone below, and it was necessary for plaintiff to give such signals as were required directly to the winch drivers. Loads of coils of wire were being taken out of hatch 3 and lowered to the flat car on which plaintiff was working. A load of such coils was lowered, coming down partially on said car, and plaintiff proceeded to unhook it. Finding that the rope was not slack enough to permit this to be done, standing with his back to the ship and facing the load, he called out "come back on the amidships," and at the same time gave the signal therefor with his hand. Vargas, instead of "coming back," went ahead with his winch, thereby pulling the load over against the plaintiff, who was thus caught between the load and some iron beams which had previously been unloaded from the ship and piled along the side of the car nearest the ship. Although he and some of the other men working there continued to call out "come back," Vargas for some little time continued to go ahead, with the result that, before he finally stopped, plaintiff was very seriously injured by being crushed between the load and the iron beams. No claim is made in this court that the damages awarded by the jury are excessive in amount.

The evidence clearly shows that plaintiff and Vargas were fellow servants, and, under the law as it was at the time of the accident, plaintiff could not hold his employer liable for injuries due solely to the mere negligence of Vargas. The claim of plaintiff is that defendant negligently failed to furnish him a safe place in which to work, and that it failed to use ordinary care in the selection or retention of Vargas as winch driver, whose alleged incompetency, it is claimed, was the proximate cause of the accident.

The jury, in addition to their general verdict, answered certain questions submitted to them on particular issues of fact. They found, in answer to such questions (a) that the condition on the surface of the car on which plaintiff worked was the proximate cause of his injury; (b) that the failure of Vargas to obey the signal given him by plaintiff was the proximate cause of his injury; (c) that defendant failed to use ordinary care in selecting and retaining Vargas as winch driver, and that Vargas was incompetent to act as such; (d) that defendant either had knowledge of such incompetency or should have had it prior to plaintiff's injury; and (e) that the failure of defendant to use ordinary care in the selection and retention of Vargas was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury.

[2, 3] The claim in regard to the negligent furnishing of an unsafe place in which to work was based upon the fact that the flat car upon which plaintiff was required to be was loaded on one side with iron beams as already indicated. The only connection of the iron rails on this car with plaintiff's accident is that they served as a bulwark against which he was crushed by the load of wire when Vargas failed to follow the order given him, and directly contrary to such order moved the load in the direction of and against plaintiff. Of course there can be no recovery on account of defective machinery or appliances or unsafe place in which to work unless the same has directly caused or contributed to the injury, in other words, was a proximate cause of the injury. It may be assumed that, under the authorities cited by defendant, the sole proximate cause of the injury in this case was either the negligence or incompetency of Vargas, and that the condition of the car was not the proximate cause of the injury. See Luman v. Golden, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 700, 707, 74 Pac. 307; Vizelich v. Southern Pacific Co., 126 Cal. 587, 59 Pac. 129; Trewatha v. Buchanan, etc., Co., 96 Cal. 494, 500, 28 Pac. 571, 31 Pac. 561; Kevern v. Providence, etc., Co., 70 Cal. 392, 11 Pac. 740.

[4, 5] As we have said, in view of the fellow-servant rule, defendant would not be liable to plaintiff for these injuries if they were solely due to the mere negligence of Vargas, a fellow servant of plaintiff. But if Vargas was unfit, or, as it is generally put, incompetent to perform the duties of an amidships winch driver, by reason of any cause, and defendant knew of such unfitness or incompetency, or would have known it if it had exercised ordinary care in the matter of his employment or retention in that capacity, it being one of the obligations of an employer to use such care with a view to the safety of all his employés, and if such unfitness or incompetency upon the part of Vargas was the proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff, then admittedly defendant was liable to plaintiff for the damages caused by such injury. See Still v. San Francisco, etc., Ry. Co., 154 Cal. 559, 563, 98 Pac. 672, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 322, 129 Am. St. Rep. 177. The special verdict of the jury found all these facts in favor of plaintiff, and the conclusions there expressed fully support the general verdict. The question is presented whether there was enough in the evidence from which the jury might find the existence of these facts essential to the liability of defendant. It should be unnecessary to suggest that these findings are conclusive upon us if there be substantial evidence in support thereof, no matter how strongly such evidence may be opposed to other evidence given on the trial.

[6] We are of the opinion that there was enough in the evidence to legally sustain the conclusion of the jury to the effect that Vargas was, in fact, unfit or incompetent to act as amidships winch driver.

Taking into consideration the duties of one in such a position, the dangers reasonably to be apprehended from there having one who is not able to at once understand and fully appreciate the nature of such orders as may be given him in the matter of running such a winch, and the fact, that it was the custom to give such orders either by word of mouth or by motion of the hand, as the party giving the same might at the moment select, it cannot be held that it may not reasonably be concluded as matter of fact that one who, by reason of his lack of knowledge of the English language at a place where that language is the one ordinarily used by the workmen, is not able to at once appreciate the meaning of a direction given to him in that language, is not fit or competent for the discharge of the duties of such a position. Failure to comply promptly with an order in regard to the moving of the winch might very reasonably be anticipated to cause great personal injury to those engaged in the work of loading or unloading a vessel, as well as damage to property, and the ability to at once understand and appreciate the full meaning of the words used to convey such orders would seem to be a primary requisite for the position in question.

The case of Date v. New York, etc., Co., 114 App. Div. 789, 100 N. Y. Supp. 171, cited by appellant, is not in point. There the employés who did not understand the English language were engaged in the simple work of pushing a car, and pushed it against a ladder on which the plaintiff was standing, thereby throwing him to the ground. The court said that, in the employment of men to do such "simple work as pushing a car," it did not see how it could occur to any one that the fact that they could not understand the English language would make it dangerous to others for them to push a car along a track, and that "the defendant could not have anticipated such an accident from such a cause, and that is the test of its negligence or breach of duty in putting them at such work." A very different situation is presented in the case of such an employé as is here involved.

Consideration of the evidence has satisfied us that there is evidence enough to sufficiently support a conclusion that Vargas did not measure up to the requirements in this respect. It is true that there is evidence opposed to this theory, but we are bound in view of the verdict to take the evidence most favorable to plaintiff. And while defendant relies very strongly on evidence to the effect that Vargas had worked in this particular capacity on some five or six ships for three or four days on each ship, without complaint or accident, there was positive evidence to the effect that, when on the day of the accident he was directed by the captain in charge to take this place, he remonstrated and said in Spanish (a language understood by the captain) substantially that he did not understand the winch much, and that he (the captain) kicked against him too much every time he drove a winch, and that the captain simply ordered him to take that place or go home.

There was also sufficient evidence to support a conclusion that the accident was due to the inability or incompetency of Vargas in this respect—to his failure to at once understand and appreciate the order given him to “come back on the amidships”—by reason of his insufficient acquaintance with the English language and his consequent lack of comprehension of the meaning of the words used. His very meager knowledge of the English language was quite clearly shown. While, when orders were given by word of mouth instead of by the mere motion of the hand, it appears that the orders “come back,” “go ahead,” and “hold it” were quite common, the claim of respondent that the order to “come back on the amidships” is a somewhat unusual one because the situation seldom requires it does not appear to be unreasonable in the light of the record. There is nothing to show that Vargas had ever been called upon to respond to this particular order, or that he knew exactly what the words meant. His conduct, when the order was given to him, goes far, under all the circumstances, to show that he did not understand its meaning. While it may be, as claimed by defendant, that he did understand, and simply forgot or became confused, and thus was impelled to turn the lever the wrong way, we are not warranted in holding that the jury could not reasonably infer that his action was due to a misunderstanding of the order, caused by his ignorance of the English language. The fact that plaintiff also gave the proper signal with his hand at the time he called out his direction does not compel a contrary conclusion. Vargas may not have seen the signal, even if he was in a position where he could have done so, as to which the record leaves us in doubt.

[7] In view of what has already been said, we cannot doubt that the jury were authorized to conclude that defendant failed to use ordinary care in the matter of the employment of Vargas in the capacity of amidships winch driver. As was said in Still v. San Francisco, etc., Co., 154 Cal. 559, 567, 98 Pac. 672, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 322, 129 Am. St. Rep. 177, “under all the authorities the term ‘ordinary care’ as used in this connection means that degree of care that a man of ordinary prudence would use in view of the nature of the employment and the consequences of the employment of an incompetent person—a degree of care commensurate with the nature and danger of the business and the grade of service for which the servant is intended, and the hazards to which other servants are to be exposed from the employment of a careless or incompetent person.” The evidence was clearly sufficient to support a conclusion that those who employed and assigned Vargas to the place in question had full knowledge of his ignorance of the English language. Whether they exercised ordinary care in assigning him to this work, in view of the nature of the employment and the consequences of the employment of one not sufficiently acquainted with the English language to at once fully appreciate and understand all orders that might be given to him in that language, was a question upon which reasonable minds might well differ, and therefore one for the jury.

[8, 9] The fact that the jury found by the special verdict that each of several things was “the proximate cause” of plaintiff’s injuries, viz., the condition of the surface of the flat car, the failure of Vargas to obey the signal, the incompetency of Vargas, and the lack of ordinary care on the part of defendant in the selection of Vargas, does not render such verdict so inconsistent as to require that it and the general verdict in favor of plaintiff be set aside. The meaning of the answers to the questions submitted to the jury is obvious. They simply concluded that all these things contributed to the injury. If the conclusion that the condition on the surface of the flat car was a proximate cause of the injury be not sustained by the evidence, it still remains that the other findings are ample to sustain the general verdict. We are utterly at a loss to understand defendant’s claim that plaintiff was not entitled to recover unless he proved “both an unsafe place to work and negligence in employing an incompetent servant.” Negligence in either respect, proximately causing the injury, is a sufficient basis for the recovery.

[10] There was no error in allowing proof of a prior act of Vargas, while acting as winch driver for defendant, tending to show negligence or incompetency, which act was known to defendant’s agents in charge. This evidence, which was simply that Vargas on a prior occasion, by his manner of handling the winch, had “smashed up some furniture or boxes,” was not very important, and it is clear that, standing alone, it would not have been sufficient basis for a conclusion that Vargas was in fact unfit or incompetent. Holland v. Southern Pacific Co., 100 Cal. 240, 34 Pac. 666. But it was evidence tending in some degree to show unfitness or incompetency, which might properly be taken into consideration in connection with other evidence on that question. We understand it to be the general rule that evidence of individual acts tending to show negligence or incompetency is admissible for the purpose of showing that the employé was in fact unfit or incompetent. This was declared to be the rule in Gier v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 108 Cal. 129, 134, 41 Pac. 22. If, as claimed, the statement there was obiter dictum, we nevertheless consider it correct, and the California cases cited decide nothing to the contrary.

man and hatch tender at the time of the accident, was called as a witness by plaintiff. He testified on his direct examination that Vargas was a Mexican, and said: "I do not know whether he could speak the English language. He could understand a little, understand enough to do his work. I could not say whether he was a competent winch driver." Plaintiff's attorney was then permitted to elicit from the witness testimony to the effect that he (the witness) had told him (the attorney) that he had to keep after Vargas all the time, "hollering at him about going ahead too fast or too slow," and that he did not remember using the words, "There was always something wrong." He further testified that he had to "keep after" all winch drivers about going too fast or too slow. No other evidence was offered by plaintiff to show that Myers had ever said anything to the effect that there was always something wrong with Vargas. The theory upon which plaintiff was permitted to elicit this evidence was that, where a witness called by a party has given damaging testimony against him, the party calling him may show, where he is surprised by the adverse testimony given by his own witness, that such witness has previously made statements inconsistent with his testimony given on the trial. It is thoroughly settled, however, that the rule invoked in such cases has no application where such witness does not testify adversely to the party calling him, but merely fails to give certain testimony expected of him. See People v. Creeks, 141 Cal. 529, 75 Pac. 101, and cases there cited; Bollinger v. Bollinger, 154 Cal. 695, 705, 99 Pac. 196, and cases there cited. But, if we assume that the situation was not such as to make the rule relied on by plaintiff applicable, we are of the opinion that it should be held that defendant was not prejudiced by anything testified to by Myers in this regard. It was not shown thereby that Myers had ever said anything to the effect that there was always something wrong. He flatly said that he did not remember saying anything of that kind, and no testimony was subsequently introduced by plaintiff to show that he ever did make any such statement. The other statement, viz., about "going ahead too fast or too slow," was of no importance in view of the circumstances of the accident, and it may fairly be said thereof that evidence concerning it was not prejudicial.

[13, 14] Patrick Walsh was called as a witness for defendant, and testified on direct examination that he had worked in the capacity of foreman of the hatch or hatch tender on several occasions, and that Vargas had worked under him. He said: "So far as I know, when Vargas was working under me he never had any difficulty in understanding me when I gave him orders; I always spoke to him in English, and cannot speak anything else. During the time, about two years before July 20, 1909, I was nearly always present when a ship was being unloaded in some capacity; I never heard any complaint against Vargas as a winchman." On cross-examination he denied that on a previous occasion, the time and place being specified, he had said to plaintiff, "I don't want to be drawn into this case, but I would be G—— d—— if I would have a fellow like that drive a winch for me," and also, "I wouldn't hire a man like Vargas unless I had to." Plaintiff was allowed, in rebuttal, to testify that Walsh made such statements to him at such time and place. The action of the trial court in allowing this testimony is claimed to have constituted prejudicial error.

If such prior statements may properly be held to be inconsistent with the testimony given by Walsh on his direct examination, evidence of such statements (he denying them and the proper foundation having been laid) was admissible, of course, for the purpose of impeaching the witness, although such evidence was not admissible for any other purpose. See Keyes v. Geary St., etc., R. R. Co., 152 Cal. 437, 93 Pac. 88. But, to justify the admission of a prior statement under this rule, it is universally recognized that there must be an inconsistency between it and the testimony, and such inconsistency must appear prima facie before the alleged impeaching declaration can be introduced. But obviously, as is said in section 1040 of Wigmore on Evidence (volume 2): "Such is the possible variety of statement that it is often difficult to determine whether this inconsistency exists." It is further said in the same section: "As a general principle, it is to be understood that this inconsistency is to be determined, not by individual words or phrases alone, but by the whole impression or effect of what has been said or done. On a comparison of the two utterances, are they in effect inconsistent? Do the two expressions appear to have been produced by inconsistent beliefs?" Gauged by this test, which appears to us to be entirely fair, we think the evidence was admissible. The whole impression and effect of the testimony given by Walsh on his direct examination was that, in his opinion, Vargas had a sufficient understanding of the English language to properly enable him to perform the duties of a winchman, and that he was in every way competent to perform those duties. The natural impression or effect of the language used in the alleged prior statements was that, in his opinion, Vargas was not fit or competent for that place. We believe the alleged prior statements were of such a nature that plaintiff was entitled to have them go to the jury on the question of the credibility of the witness Walsh.

We are aware that there are some expressions in the opinion in People v. Collum, 122 Cal. 186, 54 Pac. 589, that may appear inconsistent with our ruling on this question. In so far as that opinion may be construed as holding that, notwithstanding the natural effect and impression of inconsistency, nevertheless, if both statements (the one on the trial and the prior statement) may be literally true on some conceivable hypothesis, the prior statement may not be shown, we think it goes too far and does not state the correct rule. It is claimed here that possibly Walsh had a personal dislike for Vargas because he was a Mexican or for some other reason entirely consistent with his competency, and that it may have been on this account alone that he would not have him run a winch for him unless he had to. If such were the case, it is said the two statements would be absolutely consistent. But we think it is sufficient to warrant the proof of the prior statement that the natural effect and impression of the two statements is that they are inconsistent. The prior statement is open to explanation as to its meaning by the impeached witness if he has any explanation to make, and its effect may be limited by instruction to the jury solely to the question of the credibility of the witness.

[15-17] Defendant having filed its answer on January 10, 1910, on February 10, 1910, without leave of court and without the consent of plaintiff, filed an amended answer, setting up an additional defense to those contained in the original answer. Plaintiff on February 24, 1910, moved, on notice, to strike the same from the files on the ground that it had been filed after issue joined, without leave of court or consent of plaintiff. The motion was granted on March 2, 1910, the day named in the notice of motion, which was the day of the commencement of the trial. No claim was apparently made in the lower court or is made here that the motion was not well grounded. The amended answer having been filed without leave of court, there was no error in ordering it stricken from the files. It does not appear from the bill of exceptions, which purports to contain the proceedings in relation to the matter of said amended answer, that any application for leave to file an amended answer was made to the court at any time. It is doubtful whether the purported minute entry of February 28, 1910, found in the judgment roll, which simply shows such an application "for leave to file an amendment to the answer," and the denial, an exception to the ruling, and leave to prepare and serve a bill of exceptions within 30 days, in so far as it shows such application, is any part of the judgment roll or of the record. But, if it can be considered on this appeal, there is nothing therein to show what was the nature of the amendment then desired to be presented. So that the question whether the court committed any error in refusing to allow an amended answer to be filed is really not presented on this appeal. But, assuming that the proposed new matter was the same as the new matter incorporated in the amended answer that was stricken out, we are satisfied that the proposed new defense did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense to plaintiff's action. It was sought thereby to bring the case within the doctrine declared in Callan v. Bull, 113 Cal. 593, 598, 45 Pac. 1017, as follows: "The master's liability for the negligence of his servant rests upon his right to select the servant and to control his work, but, when this selection and control rests in another, he is freed from such liability. The same principles govern the liability of a contractor for an injury resulting from the use of defective materials in his work. He can be held liable only when he has the right of selecting the materials." Substantially it was alleged in the proposed new defense that plaintiff and Vargas were both members of the Longshoremen's Union, members of which defendant employed in the loading and unloading of vessels; that one of the rules of said union, to which both plaintiff and Vargas had subscribed, was that defendant should not be permitted to employ any person other than members of said union, so long as members of said union presented themselves for work; that plaintiff and Vargas both presented themselves to defendant for employment on July 19, 1909, as longshoremen and members of said union; that plaintiff and Vargas worked together on July 19th and a part of July 20th, and plaintiff made no complaint to the union, to any of its members, or to defendant, as to the competency of Vargas, but accepted him as winchman and worked with him without complaint until the time of the accident. There was nothing in all this to show either that defendant's right to select a competent winchman was in any degree impaired, or that plaintiff in any way guaranteed the fitness or competency of Vargas as a winchman. The difference between these allegations and the facts of the case of Farmer v. Kearney, 115 La. 722, 39 South. 967, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1105, as the same are stated in appellant's brief, is obvious from a mere reading of such statement.

[18, 19] We find no prejudicial error in such instructions given to the jury as are complained of. The instruction to the effect that, as to any obligation which the law imposes upon the employer, all of which had been specified in prior instructions, the employer is liable, notwithstanding the neglect to perform it is that of an agent to whom he has delegated the performance, even though the employer exercised due care in the selection of such agent, correctly stated the law, and was pertinent to the facts of the case. The instruction in regard to the character of risks assumed by one accepting employment correctly stated the law. It also may be said of it that it cannot be held to have been prejudicial, in view of the special findings of the jury to the effect that Vargas was incompetent, that his incompetency was a proximate cause of the accident, and that defendant neglected to use ordinary care in employing and retaining him in the position of winchman. Even if we assume that it may well have been omitted, we cannot see that the instruction relating to the duty of an employer in cases where the service in which an employé is employed is such as to endanger the lives and persons of coemployés, if the employé is not competent, which is correct as an abstract proposition of law, could possibly have prejudiced defendant, especially in view of the other instructions given. The instructions as a whole were very fair and complete, fully presenting the propositions of law applicable in a manner free from criticism.

[20-22] As to the refusal of the court to give certain instructions requested by defendant: The requested instruction to the effect that, if the proximate cause of the injury was the furnishing by defendant of an unsafe place in which to work, then plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and the jury must find for the defendant, was properly refused. Whatever other objections there may be thereto, it was incorrect in view of the fact that the evidence was not such as to make the question of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff one of law for the court. In view of the findings of the jury, the failure of the court to give a requested instruction declaring in terms that plaintiff and Vargas were fellow servants cannot be held prejudicial. The long proposed instruction in relation to the duty of the jury in regard to the question of the competency of Vargas at the time of the accident and the question whether the defendant exercised ordinary care in the matter of his employment as winch driver at the time of the accident was fairly covered, we think, in so far as it was correct, by other instructions. There is no other point made that requires notice here.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

OTIS ELEVATOR CO. v. FIRST NAT.
BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO.
(S. F. 4,986.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 8, 1912.
Rehearing Denied July 8, 1912.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 154*)—FORGED
CHECKS—ACTIONS—PLEADING.

Where plaintiff sued to recover a balance in defendant's bank, the existence of which defendant denied because of the payment of forged checks, it was not necessary that any issue on the alteration of the checks should be made by the pleadings to entitle defendant to take advantage of plaintiff's negligence in providing for the preparation and execution of checks by its agents.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 502-512, 514-533; Dec. Dig. § 154.*]

2. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 148*)—PAYMENT OF FORGED CHECKS—LOSS.

The rule that, as between a bank and its customers, payment of forged or altered checks by the bank is made at its peril applies stringently in cases of simple forgery which involve no other elements, but does not apply where the customer's negligence has contributed to the payment of the checks by the bank, or where the facts are such as to estop the customer to deny the correctness of the payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 438-452; Dec. Dig. § 148.*]

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 159*)—LIABILITY OF PRINCIPAL—NEGLIGENCE.

A principal is liable to third persons not only for the negligence of its agent in the transaction of the business of the agency, but also for the frauds, torts, or other wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as a part of the transaction of such business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 599-613; Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

4. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 148*)—CHECKS—
FORGERY—PAYMENT BY BANK—VALIDITY—
ESTOPPEL TO DENY.

Plaintiff's agent, B., was required to write out checks and transmit them to the payees after they had been signed by plaintiff's general manager, and to fill out, present, and have cashed at defendant bank checks signed by plaintiff and payable to "cash" or "bearer," or to the order of the assistant manager. Defendant's paying teller had frequently cashed such checks for B. in the ordinary course of business. B., having written out and procured the manager's signature to a check to M. & Co. for $3.50, changed it by erasing the name of the payee and inserting the word "bearer," stamping a different date thereon, and by obliterating the original amount and inserting $5,500, further indicating the amount by a perforating device. He then indorsed the check, presented it to defendant's teller, and received payment. At about the same time he took a check which the manager had signed and left with him, payable to the assistant manager's order and filled out in B.'s own handwriting for $400, and raised it to $1,400. This he presented to the assistant manager and, after it was indorsed by him, B. punched the figures with the safety device, presented the check, and received payment. In neither check was there any visible alteration or indication that they had been raised. Held, that plaintiff was estopped to deny that B.'s demand for payment of the checks was within his apparent authority and was therefore not entitled to recover the amount thereof from the bank under the rule that, where one of two innocent parties must suffer from the tortious conduct of a third, he who puts it in the power of the third person to do the wrong must bear the loss.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by the Otis Elevator Company against the First National Bank of San Francisco. From a judgment denying de-defendant's motion for a new trial, it appeals. Reversed.

Lloyd & Wood, R. H. Lloyd, T. C. Van Ness, and Percy E. Towne (Cushing & Cushing, of counsel), for appellant. J. A. Stephens, Curtis Hillyer, and Charles W. Slack, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. The complaint in this action alleged that on January 20, 1904, plaintiff had on deposit in the bank of defendant a sum in excess of $6,496.50; that on said day plaintiff drew its checks against this deposit for two amounts, $5,496.50 and $1,000 respectively; that both of said checks on presentation were dishonored; that two days later the check of plaintiff for $75.55 was paid by the bank; and that, when this last check was paid, there was a balance due plaintiff from defendant of $6,496.50 on said account, for which amount plaintiff asked a judgment. The defendant by answer admitted the dishonor of the two checks drawn on January 20, 1904, and the payment of the last check, but denied that on January 20, 1904, plaintiff's balance exceeded $75.55.

The facts in the case are not disputed. Plaintiff had for many years been a depositor with defendant. Samuel Burger was the general manager of the plaintiff, W. Noble Dickinson, Jr., was his assistant, and H. T. Bliss was cashier and accountant in San Francisco of plaintiff. It was, and had long been, the custom of the plaintiff to use its own forms in drawing checks against its account in the bank of defendant. These were printed on white ledger paper and not upon "safety paper" of the kind used by defendant in the blank check books ordinarily furnished to its customers. Plaintiff possessed a certain protective perforating device by which the figures corresponding to the amount to be drawn by a check could be cut in the paper. This device—termed a safety device—was sometimes, but not always, used in the preparation of its checks. Burger was the only person in San Francisco authorized to sign checks for the plaintiff. Bliss had custody of the check book of plaintiff and the protective device referred to. He had been in the employ of plaintiff for many years. The usual practice followed by the plaintiff in drawing checks was for Bliss to fill in the checks in his own handwriting and take them to Burger for signature, who upon signing them intrusted Bliss with the duty of punching the amount for which the checks were drawn by use of the safety device. Hooper, the paying teller of defendant, had been acquainted with Bliss in connection with the business of plaintiff for fully 10 years, and knew him to be the cashier and bookkeeper of plaintiff. It was customary for Bliss to go to the bank with checks of plaintiff signed by Burger, and drawn either to the order of W. Noble Dickinson, Jr., and indorsed by him, or payable to "cash" or "bearer," and cash such checks. This was a frequent and usual thing, and Hooper had been accustomed to honor such checks. He was thoroughly familiar with the handwriting of Bliss in the body of checks and with his signature, as likewise with the signature of Burger. In August, 1903, as Burger was about to leave the city to be absent for some days, Bliss, at the request of Burger, made out and Burger signed about 20 checks payable to W. Noble Dickinson, Jr. The purpose of leaving these blank checks was to enable Dickinson to pay the creditors of plaintiff and carry on the business during the absence of Burger. When signed, these checks were not dated, nor were any amounts written therein. At the same time that these blank checks payable to Dickinson were signed by Burger, Bliss also presented to him for his signature some 50 checks for various amounts and made payable to various persons. All these checks were in the check book, not having been separated therefrom; were all completely filled out as to the payees and amounts in the handwriting of Bliss, but the amounts of none of them had been punched in these checks, and their dates were stamped with a rubber stamp. In this condition these checks were signed by Burger. One of them, complete in form when presented to Burger and signed by him, was made payable to "A. Merle Co." and was for the sum of $3.50. This particular check, after its signature by Burger and while subsequently in the custody of Bliss, was "raised" by him. By means of a rubber eraser he erased a portion of the date on the check, and with a rubber stamp stamped a different date thereon. With chemicals he erased the name of the payee, "A. Merle Co.," and in its place wrote the words "bearer" as the payee thereof. By the same process he obliterated the amount for which the check was originally drawn, and in lieu thereof wrote in and made it payable for $5,500. Then by means of the safety device he perforated the check to indicate that it was drawn for that amount. Having effected these changes, he indorsed the check and presented it to Hooper, the paying teller of the defendant, who paid it.

It does not appear when this forgery on the part of Bliss occurred, whether before or after Burger had left the city, but that fact is of no consequence. Subsequent to the departure of Burger, however, Bliss took one of the blank checks which Burger had signed and left with him and which was made payable to the order of Dickinson and filled it out in his own handwriting for the sum of $400. In the body of this check Bliss had placed the figures "400" after the dollar sign thereon, and also had written therein the words "four hundred." In doing so, however, he had left a sufficient space between the figure "4" and the dollar sign to permit the insertion of another figure therein. Likewise he had left a sufficient space between the written words "four" and "hundred" so as to permit the writing therein of other letters. In this condition Bliss presented the check to Dickinson who wrote his signature on the back and returned it to Bliss. The latter then inserted the figure "1" between the dollar sign and the figure "400," and wrote in the word "teen" after the word "four" and preceding "hundred" in the space which had been left between these latter words. When this check was presented to Dickinson and indorsed by him, it had not been punched with the safety device, but after its indorsement Bliss cut upon it there-with the figures "$1,400." This check was indorsed by Bliss and presented to Hooper, the paying teller of the defendant, who cashed it. No erasures whatever were made in this latter check, the alterations consisting solely of filling in the blank spaces which were in the check when it was indorsed by Dickinson. There was nothing about either of these checks to warrant an inference that there was any negligence on the part of Hooper in not discovering that the checks had been raised or otherwise altered, and nothing upon which to base an inference that the appellant was in any degree negligent in paying to Bliss the amounts apparently called for by these checks. Besides being in the familiar handwriting of Bliss, both checks were apparently genuine and valid for the full amounts called for thereby. It was not until Bliss failed to return from his vacation, and suspicion was aroused in the mind of Burger as to the reason for his disappearance, that an investigation disclosed the fact that he had thus tampered with both these checks and escaped with the proceeds of his crime.

The findings of the trial court were in accord with the allegations of the complaint, and judgment given the plaintiff for the full amount claimed thereunder. This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, and the point made is that the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision of the trial court.

The position of the appellant under the evidence is that it had paid out on the raised checks above referred to a sum equivalent to the amount of the two large checks mentioned in the complaint and which it dishonored, and that the payment of these amounts was made under such circumstances as to justify appellant in charging the same to the account of respondent.

The particular claim of the appellant in this respect is that the trial court should have found that the respondent, through its agent Burger, was guilty of negligence as to the check raised by Bliss to $5,500 on account of using for the preparation of its checks a kind of paper from which, by means of chemicals, the original writing thereon could be readily obliterated, and in signing the checks in question without the original amounts thereof having been stamped therein with the safety device; and, as to the check raised to $1,400, that Dickinson, the other agent of respondent, was likewise guilty of negligence in indorsing that check with spaces left unfilled and without the amount thereof having been cut therein with the safety device; and, further, that the acts of Bliss, the agent of respondent, in altering and presenting both checks must be imputed to the respondent.

[1] It is insisted preliminarily by the respondent that, as the appellant did not specially plead any negligence on the part of respondent with reference to the kind of paper used for its checks, or in failing to have them stamped with the safety device prior to their being signed or indorsed, or in leaving spaces in the $400 check when indorsed, nor any facts showing the relation of Bliss with respondent, his handling of the checks, and his dealings as agent of the respondent with the appellant, that these facts may not be considered on this appeal under the claim of the appellant that thereby respondent is estopped from claiming that appellant should sustain the loss resulting from the payment of the forged checks.

When this case was in Department 2, in the decision thereof, it was said in the opinion when considering this point: "As the answer contains no allegation that the Otis Elevator Company, by its negligence or because it is bound by the acts of its agents, is estopped from denying the genuineness of these two checks, respondent urges that such estoppel is not a proper subject for our consideration on this appeal. It must be remembered, however, that the purpose of the action was to determine whether or not plaintiff had a certain balance in defendant's bank. The payment of the two checks being pleaded by way of defense, issue was completely joined. The forgery of the checks and plaintiff's conduct with reference to their preparation and custody were matters arising in connection with the offered proof of the principal allegation in the answer and plaintiff's attempted refutation of it. It was not necessary that any issue upon the alteration of the checks should be made by the pleadings. This seems to have been the theory of both parties to the action at the trial, for there it was conceded that, if plaintiff were responsible for the alteration of the checks, the small balance in favor of the Otis Elevator Company, which defendant admitted to exist, would be the proper credit. The case was tried apparently upon the theory that the sole question before the court was whether or not plaintiff was estopped to deny its responsibility for the checks in the form in which they were presented for payment." We are satisfied of the correctness of this view.

Considering now the appeal on its merits and addressing our attention to the first check for $5,500. There, of course, is no question but that this check was forged in the manner as heretofore set forth and in that condition paid by the appellant to Bliss. In determining by whom the loss through this forgery should be borne, whether by appellant or respondent, we deem it of no importance to discuss the claim asserted by appellant of negligence on the part of respondent arising from the conceded failure of Burger to have the amount of this check punched upon it with the safety device before it was signed by him. Nor is the matter of asserted negligence in using ledger paper in drawing its checks instead of safety paper necessary for consideration. It appears in the evidence that respondent procured its own check books to be made out of what is called "ledger" paper; that this character of paper was used in the manufacture of bookkeeping sets, one of its qualities as represented by the manufacturers thereof respecting it being that, in making entries in the books, any error committed might be easily corrected and without apparent disclosure of the change by the use of a simple chemical preparation, thus permitting the bookkeeper to keep a neat set of books. The matter of the use of ledger paper we deem only important as bearing on the condition of the check in question when it was presented by Bliss to the paying teller of the respondent for payment.

[2] The claim made by the respondent and the view adopted by the trial court was that, as to this raised check for $5,500, the evidence presented the simple case of a forgery perpetrated by Bliss to which is to be applied the well-settled rule that, as between a bank and its customers, the payment of forged or altered checks by the bank is made at its peril and cannot be charged against the depositor's account. This, of course, is the general rule, and it is applied stringently in cases of simple forgery which involve no other elements than that the purported check of the depositor which was paid was a forged one. But this rule is not applied unqualifiedly. It has its limitations and exceptions, as general rules usually have, and is modified to the extent that, when some negligent act on the part of the customer has contributed to the payment by the bank, or the facts in a particular case surrounding the forgery of a check and its presentation and payment are of such character as call for the application thereto of some general principle of law or equity, they may be relied on by the bank as an estoppel against the customer precluding him from denying the correctness of the payment.

While negligence of the respondent with reference to this check now under consideration is asserted here by the appellant bank as one of the grounds estopping respondent from questioning the correctness of its payment, we do not find it necessary to discuss that matter, because we are satisfied that, under the facts in the case to which special reference will be made, the appellant is entitled to invoke a general principle of law with respect to agency which, in our opinion, fully sustains its defense that respondent is estopped from claiming that appellant was not justified in the payment of the check. Our attention has not been directed by counsel on either side to any case presenting a similarity of facts to those presented here. But there are principles of law which in their scope have been made applicable in cases which, while not identical as to facts, yet are sufficiently analogous to make the doctrine therein laid down applicable here.

[3] It is the general doctrine of the law, as it is our statutory rule, that a principal is liable to third parties, not only for the negligence of its agent in the transaction of the business of the agency, but likewise for the frauds, torts, or other wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as part of the transaction of such business. Story on Agency, § 452; Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 65; Civ. Code, § 2338. After declaring this to be the rule, Story says: "In all such cases the rule applies respondeat superior, and it is founded upon public policy and convenience, for in no other way could there be any safety to third parties in dealings either directly with the principal or indirectly through the instrumentality of agents. In every such case the principal holds out the agent as competent and fitted to be trusted, and thereby, in effect, he warrants his fidelity and good conduct in all matters within the scope of his agency." Within the rule thus laid down, we think this case, under the facts proven, is brought.

[4] In discussing the application of this rule under the facts here, it is conceded, of course, that the check in favor of "A. Merle Co.," when it was signed by Burger, as filled out by Bliss, was a completed check, and that the only duty then with respect to it devolving upon Bliss was to send it to the payee. It may be further conceded that, if the only relation which existed between respondent and Bliss was for the latter to write out checks and transmit them to the payees, and simply by reason of an opportunity to do so he "raised" one of them and made it payable to bearer and presented it to appellant who paid it, such a payment would be at the loss of the bank. But this was not the only relation of Bliss to the respondent. He was its agent, intrusted not only with the duty of filling out checks in his handwriting and presenting them to Burger for signature and transmitting them to the payees thereof, but was, in addition thereto, intrusted by the respondent with the duty of filling out and presenting and having cashed at the appellant bank checks signed by the respondent and payable to "cash" or "bearer," or payable to the order of Dickinson. This duty had been performed by Bliss for years, and the cashing of such checks by Hooper, the paying teller of the appellant, when presented by Bliss, had been a frequent and usual thing. Of course the preparation and presentation to appellant for payment by Bliss of checks which were valid and unaltered checks of respondent, payable to "cash" or "bearer" or indorsed to Dickinson, were acts within the scope of and in the direct course of his employment. And, while it is true that, as to the presenting of forged or altered checks, Bliss was acting without the scope of his authority which authorized him to present only valid checks, still, as far as the appellant bank is concerned, Bliss, in the preparation and presentation of this altered check, was acting within the direct scope and course of his employment which consisted in preparing and presenting checks of respondent payable to "cash" or "bearer," or to the order of Dickinson for payment by it.

There was nothing about the check in question to awake any suspicion in the mind of the paying teller of the bank; there was no alteration apparent on the face of the check; there was nothing whereby any negligence on his part can be attributed to the bank. The signature of Burger to the check was genuine; the body of the check was in the familiar handwriting of Bliss who was accustomed to fill out the checks of respondent; he had been for years intrusted by the respondent with the duty of presenting just such checks for payment as was here innocently paid by the bank; and it was presented in the direct course of his employment under the implied guaranty of respondent that, as their agent for the purpose of presenting such checks and obtaining payment, Bliss was faithful and honest.

In the application of the rule we have been considering, it is of no consequence that the check here in question presented by Bliss was in fact a forgery on his part. The rule is based on the fact that, as to the particular transaction, the agent had exceeded his authority, actual or apparent. Whether in doing so the agent has been guilty of a breach of faith with his principal, or has committed a crime, is of no controlling moment as affecting the responsibility of the principal to third persons injured thereby. It is enough to fix the responsibility of the principal in behalf of an innocent third party if the agent, though acting criminally, was nevertheless in perpetrating a fraud thereby on said third party acting within the course of his employment.

So in the present case, while Bliss committed forgery in altering the check and made this forgery the means of perpetrating a fraud upon the bank, still as there was nothing on the face, or in the appearance, of the check to raise suspicion as to its validity, and it was the duty of Bliss, as the accredited agent of the respondent, to prepare and present for payment by the appellant bank checks filled out in his own handwriting signed by Burger and payable to "bearer," and the one in question was in all apparent respects such a check as in the direct course of his employment Bliss was authorized to present for payment, the loss for his fraud should fall upon the respondent and not upon the bank.

While, as we have said, there are no cases which have involved the precise facts presented here, there are cases quite analogous to it, and between which and this there can be no distinction in the application of the principle discussed.

In London Life Insurance Co. v. The Molsons Bank, 5 Ontario L. R., p. 407, plaintiff sued to recover from the defendant bank moneys which the latter had paid out and charged to the account of plaintiff; it being alleged that the indorsements thereon by the persons in whose favor plaintiff had drawn checks in favor of defendant were forged. It appears that one Niblock had been for several years agent of plaintiff in Ottawa, and had sent on to the home office of plaintiff in London a number of applications for life insurance, some genuine and some forged, and policies thereon were issued by the plaintiff. Niblock subsequently notified the plaintiff of the death of several beneficiaries named and forwarded to it proofs of loss; the signatures thereto being forged by him. Plaintiff sent checks to Niblock drawn on the defendant bank and payable to the claimants or supposed claimants or their order. With respect to the checks sent for such purpose, it was the duty of Niblock to deliver them to the persons in whose favor they were drawn and obtain a discharge of the claims under the policies. When the checks, payment of which was involved in this suit, were received by Niblock, he forged the indorsements of the payees' names, adding to these indorsements in some instances his own signature following the word "Witness," presented them to the defendant bank for payment, and they were paid. Numbers of checks for valid claims had been theretofore sent to Niblock, and he was in the habit of certifying to the bank the genuineness of the payees in payment of their claims of which, respecting a number of such checks, plaintiff had notice.

In the cited case, after a discussion in which it was pointed out that no distinction could be drawn between the checks involved in the suit upon which the name of Niblock was indorsed and those upon which it was not—all the indorsements of the payees being forged by him—it was said: "Assuming this view to be correct, are the plaintiffs affected by what was done by Niblock, so as to preclude them from disputing the right of the defendants to pay the checks and charge the amounts paid to the plaintiff's account? In my opinion they are. * * * It was not shown that the practice of Niblock so certifying was exceptional in these particular cases, and the fair inference is, I think, that he did this throughout the period of his agency. * * * It would, as it seems to me, be a startling thing, at all events to business men, if it were to be held that a banker paying the checks of his customer under circumstances such as existed in this case should be bound to suffer the loss occasioned by the fraud committed by the person whom the customer had intrusted with the powers and duties which were intrusted to Niblock. I am not, I think, required to so decide, but am warranted in holding that the loss must fall, where, in my opinion, in justice it ought to fall—upon the plaintiffs."

In Dougherty v. Wells Fargo & Co., 7 Nev. 368, the plaintiff delivered to the agent of the defendant an old certificate of deposit issued by the defendant for the purpose of having it sent to San Francisco for renewal. The agent, instead of getting it renewed, fraudulently procured it to be cashed and appropriated the proceeds. The defendant was held liable for the fraudulent act of its agent as it was done in the course of his employment. The court said: "The liability, however, in such case arises, not upon the rule that the agent acted for the principal in that particular transaction, but because he is employed by the principal in that character of business, and is so held out as the person authorized and fully to be trusted therein. When the agent in such case does an act which is apparently within the general scope of his authority, although not so in fact, if the principal were not held liable for the act, a third person, who had reason to believe that the agent was reliable and possessed authority in the particular matter from the general character of his employment, might suffer loss; hence the law holds the principal liable upon the ground that he, rather than a third person equally innocent, should suffer."

Champion Ice Mfg. Co., etc., v. American Bonding & Trust Co., 115 Ky. 863, 75 S. W. 197, 103 Am. St. Rep. 356, discloses that defendant had executed an indemnity bond to plaintiff against loss from dishonesty or fraud on the part of its bookkeeper, Weitkamp by name, and plaintiff sued to recover for loss sustained on certain of its checks fraudulently raised by the bookkeeper and paid by its bank. Weitkamp's duties with respect to the plaintiff in that case corresponded to those of Bliss, and his scheme of dishonesty was similar. The weekly pay roll of the company was furnished to Weitkamp, and his duty was to make out the checks payable therefor to himself, have them signed by the proper officer of the company, and take them to the bank—the First National Bank of Covington—to be cashed. During the course of this employment, after the checks had been so drawn, signed, and returned to him, Weitkamp raised a number of them, cashed them at the bank, and left for parts unknown. One of the claims of the defendant Bonding Company was that the Covington bank was liable to the plaintiff for the sums obtained by Weitkamp on the altered checks, and hence the plaintiff had no cause of action against it, the defendant Bonding Company. In disposing of this claim the court said: "We do not so understand the law. * * * We may, for the purposes of this case, even admit the rule to be that a bank, in paying a fraudulent or altered check, does so at its peril, and at its own loss, but we think the facts of this case present an exception to this rule. It was known to the bank's officers that Weitkamp was the bookkeeper and trusted agent of appellant, and that he was required to fill up and cash its checks, though without authority to sign them in his own name or that of his employer. In the course of their business relations with the appellant, its officers, and agents, the bank officers must be presumed to have become acquainted with their handwriting and that of Weitkamp, and therefore any change of the amount of a check from appellant, appearing in the handwriting of Weitkamp, would have excited neither alarm nor suspicion in their mind, as such alteration or change would have been within the apparent scope of Weitkamp's authority; and the payment by the bank of any check altered by him, under such circumstances, would not impose any liability on the bank to reimburse appellant for the amount thereof. It is unnecessary, therefore, to determine what the liability of the bank to appellant would have been under other circumstances." It is claimed by respondent that this language of the Kentucky court is dictum. We are not prepared to agree with this claim. It was made a point in the case by the Bonding Company, and the court held squarely that, under the facts, no liability on the part of the bank attached as the preparation and presentation of such checks to it was within the apparent scope of Weitkamp's authority. The court, it is true, further holds that, even if the bank were liable for the reimbursement to the plaintiff on these checks, this would not affect its right of action against it on the bond. We think, however, that this is but an additional reason for holding it liable upon its bond. But, if it be conceded to be dictum, we are satisfied that a correct principle of law was declared.

There is class of cases where telegraph operators have used the wires intrusted to their care in sending fraudulent messages to third parties for the payment of money under which the operators or some one in league with them have obtained its payment.

In such cases the companies have been held liable for the fraudulent acts of their agents. We see no reason why the principle of these decisions is not applicable here. Among the cases are the Bank of California v. Western Union Tel. Co., 52 Cal. 282; Pac. Tel. & Cable Co. v. Bank of Palo Alto, 109 Fed. 369, 48 C. C. A. 413, 54 L. R. A. 711; McCord v. Telegraph Co., 39 Minn. 181, 39 N. W. 315, 1 L. R. A. 143, 12 Am. St. Rep. 636. In all these cases the messages were forged by the agents, and their acts constituted a crime. In the case cited from the Federal Reporter, Minkler, the operator of the telegraph company, conspired with one Barclay to cheat the defendant bank, and to that end Minkler sent a forged telegraphic order purporting to come from a bank in San Francisco to the defendant bank to pay one H. L. Cator $840. Barclay presented himself at the defendant bank, represented that he was Cator, and was paid the money. The court held the telegraph company liable, and, after citing several telegraph cases in which a like conclusion was reached, said: "If either the agent or the operator should manufacture telegrams and send them over the company's lines, of the character of the telegram sent in the present case, they would be acting outside of the scope of their authority. But both would be acting in direct course of their employment, viz., transmitting messages over the company's lines. The company is held liable because it has placed its agent and operator in charge of its appliances and instruments for the transmission of dispatches over its lines, and authorized them to use the same. * * * In holding the telegraph company for the wrongful, tortious, and criminal acts of Minkler, we are not called upon to make any departure from the established principles of law. No additional or independent reasoning is required to show that the rule as announced in the telegraph cases is sound and just. Its foundation is based on the principle, often applied by the courts in a great variety of cases, that, if one of two innocent persons must suffer loss by the act of a third, he who put it in the power of the third person to do such act should be compelled to sustain the loss occasioned by its commission."

While in these telegraph cases the courts have sustained the liability of the companies under the broad equitable principle that, where one of two innocent parties must suffer from the tortious conduct of a third party, he who put it in the power of the third party to do the wrong must bear the consequence of the act, the specific principle extracted, and upon which liability of the company is based, is that, though the act of the agent was criminal and necessarily outside the scope of his authority, still the sending of dispatches of a character similar to those forged was in the direct course of the employment of the agent; that intrusting him with the duty of sending messages was a guaranty to the receiver thereof that the agent was faithful and honest; that, whether an agent was unfaithful in the discharge of his duties, or there were circumstances making his action in sending a particular message unauthorized or criminal, the receiver of the message could not know and it would be an impracticable and unreasonable rule to require him to investigate the honesty or integrity of the agent or his fidelity in performing his duty before acting upon the message.

We perceive no reason why the principle applied in the telegraph cases is not equally applicable here. Repeating in connection with these cases what we have said elsewhere, Bliss had been intrusted by respondent with the duty of filling out its checks in his own handwriting and payable to bearer, and, after signature by Burger, presenting them to the paying teller of the appellant bank for payment. This was a usual thing for Bliss to do, and by permitting it the plaintiff guaranteed the integrity and honesty of Bliss, and that he would not present for payment to the appellant bank other than valid checks of the respondent. Plaintiff intrusted him with the particular check now under consideration for a special purpose, and while in his possession he altered it. But, when presented for payment by him to the bank, it was still in his handwriting, payable to bearer, as was frequently the case when checks were presented by him, and bore the genuine signature of Burger. There was nothing about the check to awake any suspicion on the part of the bank as to its genuineness. The alteration of it by Bliss while it was in his possession for the particular purpose for which it was intrusted to him was a crime, and its presentation and payment as altered a fraud upon defendant bank, still, as the preparation and presentation of checks such as this one purported to be was in the direct course of the employment of Bliss, under the principle of the telegraph cases we have discussed, as well as the others cited, the respondent, whose agent Bliss was, should bear the loss from his fraudulent conduct, and not the appellant bank.

There is no such particular relation existing between a bank and its customers that denies the application of the general rules of agency, which apply in other relations. The commercial business of to-day is largely done through the medium of banks and the free use of checks and other commercial paper. It is equally the fact that business in its wider sense is conducted principally by corporations necessarily acting through agents in relation to their depository banks, as well as the rest of the business world, and we are unable to perceive why, when an agent of a customer of a bank, while acting in the course of the employment with which the customer has intrusted him, commits a fraud upon the bank, the same rule of responsibility for the fraudulent conduct of the agent under such circumstances should not apply, as it applies to other relations between parties where the acts of the agent in the course of his employment are involved. In support of their claim that, under the facts here, the loss for the fraud of Bliss respecting this check must be borne by the appellant bank, counsel for respondent rely on Hall v. Fuller, 5 Barn. & C. 750; Belknap et al. v. National Bank of North America, 100 Mass. 376, 97 Am. Dec. 105; Crawford v. West Side Bank, 100 N. Y. 50, 2 N. E. 881, 53 Am. Rep. 152; Chicago Savings Bank v. Block, 126 Ill. App. 128; and Walsh v. Hunt, 120 Cal. 46, 52 Pac. 115, 39 L. R. A. 697.

But these cases have no application to the point now under consideration. The point decided in them had relation to the asserted negligence of the principal, based on special facts surrounding the relation of principal and agent in the matter of the preparation or handling of checks and the duties of the agent respecting them. They presented no facts under which the rule of liability of the principal for the acts of the agent done in the direct course of his employment could arise, and no such rule was considered. As an illustration, taking the case of Belknap et al. v. National Bank of North America, supra, as approaching in its facts nearer the case at bar than any other: The plaintiffs, who were commission merchants, signed a number of blank checks on the defendant, their bank, and left them with their bookkeeper to be filled out and sent by mail to customers at a distance. The bookkeeper committed this task to a clerk in the office, who, having performed it, returned the checks to the bookkeeper. When returned, the checks were drawn as directed, payable to each customer by name "or order." The bookkeeper examined the checks and placed them in envelopes addressed to the various payees and delivered the letters to the same clerk who had filled in the checks. Subsequently the clerk abstracted some of the checks from the envelopes, drew a line through the words "or order," and wrote in the words "or bearer." These checks were presented to the bank and paid, but who presented them does not appear. The trial court left it to the jury to determine whether, under the evidence, it was negligence on the part of the plaintiff to issue the particular checks there in question with a blank space after the name of the payee and before "or order," which permitted the insertion of the words "or bearer" by the clerk, or whether it was negligence on the part of plaintiff to intrust the mailing of the letters to the clerk who had drawn the checks inclosed therein. It was held by the appellate court that there was nothing in the evidence warranting the instructions. No question was involved in that case of the responsibility of the principal for the fraudulent act of the clerk because committed in the course of his employment. On the contrary, it was stated in the opinion that "plaintiff frequently drew checks payable to 'notes payable or order,' and in all such cases some one of the plaintiffs personally or their bookkeeper received the money from the bank," which, of course, precluded the bank from asserting that the checks were paid by it in the course of the employment of the clerk in drawing and presenting for payment checks in all respects similarly drawn. Nor is our own case of Walsh v. Hunt, supra, at all in point on this matter. The facts in that case did not call for the application of the doctrine of agency we have been discussing. As an authority it may have some bearing on the question of asserted negligence of respondent in signing the other check in question for $400 with blank spaces left therein and subsequently filled in by Bliss. Aside from this it could have no application.

Now, as to this second check. The principle which we determine is applicable as to the larger check is equally applicable to this second check. While it is further claimed by appellant that the plaintiff was negligent in drawing it with spaces unfilled and thus making the matter of its alteration simple, and for that reason should sustain the loss of its payment, there is no occasion to consider that point. As with the larger check, this smaller one was filled out in the handwriting of Bliss, and bore the genuine signature of Burger and was payable to bearer. There was nothing on its face to indicate that it was in any respect different from checks which, as similarly drawn, Bliss was authorized by respondent to fill out, and, when signed by respondent, present for payment and have cashed at the bank. The drawing of this check and its presentation for payment were acts done by Bliss in the direct course of his employment as agent of respondent, and under such circumstances respondent is estopped from asserting that the loss thereof should be cast upon the bank. Such loss as to these two altered checks, on both principle and authority, must rest, where in fairness it should rest, upon the respondent.

The order appealed from is reversed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by H. T. Meloy against the Imperial Land Company. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Watkins & Blodgett, for appellant. Valentine & Newby, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. A controversy having arisen between the copartnership of Miller and Meloy (under whom plaintiff claims as assignee) and the defendant Imperial Land Company, an agreement was entered into for the submission of such controversy to arbitration. This action was instituted to recover the sums of $767.50 and $2,667.50, alleged to have been found by the arbitrators to be due from the defendant. A second count, based on the same cause of action embodied in the arbitration, was dismissed upon motion of the plaintiff.

[1] The agreement for arbitration did not comply with the terms of section 1283 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was valid, however, as a stipulation for a common-law arbitration. Kreiss v. Hotaling, 96 Cal. 617, 31 Pac. 740. It provided that E. A. Meserve, Ben S. Hunter, and W. H. Anderson should have the right and power "to take such evidence as they may deem necessary or advisable pertaining to the question herein involved, and to render a statement of the amount of money due to the parties to this agreement from each other." The parties agreed to pay "such sums of money as may be found to be due one from the other within thirty days from receipt of a statement signed by a majority of the above-named arbitrators showing said amount." It was further agreed "that the hearing of evidence under this agreement to arbitrate shall take place at 9:30 a. m. on March 23, 1909, at the office of W. H. Anderson." The complaint alleges that all the parties met at the stipulated time and place, that evidence was introduced on behalf of plaintiff and defendant, "and the matter was then submitted to the arbitrators for their consideration and decision." It is alleged that on May 3, 1909, a majority of the arbitrators, to wit, Hunter and Anderson, found to be due from defendant to plaintiff the sums demanded in the complaint; that a written statement, showing such amounts to be due, signed by said arbitrators, was delivered to defendant, but the latter, although more than 30 days have elapsed, refuses to pay any part of said sums. The defendant denied, among other things, that the matter referred to in the agreement was submitted to the arbitrators for their consideration or decision on the 23d day of March, 1909, or at any other time. The findings of the court include one in favor of this denial, and judgment went for the defendant.

Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[2] The finding that the matter in controversy was never submitted to the arbitrators for decision in and of itself necessitated a judgment in favor of the defendant. This is, in effect, conceded by the appellant. The parties to an arbitration have a right to introduce evidence in support of their claims. 3 Cyc. 644. To decide a matter before the evidence thereon, and the matter itself, have been submitted to the arbitrators for decision, is a plain denial of this right. If, then, the finding under discussion is sustained by the evidence, it is unnecessary to consider whether other findings are fairly open to attack.

[3] On the issue of the submission of the matter to the arbitrators, the evidence is conflicting, and the finding of the court below cannot be set aside on appeal. No doubt Mr. Hunter and Mr. Anderson, in attempting to make an award, were acting in the bona fide belief that the question in dispute had been submitted to them and their associate. But Mr. Meserve, the third arbitrator, took a contrary view, and his testimony was such as to justify the court in finding that his understanding of the situation was the correct one. Mr. Hunter was the attorney for plaintiff, while Mr. Meserve represented the defendant. Mr. Meserve testified that a hearing before the three arbitrators took place on March 23, 1909, as agreed. Each party offered testimony. Mr. Anderson, who was presiding, "asked if that was all." Mr. Hunter answered in the affirmative. Mr. Meserve also said "Yes," but immediately thereafter, upon the suggestion of an officer of the defendant, said to Mr. Anderson that the defendant desired an opportunity to offer in evidence certain letters material to its case. He asked if there would be any objection to getting this correspondence together. Mr. Anderson said that he could see no objection, and somebody (presumably on behalf of plaintiff) said: "If the defendant offers more evidence, we are going to offer more evidence." The meeting then broke up, and no time for reconvening was ever fixed, nor did the three arbitrators meet again, or give the defendant notice of a time at which it could offer any further evidence. This version was supported by another witness. While the recollection of other persons present did not agree with that of Mr. Meserve, we have the ordinary case of a conflict of testimony which we must, in accordance with long-established rules, regard as conclusively settled by the finding of the trial court.

The appellant's only points being those based on the alleged insufficiency of evidence, the conclusions above stated dispose of the appeal from the order denying a new trial. The appeal from the judgment cannot be considered, as it was taken more than seven months after the entry of the judgment.

The appeal from the judgment is dismissed. The order denying the motion for new trial is affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. R. Hervey, Judge.

Action by J. M. Sewell against R. R. Christie and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, certain of the defendants appeal. Reversed.

Hatch & Lloyd and Davis, Demp & Post (H. M. Barstow, of counsel), for appellants. Hannon & McCormick, Wm. J. Variel, F. A. Knight, S. G. Barker, and Roland G. Swaffield, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. In an action to recover damages for fraudulent misrepresentations in the matter of the sale of 7,000 shares of stock of the National Gold Dredging Company, plaintiff had judgment against defendants Christie and Price for $7,000; a nonsuit having been granted as to defendant Marsh. Both defendants gave notice of intention to move for a new trial, but the bill of exceptions appears to be a bill on behalf of Price only.

[1] Christie appealed from the judgment, but has filed no brief in this court and did not appear at the calling of the case for oral argument. It will therefore be unnecessary to consider his appeal. Defendant Price appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Substantially the complaint alleged as follows: Plaintiff was a resident of the city of Independence, state of Missouri, and the defendants were residents of the city of Long Beach, Cal. Plaintiff was a cousin of Christie, and relied absolutely on the statements and representations made to him by Christie and Price. Early in April, 1908, plaintiff was at Long Beach, and Christie and Price stated to him that they, Marsh, and one Dubois were large holders of the National Gold Dredging Company, a corporation organized for the purpose of placer mining by extracting placer gold from the sands and gravels of beds of rivers by means of a suction dredger; that the company owned certain mining grounds for such purposes, viz., 11 miles in length of the American river, and had there one of said dredgers and appliances; that the work of mining there had been in operation for two weeks; that Price had had the gravels and sands of the river tested with drilling appliances, and had ascertained that said territory was rich in placer gold; and that they thought so well of it that they were endeavoring to purchase an additional block of stock. Plaintiff within a few days returned to his home in Missouri. The defendants, knowing of the reliance by plaintiff on said statements and that he specially relied on Christie, conspired to cheat and defraud him by persuading him to purchase a large block of stock upon which they jointly had an option to purchase, and in pursuance of such conspiracy sent to him certain letters and telegrams signed by Christie alone. In one of these letters, sent April 27, 1908, it was stated: "The dredger has commenced operations, and the stock jumped to $1.25, and the next day was taken off the market. I think it will be worth from $2.00 to perhaps $5.00 in 60 days. Mr. Dubois says he can sell our 11 miles of the river to Portland parties for one million but it is not for sale." A telegram was sent on May 1, 1908, saying: "Dredger grounds prove fabulously rich stock worth three dollars. I believe will be ten will save five to ten thousand shares for you if you wire have sent money in forty-eight hours." On May 5, 1908, a letter was sent saying: "As I told you three of us are now interested in the option of the 50,000 shares of the dredger stock. The first offer we had was $550,000 for our ground, the next was one million and Mr. Dubois wrote last week and said he had just returned from the dredger where he met some mining men that wanted to pay us two and one half million for the property." On May 5, 1908, a telegram was sent saying: "How much dredger stock do you want at $1.00 worth $5.00." On May 6, 1908, a telegram was sent, saying: "Must send money tomorrow. Option only good to you." Plaintiff believed all these representations, and relying on them purchased from the defendants 7,000 shares of said stock, paying $7,000 therefor on May 8, 1908. He received stock that was owned by Price therefor. The representations were each and all untrue, and were known by each of the defendants to be false, and were made by said defendants to plaintiff for the purpose of inducing him to purchase the stock. He would not have purchased but for such representations. He had no opportunity of knowing and did not know of the falsity of such representations until about January 20, 1909, and on February 3, 1909, rescinded such purchase, notifying defendants in writing that he rescinded and tendering them the stock, which they refused to accept, and demanding the return of his money. He has been damaged in the sum of $7,000.

Defendant Price by his answer denied the allegations of conspiracy in the making of the representations, or that he knew that said statements, if they had been made, were false or untrue or without any foundation whatever. He also set up the defense of failure on the part of plaintiff to rescind after he had full notice of all the facts, until the stock had become valueless by reason of the destruction of the dredger of the company by a great and unusual flood.

[2] The trial court found as follows: The company was engaged in an attempt at gold placer mining on the territory mentioned, and for such purpose held 10 mining locations under the mining laws applicable thereto, and an adjoining mining location known as the Cache Rock claim, under option to purchase for the sum of $5,000; said claims occupying about 11 miles in length of the American river. It had constructed on Cache Rock claim a suction dredger for the purpose of extracting gold, and had commenced operating the same on or about April, 1908, and continued this work until about February, 1909, when by reason of a heavy storm the dredger was carried away and destroyed. During all of said time, only about one-half ounce of gold was extracted from said claims. In all other respects the representations alleged were found to be untrue. It was found that the representations alleged were all made by Christie and Price in the manner alleged, i. e., by Christie and Price orally as to those so alleged, and that Christie and Price sent to plaintiff the letters and telegrams containing the other statements. There was no finding of any conspiracy or joint intent on the part of Christie and Price to cheat or defraud plaintiff. It was found that they made the representations and sent the letters and telegrams for the purpose of inducing and persuading plaintiff to purchase a portion of the stock which Price had an option to purchase. It was found that Price knew all of said false representations to be false and untrue. It was found that Christie had no intent to deceive plaintiff, but that the statements made by him were made in a positive manner not warranted by such information as he had. It was further found that Christie relied wholly upon information received by him from Price, and that Price gave such information to Christie, with the intent that the same should be by him communicated to plaintiff, and that such representations were made by Christie to plaintiff with the knowledge of Price and with the intent on his part that plaintiff should be misled thereby and induced to purchase the stock, and that plaintiff did not know that any of Christie's statements were based on information received by him from Price or any one else. The stock never had any market value in excess of $1 per share, and was valueless at the time of the attempted rescission. All the other allegations of the complaint were found to be true.

The findings establish it as a fact, for all the purposes of this appeal, that there was no conspiracy or joint intent on the part of Christie and Price to cheat or defraud plaintiff. It is substantially found that Christie fully believed not only at the time of the purchase of the stock by plaintiff, but for a long time thereafter, that the enterprise was all he represented it to be, and that the stock would measure up in value to the various standards he set for it. The evidence, as the same is set forth in the record, clearly shows this to have been the situation. He was held liable notwithstanding his belief in the truth of his representations to plaintiff, solely on the ground that his representations were made in a positive manner not warranted by the information he had. Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 2.

It is demonstrated by the record that the only representations influencing plaintiff in the matter of the purchase of this stock were such as were contained in the letters and telegrams sent to him by his relative, Christie. It appears that plaintiff had become interested in the enterprise on his visit to California, by reason of the enthusiasm of his relative and his desire to invest to advantage, and had requested that Christie keep him informed as to any development in the matter. Both Christie and Price, with defendant Marsh, were anxious to acquire 50,000 shares of stock from Dubois in addition to the stock they already had, and as to these Price had an option in which Christie and Marsh were equally interested with him; the understanding being that each should have one-third. Both because he considered it a good thing and was anxious to obtain the money wherewith to pay his portion of the purchase price and thus be allowed to obtain a portion of the stock covered by the option, and because he was willing to have his relative Sewell share in the profits if he would take some of the stock, he sought his participation. There is absolutely nothing to indicate that Price was not just as great a believer as Christie in the enterprise. Coming to a consideration of the letters and telegrams containing the alleged representations: There is nothing to warrant a conclusion that Price was in any way a party to the sending of any of the letters, or counseled or advised in the matter of their being sent. The first one, that dated April 27th, was devoted principally to the matter of plaintiff taking some stock in an asbestos concern, and what was said as to dredging proposition was said after discussing the matter apparently prompting the letter. The important parts of this were: "Now, in regard to the dredging proposition, will say that it is getting exciting—the dredger has commenced operation and the stock jumped to 1.25 and the next day was taken off the market. I think it will be worth 2.00 and perhaps 5.00 in 60 days. Mr. Dubois says he can sell our 11 miles on the river to Portland parties, for 1,000,000, but it is not for sale." The statement as to the dredger was true. There is nothing to show that Price was responsible for any of the other statements of fact above set forth except that he told Christie that "Mr. Edwards had received word from the north not to sell any stock for less than 1.25, and the next day they notified him not to sell any more at any price," and also showed him a letter from Dubois in which the latter said that he had not the least doubt but that the property could be sold for $1,000,000. The Dubois letter was introduced in evidence. Mr. Edwards corroborated the statement as to the receipt of the letter from the north, either from Auburn or Forest Hill, saying: "Received wire from Guy Dubois this a. m. Stock jumped to 1.25 and taken off the market. Close deal with Redlands party and return balance of stock to me as soon as possible." This evidence was in no way contradicted. The remainder of the portion quoted above was simply an expression of Christie's personal opinion as to the probable value of the shares in the future. Certainly there is nothing in all this to render Price in any degree responsible to plaintiff. The only material statement in the letter of May 1st was as to offers for the property, and this was clearly based by Christie on the letter from Dubois already referred to, which he had read. The only material statement in the letter of May 5th is one that "the stock has gone out of sight," with the further statement that he (Christie) would not take $5 for his dredger stock, but that he would try to save plaintiff 5,000 shares if his money was sent in time. As to all these letters, no connection on the part of Price is shown, nor is there ground for any reasonable inference that they were induced by anything Price may have said to Christie, with the intent that he should communicate the same to plaintiff, or that Price did not fully believe that such statements as he did make to Christie were true. As to the telegrams, the only ones which may be claimed to contain representations of fact are those of May 1st and May 5th. The first of these contained the statement: "Dredger grounds prove fabulously rich. Stock worth three dollars." The second was a query as to how much dredger stock he wanted at $1, "worth five." This "worth five" was simply an expression of opinion by Christie, based on the Dubois letter which he had read. The statement that the dredger grounds prove fabulously rich and that the stock was worth $3 was also based by Christie on the same letter. The testimony fairly read is not sufficient to support a conclusion that Price had anything to do with the sending of either of these telegrams, or even that he showed the Dubois letter to Christie or talked over the matter referred to therein, with the intent that he should communicate the same to plaintiff. The testimony is absolutely wanting in foundation for a conclusion that Price did not fully believe that everything he said to Christie in regard to the matters referred to was true.

It should be said that it appears from the adjustment statement made August 5, 1908, between Christie, Price, and Marsh, introduced in evidence by plaintiff, that the 7,000 shares of stock sold to plaintiff were charged to Christie's one-third of the 50,000 shares subsequently acquired under the option, and he (Christie) was credited with the purchase price therefor, less $2,000 divided among the three as "profits" on the sale. According to the findings, the stock which the defendants were seeking to sell to plaintiff was a portion of this option stock, and the evidence shows that the only part played in the transaction by stock belonging to Price individually was that the same was delivered to plaintiff on the sale, as a loan from Price to Christie, pending the actual acquirement of the option stock.

From what we have said, it is apparent that our conclusion is that the findings of fact are not sufficiently supported in so far as they in effect state that Price joined or aided in the mailing or sending of any of the letters, or either of the two telegrams to which we have specially referred, viz., those of May 1st and May 5th, or in making any of the representations contained in said letters or telegrams; or that Price knew that any statement made by him to Christie in regard to any of such matters was false or untrue or without any foundation in fact; or that Price made any statement either to plaintiff or to Christie in such matters for the purpose of misleading or deceiving the plaintiff.

[3] We do not see how it can be claimed that these findings are not essential to the judgment against Price. Both by the complaint and by the findings Price's liability is based wholly on his alleged complicity in the making of false representations for the purpose of inducing the purchase of the stock. That in some way he should have joined in the making of the representations is, of course, essential to any liability on his part. The findings to the effect that he actually participated or aided and abetted in the sending of the letters and telegrams are not sustained by the evidence. This leaves the judgment against him to depend solely on the finding that he made the statements to Christie with the intent that the same should be by Christie communicated to plaintiff. Passing all other claims made by appellant in regard to this finding there is not sufficient evidence to support the further conclusion upon which he is in fact held liable, viz., that he made the statements to Christie, not believing them to be true, but believing them to be false, and with the intent to deceive. It is nowhere found as to him, as it is to Christie, that he made his statements in a positive manner not warranted by his information. One or the other of these conclusions is absolutely essential to his liability.

As to the defendant Price the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

TIDEWATER SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. JORDAN, Secretary of State. (S. F. 6,213.)

CORPORATIONS (§ 298*) — INDEBTEDNESS — BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

Where a corporation sought to incur a bonded indebtedness in accordance with Civ. Code, § 359, subd. 5, providing that it may create such indebtedness by resolution adopted by the unanimous vote of its board of directors or trustees at a regular meeting, and the corporate board consisted of thirteen directors, the unanimous vote of seven directors who were the only ones present at the meeting is sufficient to authorize the creation of the indebtedness; Civ. Code, § 308, providing that a majority of directors is a sufficient number to form a board for the transaction of business, and the former section referring to the board as such, and not to the individual directors or trustees.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1292-1317, 1319; Dec. Dig. § 298.*]

In Bank. Petition by the Tidewater Southern Railway Company for mandamus directed to Frank C. Jordan, as Secretary of State. Writ issued.

Arthur L. Levinsky, J. G. De Forest, and Heller, Powers & Ehrman, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Malcolm C. Glenn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Mandamus. The petitioner, a railroad corporation, institutes an original proceeding in this court to compel the Secretary of State to file in his office a certified copy of a certificate of creation of bonded indebtedness by petitioner. The facts are undisputed, the only return to the alternative writ heretofore issued being in the form of a demurrer for want of facts. The respondent urges but one ground in support of his refusal to file the certificate, and it is conceded that, unless this ground be well taken, the petitioner is entitled to the relief sought.

The proceedings for creating a bonded indebtedness were taken under subdivision 5 of section 359 of the Civil Code. That subdivision provides that any corporation desiring to create a bonded indebtedness may, in lieu of calling and holding a stockholders' meeting as provided in earlier subdivisions, create such indebtedness "by a resolution adopted by the unanimous vote of its board of directors or trustees at a regular meeting or at a special meeting called for that purpose, and approved by the written assent or assents of the stockholders holding two-thirds of the subscribed or issued capital stock. * * *" The certificate here involved shows that the petitioner has thirteen directors, and that at a regular meeting of the board of directors, attended by only seven directors, all of those present concurred in adopting a resolution for the creation of a bonded indebtedness. Seven constitutes a quorum of the board. The only question is whether this was a compliance with the Code provision above quoted; the respondent taking the position that the requirement that the resolution be adopted "by the unanimous vote of its board of directors" can be satisfied only by the affirmative votes of the thirteen directors, all of whom must be present at the meeting. We entertain no doubt of the soundness of petitioner's contention that the vote of the seven who attended the meeting was all that was required. The statute does not demand the "unanimous vote of all the directors," nor the "unanimous vote of all the members of the board." What is called for is the "unanimous vote of the board." The provision looks to the body constituting a board of directors, rather than to the individuals of whom that board is composed. Section 308 of the Civil Code provides that "a majority of the directors is a sufficient number to form a board for the transaction of business. * * *" Accordingly, the seven directors, duly assembled in regular meeting, constituted the board of directors, and a resolution adopted by the affirmative votes of all such directors was "adopted by the unanimous vote of the board of directors." This view does not lack the support of authority. The case of McLane v. P. & S. V. R. R. Co., 66 Cal. 606, 6 Pac. 748, relied on by petitioner, seems, on a careful reading, not to be precisely in point. But other decisions cited fully sustain the proposition. In Coxon v. Inhabitants of the City of Trenton, 78 N. J. Law, 26, 73 Atl. 253, the court, in dealing with an ordinance which, by virtue of a statute, was required to be "unanimously adopted by the said board of health," held that where the resolution was adopted by a board legally constituted, all present voting and none dissenting, the statute had been complied with. The opinion distinguishes the case presented (which is like the one at bar) from that of a statute requiring the "unanimous vote of all the members of the council." The language last quoted plainly requires the assent of every member of the board. Crickenberger v. Westfield, 71 N. J. Law, 467, 58 Atl. 1097.

The Code of Civil Procedure of New York (section 191) withholds the absolute right of appeal from the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court to the Court of Appeals "when the decision of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court is unanimous." Five justices compose the Appellate Division, but four constitute a quorum. Where, in hearing an appeal, only four sat, and all four concurred in an affirmance, it was held that the decision was unanimous, within the meaning of the Code section. Harroun v. B.

E. L. Co., 152 N. Y. 212, 46 N. E. 291, 38 L. R. A. 615. Similar in principle are the decisions holding that provisions requiring the vote of "two-thirds of each house," or the like, mean two-thirds of the members present and constituting a quorum. State v. McBride, 4 Mo. 303, 29 Am. Dec. 636; Green v. Weller, 32 Miss. 650; Southworth v. R. R. Co., 2 Mich. 287; Warnock v. Lafayette, 4 La. Ann. 419. The construction thus indicated gives the requirement of unanimity the effect of making it impossible for a majority of a mere quorum, which might be a minority of the entire membership, to adopt the resolution, as such minority might do in the absence of any restriction of this nature. St. A. O. A. v. Milwaukee County, 107 Wis. 80, 82 N. W. 704; Gumaer v. C. C. T. T. & M. Co., 40 Colo. 1, 90 Pac. 81, 122 Am. St. Rep. 1024, 13 Ann. Cas. 781. Thus read, the provision is reasonable and in harmony with the apparent purposes of the statute. On the other hand, the interpretation urged by the respondent might block or delay the transaction of business of great importance to the stockholders if, on account of illness or for any other reason, it became impossible to secure the attendance of any one member of the board.

It is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. R. Hervey, Judge.

Action by the Haynes Automobile Company against the Woodill Auto Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Schmidt & Riggins, for appellant. Wm. Fleet Palmer, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff sued for $3,092.59 alleged to be due from defendant for automobiles and attachments sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant. The latter asserted that the plaintiff was indebted to it. Both litigants furnished bills of particulars of their respective claims, and by written stipulation it was agreed that defendant's bill of particulars should be considered as if pleaded by defendant as a counterclaim. The court found that the balance due plaintiff upon all of the accounts between the parties to the action was $871.16. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for vacation of judgment under section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] The sole controversy upon this appeal relates to defendant's claim of $600 as commission on the sale of a car to Ralph C. Otis. According to the findings, Otis, who was a resident of Pasadena, purchased from plaintiff for $3,000 one of the automobiles manufactured by the said Haynes Automobile Company. At the time of the purchase, Otis was in Chicago, Ill., and he ordered the car to be shipped to him at that city from plaintiff's factory in Kokomo, Ind. Afterwards he changed the order, and directed that the automobile should be sent to him at Los Angeles. It was forwarded as directed, with a provision in the waybill that it might be reshipped to Chicago at one-half rate. Payment for the vehicle was made at Kokomo. Defendant does not assert that it had anything to do with negotiating the sale, but bases a claim for compensation solely upon the contract between it and plaintiff by which the Woodill Auto Company was given the exclusive sale in Los Angeles and vicinity of the cars manufactured by plaintiff. The pertinent portion of the agreement, dated April 15, 1908, was as follows: "This agreement entered into on this date with the Haynes Automobile Company of Kokomo, Ind., and the Woodill Automobile Co. of Los Angeles, Cal., gives to the Woodill Automobile Co. the exclusive sale of Haynes cars in Los Angeles and Southern half of the state of California."

Appellant contends that, when a manufacturing corporation gives exclusive sale of its products within a given territory to another, the said manufacturer cannot deprive the agent of regular commissions by selling to one who resides within such territory, citing Garfield v. Peerless Motor Car Co., 189 Mass. 395, 75 N. E. 695; Thompson-Houston Electric Co. v. Berg, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 200, 30 S. W. 454. The cited cases do not sustain appellant's position. The former case was decided upon a contract which, interpreted in the light of trade usage, gave the agent a right to a commission on all automobiles sold to residents of his district. The appeal in this case is on the judgment roll alone, and the record does not show any finding with reference to trade usage. We must therefore look alone to the contract which gives to defendant the "exclusive sale" in its territory of cars manufactured by plaintiff. As the sale was made outside of the state of California, and as no trade usage appears to give defendant any right other than that expressed in the exact words of the agreement, we are compelled to conclude that defendant cannot recover a commission on the transaction. The Texas case cited by appellant is not in point. The contract there under consideration was quite different from the one before us in this case. The contract itself provided that, if sales were made in Texas by a special agent representing the selling company, the agent in that state should receive his commission. His claim was that he was entitled to commission "on the sales of all appellant's products to be used in the state of Texas," and commenting on this part of the contract the court said: "We think that it bears the construction contended for by the appellee, and that it reasonably appears from the dealings between the parties that appellant placed upon it the same construction, and there is no error in so much of the court's charge as gave it this construction." It will thus be seen that the meaning of the contract under discussion by the court in the Texas case was made apparent by the dealings between the parties—an element entirely absent from the case at bar.

[2] It has been held in this state that one having an exclusive agency for the sale outside of California of products manufactured here cannot recover commissions on sales made in this state to persons known by the seller as intending to sell the merchandise out of the state. That case is perfectly applicable to the matter before us here. Golden Gate Packing Co. v. Farmers' Union, 55 Cal. 606. See, also, Wyckoff v. Bishop, 115 Mich. 414, 73 N. W. 392.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 763, 764, 811*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PROVINCE OF JURY—INVASION—CHARGING ON PARTICULAR EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for rape, the court charged that it was not essential to a conviction that the testimony of the prosecutrix should be corroborated by other evidence; it being sufficient if the jury believed beyond a reasonable doubt from all the evidence that the crime charged had in fact been committed as alleged.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Held, that such instruction was not objectionable as singling out and giving special importance to the prosecutrix's testimony and as misleading the jury to understand that they were to take her testimony as true, nor as invading the province of the jury in charging on matters of fact, in violation of Const. art. 6, § 19.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 822*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REVIEW.

Instructions given must be considered as a whole, and, if as so considered, they state the law correctly so that the jury, as men of ordinary intelligence, can understand what is meant and apply it to the facts, the charge will be deemed correct.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 730*)—APPEAL—DISTRICT ATTORNEY—MISCONDUCT.

Alleged misconduct of the district attorney in asking improper questions will not be deemed prejudicial where the objections to the questions were promptly sustained and the court fully instructed the jury not to consider any matter which was not in evidence before them.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

Where, in a prosecution for rape, there was evidence that defendant had arranged to have prosecutrix examined by physicians, and also the purpose for which she was examined, the result of which was favorable to him, defendant was not prejudiced by evidence as to just what treatment prosecutrix underwent at the time she was examined at the hospital.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

D. H. Akey was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Peyton H. Moore and Campbell & Moore, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones and George Beebe, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

LORIGAN, J. Defendant was charged with and convicted of the crime of rape committed on one Lutie Valentine. Judgment of imprisonment followed, and this appeal is from the judgment. The judgment was reversed by the District Court of Appeal for the Second Appellate District, and a further hearing granted on application of the respondent by this court.

[1] The reversal by the District Court of Appeal was based on the conclusion that the trial court erred in giving the following instruction: "The court further instructs the jury that it is not essential to a conviction in this case that the testimony of the prosecutrix, Lutie Valentine, should be corroborated by other evidence. It is sufficient if you believe beyond a reasonable doubt from all the evidence in the case that the crime charged has in fact been committed as alleged." It was held by the District Court that by this instruction the trial court invaded the province of the jury in charging with respect to matters of fact, contrary to section 19, art. 6, of the Constitution of this state. In that respect the specific point relied upon by appellant and sustained by the District Court was that the trial court singled out and gave special importance in the instruction to the testimony of the prosecuting witness, and in effect the jury was instructed by the court, or at least the instruction was susceptible of being so understood by the jury, that they were to take the testimony of the prosecutrix, Lutie Valentine, as being true, and as sufficiently establishing the guilt of the defendant. We cannot agree with either this claim of appellant or the conclusion of the District Court with respect to this instruction.

Particular reliance for its support is based upon the first sentence of the instruction. While we perceive nothing in this sentence which in itself is open to any valid criticism, it is to be borne in mind that whether a jury has been correctly instructed is not to be determined from a consideration of parts of an instruction, or from particular instructions, but the entire charge of the court must be considered.

[2] This is the general rule, and if, when so considered as a whole, the charge correctly states the law so that the jury, as men of ordinary intelligence, can understand what is meant and apply it to the facts, no prejudice is suffered by defendant. People v. Weber, 149 Cal. 325, 86 Pac. 671; People v. Besold, 154 Cal. 363, 97 Pac. 871; People v. Argentos, 156 Cal. 720, 106 Pac. 65.

Now as to the entire instruction. It is a rule of evidence in this state that, in a prosecution for rape, the defendant may be convicted upon the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecuting witness. People v. Mayes, 66 Cal. 597, 6 Pac. 691, 56 Am. Rep. 126; People v. Stewart, 90 Cal. 212, 27 Pac. 200; People v. Gardner, 98 Cal. 127, 32 Pac. 880. It was proper, therefore, for the court to instruct the jury as to this rule and its application, and this was evidently all that the court did. There was no singling out of the testimony of the prosecuting witness with a view of giving it undue prominence before the jury. The rule to be declared is addressed solely to the testimony of the prosecuting witness, and necessarily the fact that she has testified must be stated when the rule is declared. Nor is there in the instruction anything from which the jury would be at all warranted in understanding that the court was stating to them that the prosecuting witness had testified in such a manner that the jury should accept her testimony as true and as sufficiently establishing the guilt of the defendant.

One of the controlling features in determining the character of an instruction is the purpose and object of the court in giving it. Here the sole purpose and object clearly was to inform the jury, as it is always proper in this class of cases to do, that there was no rule of evidence in this state which required that the testimony of the prosecuting witness should be corroborated. Accompanying this declaration of the rule, and as part of the same instruction embodying it, the jury were told that, in order to convict the defendant, it was necessary that they "believe beyond a reasonable doubt from all the evidence in the case that the crime charged had been committed as alleged." When a jury is told that they are to act upon a belief to be derived from a consideration of all the evidence in the case, they, as men of ordinary intelligence and good sense, understand that this necessarily involves a determination by them of the credence they are to give to the testimony of the various witnesses in the case and the weight they may attach to their testimony. There is nothing in the instruction trenching on the right and duty of the jury in this respect, nor any reasonable basis for a claim that they could have understood the court as telling them that they should accept the testimony of the prosecuting witness as true, or that, if they believed her testimony, they should find the defendant guilty. They were merely told that, if they believed from all the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant was guilty as charged, they might return a verdict of conviction, although the evidence of the prosecuting witness was uncorroborated; that there is no rule of law in this state which makes it essential to a conviction that the testimony of the prosecutrix should be corroborated. The court simply declared the rule as to corroboration applicable to this class of prosecutions, leaving to the jury to determine from a consideration of all the evidence the question of guilt. Under the instruction was left to them exclusively the right to determine what credibility they should attach to the testimony of the witnesses, which embraced a consideration of the testimony of the prosecutrix, as well as the testimony of the other witnesses. If, upon such a consideration, they believed that the defendant was guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, they were told that they might convict, although the testimony of the prosecutrix was not corroborated. In the application of this rule the credibility of witnesses and weight of evidence was left entirely to the jury. In fact, prior to giving the instruction complained of, the court had expressly instructed the jury that they were the sole judges of the effect and value of the evidence, and sole judges also of the credibility of the witnesses, and, immediately following the instruction complained of, the court in the next instruction given declared that to them "exclusively belongs the duty of weighing the evidence and determining the credibility of the witnesses." In still further instructions they were repeatedly told that this was their exclusive province, and likewise repeatedly told that they must take into consideration all the evidence in the case in reaching a verdict. Many instructions were also given in varying phraseology on the doctrine of reasonable doubt and its application.

Certainly, under these circumstances, taking the entire charge of the court into consideration, it would be a reflection upon the intelligence and good sense of the jury to say that they could have understood the special instruction complained of as either a declaration by the court that they should accept the testimony of the prosecutrix as true, or as an expression of opinion by the court that it was sufficient as it stood to warrant a conviction.

The cases of People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 39 Pac. 622, and People v. Barker, 137 Cal. 557, 70 Pac. 617, cited by respondent to support their claim, are not in point. In both those cases the court instructed the jury that, if they believed the testimony of the prosecutrix, it was their duty to find the defendant guilty. They were told to determine the question of guilt from a consideration of the testimony of the prosecutrix alone—not from a consideration of all the evidence in the case. The instruction here was not of that character, for, as we have pointed out, the jury were told that they could only convict if they believed from all the evidence—not from that of the prosecutrix alone—beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was guilty.

[3, 4] Other grounds, aside from this instruction, are urged for a reversal of the judgment. These matters were considered and decided in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal. That court said: "The alleged misconduct of the district attorney in the asking of certain questions against the objection of counsel and the ruling of the trial judge, if improper, seems not to have been prejudicial to defendant. The objections to such of the questions as appear to have been improper were promptly sustained by the court, and the trial judge very emphatically and fully instructed the jury as to their duty not to consider any matter which was not in evidence before them. The complaint made of the ruling whereby the prosecutrix was permitted to show just what treatment the girl Lutie Valentine underwent at the time she was examined by physicians at a maternity hospital in the city of Los Angeles may be answered in the same way. There was competent evidence introduced tending to show, not only that the defendant had arranged to have the child examined by the said physicians, but also the purpose for which she was to be examined. The result of that examination, as testified to by the physicians, was favorable to defendant, in so far as it did not disclose that the child was then pregnant, as it was claimed defendant feared she might be, and the mere fact that the physician and attendant were permitted to explain to the jury the method adopted in the making of that examination could not well have been prejudicial to the rights of the accused. The conduct of the district attorney in examining the physician and his assistant, the matron of the sanatorium, who were present and participated in the making of the examination to ascertain the condition of the child with respect to pregnancy, was not censurable."

We are satisfied with the determination of the District Court on these points and adopt its views respecting them as the conclusions of this court, and, as we are further satisfied that there was no error in the instruction we have heretofore considered, the judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

METZLER v. THYE. (L. A. 2,717.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 157*)—LEASE—CONSTRUCTION—"INSTALL."

Notwithstanding Civ. Code, §§ 1645, 1654, 1656, providing that technical words in contracts must be interpreted as understood by persons in the business to which they relate, and that in cases of uncertainty a contract must be interpreted most strongly against the party causing the uncertainty to exist, and that all things necessary to carry a contract into effect are implied therefrom, a lease, which required the lessee to "install a sidewalk elevator from the basement to the sidewalk" in front of the premises, does not require the lessor to prepare the premises for the installation of the elevator; but the lessee must provide a suitable lift with the usual accessories connecting the basement with the sidewalk; the word "install" meaning to set up or fix in position for use or service.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 571, 574-582, 584-600, 602, 607; Dec. Dig. § 157.*]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 157*)—CONTRACTS (§ 303*)—LEASE—FAILURE TO PERFORM—EXCUSE.

A lessee contracting to install a sidewalk elevator from the basement to the sidewalk in front of the premises cannot excuse the non-performance, on the ground that performance will involve greater expense than he anticipated, since parties sui juris cannot escape performance because of unforeseen hardship.

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 157*)—LEASE—CONSTRUCTION—OBLIGATION OF LESSEE.

A provision in a lease that no alteration in the premises may be made by the lessee without the permission of the lessor is modified by a special provision that the lessee shall install a sidewalk elevator from the basement to the sidewalk in front of the premises, so that the lessee may not excuse nonperformance on the ground that the lessor never gave permission to make alterations necessary for the work.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon F. Moss, Judge.

Action by Joseph Metzler against M. P. Thye, doing business as M. P. Thye & Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Jones & Weller, for appellant. W. W. Wideman and Frank Herald, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendant became the lessee of certain premises in the city of Los Angeles. During the term of his lease plaintiff bought the property and succeeded to all of the rights of the lessor. After the term of the lease and surrender of the premises by defendant, this suit was brought for damages alleged to be due for injuries to the property beyond reasonable wear and tear and for the failure of defendant to install a certain sidewalk elevator, as provided by the terms of the written lease. The superior court gave judgment in favor of defendant, and plaintiff appeals therefrom.

There is no attack upon the finding that the lessee had not injured the premises beyond reasonable wear and tear; the only point of controversy here being with reference to the interpretation given by the trial court to the covenant in the lease respecting the sidewalk elevator. The appeal is upon the judgment roll alone, and, as the court found that there was no agreement respecting the installation of the elevator except that expressed in the lease, we must construe that instrument in the light of this finding. In his answer defendant admitted that no elevator had been put in position, but pleaded as an excuse for his failure to comply with the requirement of the lease in that regard that, although he was ready at all times during the term of his tenancy to fulfill his obligation, plaintiff had prevented him from so doing by neglecting to prepare the premises for the reception of the elevator. The requirement of the contract of lease was that defendant within six months from the 1st of November, 1905, should "install a sidewalk elevator from the basement to the sidewalk in front of said premises." The court found that neither plaintiff nor his predecessor in interest prepared or offered to prepare the premises for the reception of an elevator, and that "before said elevator could be installed it would have been necessary to make certain changes in the building on said premises, to remove a part of the foundation wall under said building, to excavate under the sidewalk, and build a wall around such excavation and an arch over the portion of said foundation wall to be removed as aforesaid, in order to prepare a place for the installation of said elevator, and that it would have been further necessary to place trapdoors in said sidewalk."

[1] It will thus be seen that the whole controversy turns upon the meaning of the word "install." Appellant insists that since all things necessary to carry a contract into effect are implied therefrom (Civ. Code, § 1656), and since the contract is to be "interpreted most strongly against the promisor," in cases of uncertainty (Civ. Code, § 1654) therefore this court, as matter of construction, should give to the word "install" a force including all things necessary to the carrying out of defendant's promise. The words "install" and "installation," when applied to machinery, have a technical meaning and should be interpreted accordingly. Section 1645, Civ. Code. Webster's New Standard Dictionary gives these definitions: "Install—to set up or fix in position for use or service; as to install a heating or lighting system." "Installation—the whole of a system of machines, apparatus and accessories set up and arranged for working, as in electric lighting, transmission of power, etc." Other lexicons define these words quite similarly. When, therefore, defendant agreed to install an elevator "from the basement to the sidewalk in front of said premises," he meant that he would provide a suitable lift, with the usual accessories connecting the basement of the building which he occupied as tenant, with the sidewalk in front of it. We see no room for an interpretation imposing upon appellant the duty of preparation of the premises. If a tenant under a lease of a farm should agree to sow a crop, the contract would scarcely be interpreted to mean that the landlord should plow the land, and buy the seed, leaving the promisor only the duty of spreading it. The implication in the contract before us, though perhaps not quite as strong, is as clear as that which would arise in the one cited by way of illustration. Words expressing a promise to build an improvement do not, as a rule, indicate the intent of the parties to the contract that a mere structure should be erected, but that the improvement should be adapted to the use to which it is generally applied. For example, where a railroad company promised to "erect" a station, the covenant was held to be one imposing upon the corporation the duty of building and establishing a regular station. Port Huron & Northwestern Ry. Co. v. Richards, 90 Mich. 577, 51 N. W. 680. It is true that the context in the case just cited was somewhat more illuminating of the meaning of the word "erect" as used in the agreement there considered, than are the other portions of the contract before us, as indicating the exact meaning of the word "install" intended by the parties thereto. But we believe that the principle announced in the Michigan case is entirely applicable here.

[2] The fact that compliance with his contract would involve greater expense than he anticipated would not excuse defendant. Parties sui juris cannot escape performance of their undertakings because of unforeseen hardship. Johnson v. Bryant, 61 Ark. 315, 32 S. W. 1081. Where one contracts to furnish capital, a financial panic does not excuse performance. McCreery v. Green, 38 Mich. 172. See, also, 2 Parsons on Contracts (9th Ed.) 826; 3 Page on Contracts, par. 1378; 1 Beach on Contracts, par. 216.

[3] The lease here considered provided that no alterations in the premises might be made without permission of the lessor, and the court found that plaintiff never granted leave to defendant to make the changes which would be necessary and incidental to putting in an elevator; but the failure of plaintiff to grant such permission would not be a good defense. The general covenant in the lease with reference to alterations would, of course, be subject to and modified by the special agreement regarding the installation of the elevator.

The judgment is reversed.

KROTZER v. DOUGLAS et al. (L. A. 2,888.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 10, 1912.)

1. TAXATION (§ 658*)—TAX SALES—NOTICE OF SALE—MAILING.

Mailing a copy of notice of sale of land for taxes to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before the sale at his last known post office address, as required by Pol. Code, § 3897, is essential to the authority of the tax collector to make the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 1332-1335; Dec. Dig. § 658.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 788*)—TAX SALES—DEED FROM STATE—PRIMA FACIE EVIDENCE.

Under Pol. Code, § 3898, providing that a tax deed from the state shall be prima facie evidence of the facts recited therein, the making of a deed to land sold by the state for taxes to an individual is not conclusive evidence of the mailing of the notice of sale to the owner's last known post office address as required by Pol. Code, § 3897.

3. TAXATION (§ 658*)—TAX SALES—NOTICE.

Pol. Code, § 3898, requires notice of a sale of land for taxes by mail to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before the sale, directed to his last known post office address.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

A tax deed recited that the collector mailed a copy of the notice to the party to whom the land was last assessed, but did not recite that it was mailed to his last known post office address, and the deputy tax collector testified that he had sent a copy of the notice by registered mail to the owner, directed to 1747 New Hampshire street, Los Angeles, Cal., and that the notice had been returned uncalled for and undelivered. He also testified that he sent the notice to the person last assessed to his last known place of residence, but was unable to say how he obtained the address, whether from the assessment roll, a city directory, a telephone book, or by inquiring from friends, and it was shown that the owner's address did not appear except in the assessment roll for the year 1908, and was there given as "Rivera." Held, to show that the notice was not mailed to the owner's last known address, and, there being no attempt to excuse the want of mailing on the ground that the address was unknown, such mailing was insufficient to justify a sale.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Henry Krotzer against Irvin Douglas and others. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

C. A. Stice, for appellant. Carter, Kirby & Henderson, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. Action to quiet title. The plaintiff relied upon a tax deed. It was admitted that the defendant Douglas, except in so far as his title may have been divested by the proceedings culminating in such deed, was the owner of the land. The court gave judgment in favor of said defendant upon his paying to the clerk of the court, for the use of the plaintiff, the amount of taxes, penalties, interest, and costs against the property on the day of sale by the state to plaintiff. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The property was sold to the state for nonpayment of taxes assessed for the year 1903. The deed from the tax collector, as agent of the state to the plaintiff, bore date of the 7th day of June, 1910. The defendant made several objections to the validity of the proceedings culminating in this deed. The findings are to the effect that the defendant is the owner in fee of the property, and that plaintiff has no right, title, or interest therein. These findings and the consequent judgment must be upheld if any of the points made by defendant against the validity of the attempted sale to plaintiff be good.

[1] One of these points is that the sale by the state was void for failure on the part of the tax collector to mail a copy of the notice of sale "to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before the sale, at his last known post office address," as required by section 3897 of the Political Code. That compliance with this requirement is essential to the authority of the tax collector to make the sale is no longer open to question. Smith v. Furlong, 160 Cal. 522, 117 Pac. 527; Buck v. Canty, 121 Pac. 924; Johnson v. Canty, 123 Pac. 263.

[2] The making of the deed is not conclusive evidence of the regularity of antecedent steps. Smith v. Furlong, supra. In this respect the Code makes a distinction between deeds to the state (Pol. Code, § 3787) and deeds from the state (Pol. Code, § 3898). The provision regarding the latter is merely that the deed shall be prima facie evidence of the facts recited therein.

[3] The respondent's position here is that, while a notice was mailed to the party last assessed, it was not mailed to him "at his last known post office address." In Smith v. Furlong, supra, there was no mailing at all, although the address was known. But clearly a mailing to an address other than that designated by the statute is no better than a want of any mailing, at least where it appears, as it does here, that the notice did not in fact reach the person to whom it should have been sent.

The deed from the state recites merely that the tax collector did mail a copy of the notice to the party to whom the land was last assessed. There is no recital that it was mailed to his last known post office address, or that it was addressed in any manner. Since, as we have seen, the effect of the deed as prima facie evidence is limited to the facts recited, the question of compliance with the requirement of mailing to the correct address must be determined by the evidence outside of the deed, and the burden of proof, in the absence of a recital, is on the party claiming under the deeds. Buck v. Canty, 121 Pac. 924.

Thomas Watson, a deputy of the tax collector, testified that he had mailed by registered mail a copy of the notice to Peter Robinson, 1747 New Hampshire street, Los Angeles, Cal.; that said notice was returned to the tax collector uncalled for and undelivered. He further testified that he had "sent the notice to the person last assessed to his last known place of residence"; but the witness was unable to say how he obtained the address. He believed he obtained it from the assessment roll, but might have obtained it from a city directory or telephone book, or by inquiring from friends of the said Peter Robinson.

On the other hand, the defendant offered in evidence the assessment rolls for the years 1908 and 1909, together with the index to each. The name of Peter Robinson was shown on each of said four volumes, and the property herein involved stood on said assessment rolls in the name of said Peter Robinson; but no address of said Peter Robinson was found in any of the said volumes, in the place where his name appeared, except on the index to the assessment roll for the year 1908; and thereon the address of Peter Robinson was given as "Rivera." There was testimony given by the witness Watson that the indexes to the assessment rolls were in the tax collector's office, together with said rolls for each year, while the tax collector was collecting taxes; and that, in searching for the last known post office address of the person to whom the land was last assessed next before the sale by the state, he looked at the assessment rolls for the year for which the property was sold and all subsequent years, and also in the indexes to said rolls, which are in the county auditor's office.

We are satisfied that this evidence warranted the court in making the finding, which must be implied from the general finding in favor of the defendant's ownership, that the notice had not been mailed to Robinson "at his last known post office address." There was no attempt here to excuse the want of mailing on the ground that the address was not known. On the contrary, a notice having been mailed, the claim necessarily was that the address was known, and that the mailing was to such address. It is true that, where no notice has been mailed, and there is nothing in the tax records to show an address, the tax collector is not required to make search aliunde, and his deed, reciting that there was no known post office address, will not be overcome by evidence tending to show merely that the person assessed did in fact reside in a certain place. Campbell v. Shafer, 121 Pac. 737. So, too, it has been held that the tax collector is not bound to take notice of an address which appears only on assessment rolls of years prior to that for which the sale to the state was made. Kehlet v. Bergman, 121 Pac. 918.

Such of the cases above cited as deal with the question of notice imputed to the tax collector by the tax records go no further than to hold that he is bound to take notice of an address appearing on the assessment roll itself. Section 3650 of the Political Code requires that the address, if known, shall be entered on such roll. There is no provision of the kind with reference to the index. Section 3651. In this case the address "Rivera" appeared only on the index, and not on the assessment. If the tax collector had failed to mail a notice, and had made a deed reciting that the address was unknown, we should hardly be inclined to hold that the effect of the recital was overcome by the mere fact that the index, which is not required to contain an address, did in fact contain one. But that is not the case presented. Here the plaintiff, who, as we have seen, was required to show the existence of facts authorizing the execution of the deed, undertook to prove, not that the notice had not been sent because the address was unknown, but that the tax collector, knowing the address, had correctly mailed notice. Even though the officer was not bound to know the address entered in the index, we have the testimony of Watson that he did, in fact, examine the indexes, including the one which showed the address "Rivera." There was nothing in the records to indicate the address to which the notice was in fact sent. On this evidence, the court below was fully justified in concluding that Watson had, through an inspection of the index, ascertained that the delinquent taxpayer's address was "Rivera," but had, through some unexplained mistake or inadvertence, mailed the notice to "1747 New Hampshire street," which, so far as the evidence goes to show, was not the correct address. Judgment in favor of the defendant properly followed.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

1. QUIETING TITLE (§ 2*)—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

A complaint alleging that plaintiff is the owner in fee of lands through which there is a stream; that he is seised and possessed of the right to divert the flow of the stream; that defendant claims a right to, and threatens to divert some of the water, and asking that plaintiff be adjudged to be the owner of the right to use the water, and that defendant be declared to have no right thereto, and be enjoined from diverting it, states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action to quiet plaintiff's title to the water; water flowing in a stream being real property and part of the riparian land inseparably annexed thereto.

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 232*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS—NOTICE—"PURCHASER IN GOOD FAITH."

The occupant of lands to which a right to divert water from a stream was appurtenant agreed to sell such water rights to defendant, and the duly authorized officer of the occupant informed defendant that S. was the owner of the land, and that it would be necessary to take a conveyance from him, which defendant did. In an action to quiet title to water rights, evidence that defendant purchased such rights from a former record owner of the lands to which they were appurtenant in reliance on the statements of the holder of an unrecorded deed that such record owner was the owner and could make such conveyance was admissible, although such facts were not pleaded as an estoppel, since, although they might have constituted an estoppel, they also showed that defendant was a purchaser in good faith.

Department 1. Appeals from Superior Court, Ventura County; Robert M. Clarke, Judge.

Action by Hyrum C. Shurtleff against James Bracken, in which George Kehrer, administrator, was substituted as defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Murphey & Poplin, for appellant. B. F. Thomas, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Appeals are herein presented from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. After the appeal from the judgment was taken, James Bracken died and George Kehrer, administrator of his estate, was substituted as defendant. The appeal from the order denying a new trial was taken by the administrator.

[1] The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is the owner in fee of certain lands, describing them; that within the boundaries thereof there is a stream of water called Hund's Canyon; that plaintiff is seised and possessed of the right to divert and use on said land all of the natural and usual flow of said stream; that the defendant claims a right to divert some of the water naturally flowing in said stream; that such claim is without right; and that the defendant threatens to divert some of said water and use it upon lands not riparian to the stream, which use, if permitted, would ripen into a right adverse to that of the plaintiff.

The prayer is that the plaintiff be adjudged the owner of the right to use all of said water upon said land, and that defendant be declared to have no right thereto, and be enjoined from making the threatened diversion. No demurrer was filed to the complaint, but the defendant claims that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. While the allegations are somewhat general, we think they are sufficient as against a general demurrer. Water flowing in a stream is real property. Stanislaus W. Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 726, 93 Pac. 858, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 359. It is parcel of the riparian land inseparably annexed to it. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 391, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674; Heilbron v. Last Chance, etc., Co., 75 Cal. 122, 17 Pac. 65; Hargrave v. Cook, 108 Cal. 77, 41 Pac. 18, 30 L. R. A. 390.

[2] The diversion of water of the stream is an injury to the freehold of the riparian owner, and may be enjoined without a showing of other immediate monetary damages. Anaheim U. W. Co. v. Fuller, 150 Cal. 333, 88 Pac. 978, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062, and cases there cited. The facts stated constitute a good cause of action to quiet the plaintiff's title to the water, as part of his real estate, and to enjoin the threatened diversion. The answer denies that the plaintiff was or is seised or possessed of the water rights in question, and alleges that the defendant, Bracken, is the owner thereof. It further alleges that the defendant is the owner of 80 acres of land in Hund's Canyon, situated three-fourths of a mile above the plaintiff's land; that upon said tract the water which the plaintiff claims was diverted by the plaintiff from the stream, and from thence carried to the plaintiff's land; that the defendant claimed the right to divert said water and carry it out of the watershed to another tract of land owned by defendant and there use it for domestic and irrigation purposes; that on October 3, 1903, he purchased from the predecessor in interest of the plaintiff all the right, title, and interest of said predecessor in and to the water of said canyon, with the dams, reservoirs, tanks, pipes, flumes, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, saving and excepting such part thereof as was situated within the boundaries of the plaintiff's lands; that said predecessor in interest, Coonrod Smith, thereupon conveyed the same to the defendant, whereupon defendant took possession thereof, changed the pipe lines as theretofore existing so as to take the said water to his own nonriparian land, and has ever since continued to take and use the said water on said land. The findings are that the plaintiff and his predecessors in interest acquired title to said water by adverse possession and use, that plaintiff is the owner thereof; that prior to the conveyance of Coonrod Smith to the defendant said Smith had conveyed said land and water rights to the Barr Realty Company; and that Bracken was not a purchaser from Smith in good faith of said water rights, but had knowledge of the title of the said company. The defendant claims that these findings are contrary to the evidence, and we are of the opinion that the claim must be sustained.

[3] The land claimed by plaintiff consists of about 136 acres known as Glencoe Ranch. From about the year 1889 down to February, 1902, it belonged to one Wilsie and his heirs. During this time the use of the water on the land by means of the diversion on Bracken's land above was begun, and controversies arose between Bracken and the Wilsies concerning the right to take the same. The defendant disputed the acquisition of said right by the Wilsies by adverse use, and claims that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding to that effect. While there is some conflict, there appears to be sufficient evidence to show an adverse use for more than five years during a part of this period, and it must be conceded for the purposes of the decision that the Wilsies had acquired that right. In February 1902, the Wilsies sold the said land to the Barr Realty Company. For the convenience of the company, the title was conveyed to Coonrod Smith by deed dated February 19, 1902. Smith paid no part of the purchase money, but held the land merely as naked trustee for the company subject to its direction and control. The company immediately took possession of the land, and continued in possession until after the transactions about to be mentioned. On April 16, 1903, Smith executed to the Barr Realty Company a deed conveying said Glencoe Ranch with the appurtenances and water rights belonging thereto to the Barr Realty Company. This deed, however, was not recorded until December 10, 1903. Controversies and disputes existed between the Barr Realty Company and Bracken concerning the right to take the water from the canyon, each claiming said right. Thereupon, in settlement of the controversy, it was agreed that the company should sell the water rights to Bracken, and that Bracken should pay $1,000 as the price thereof. Harvey Sparling, vice president of the company, was the officer who transacted all its business and was duly authorized to act for it in the sale, conveyance, and disposition of all of its property. The negotiations leading up to this agreement were made by Bracken with Sparling. They met in Ventura to carry out the agreement. Sparling then informed Bracken that the record title to the land and water rights was in Coonrod Smith, and that, in order to consummate the agreement, it would be necessary for Smith to make the conveyance of the water rights to Bracken. This was on October 5, 1903. Bracken had no knowledge of the execution of the deed of April 16, 1903, by Smith to the company, and never heard of said deed until about the time of the trial of this action. He believed the statement of Sparling that the title was in Smith, and that Smith would have to make a conveyance to him and consented to that method of carrying out the agreement. Thereupon he paid the $1,000 to Sparling for the company, and Sparling delivered to him a deed dated October 3, 1903, duly executed by Coonrod Smith, purporting to convey to him the aforesaid water rights as described in his answer. This deed was recorded at the request of Bracken on October 5, 1903. Bracken immediately took actual possession of the water rights, disconnected the pipe line leading to the Glencoe Ranch, and with the pipe previously used by the company and other pipe extended the pipe line to his nonriparian land at an expense of $2,500, and ever since has continued to divert the water to said land and use it thereon for irrigation and domestic purposes.

We are of the opinion that the effect of this transaction was to vest in Bracken the water rights conveyed to him by the deed from Smith. Section 1214 of the Civil Code provides that every conveyance of real property is void as against any subsequent purchaser of the same property, or any part thereof, in good faith and for a valuable consideration, whose conveyance is first duly recorded. Bracken comes precisely within this provision. The deed of Smith to the company made on April 16th was not recorded until December 10th. Bracken had no notice thereof, and on October 5, 1903, he obtained the deed from Smith which he caused to be duly recorded on that day. He paid a valuable consideration, and he took his conveyance without knowledge of the prior unrecorded deed. The plaintiff claims that Bracken had notice of the prior conveyance to the company. His argument on this point is that the company was in actual possession of the land and water rights; that Bracken was aware of this possession, and that this fact put him on inquiry as to the rights of the company; that, if he had pursued the inquiry by making proper inquiries he would have learned of the existence of the company's deed from Smith. This argument would be sound if Bracken had purchased the water rights from Smith, paying the purchase money to Smith, while the company was in possession of the property purchased. But this is not that case. Bracken purchased from the company itself. He knew of the company's possession, and made his bargain with its accredited representative. He inquired of that company concerning its title, and was informed by it that Smith held the title and would make the conveyance on its behalf. This was a complete explanation of the fact that the company was in possession while the title was vested in Smith, and it showed that the two facts were not inconsistent with each other, and that the claims of the company and Smith were not antagonistic. He was not bound to pursue the inquiry farther, and had the right to accept the statement as correct and take the conveyance from Smith accordingly. He was a purchaser for a valuable consideration and without notice of the deed previously executed to the company. The effect is that the title to the water previously vested in the company as appurtenant to the Glencoe Ranch became vested in Bracken.

[4] At the time this conveyance was made to Bracken the land was incumbered by two mortgages one to F. R. Foster and the other to John S. Collins. Plaintiff afterwards obtained title under sales made on foreclosures of said mortgages. Bracken was not made a party to either of the foreclosure suits. They were begun in 1905, and at that time he was in open and visible possession and use of the water rights conveyed to him by Smith. Except as provided in section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure, this possession would be sufficient to charge all subsequent purchasers with notice of his rights, whether his deed was recorded or not. The deed to the purchaser under the foreclosure decree did not operate to divest the title of Bracken to these water rights. It is well settled that a conveyance under a foreclosure decree does not affect the title held by persons who are not made parties to the action of foreclosure if such title appears of record when the action is begun. Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 469, 76 Am. Dec. 540; Boggs v. Fowler, 16 Cal. 563, 76 Am. Dec. 561; Burns v. Hiatt, 149 Cal. 620, 87 Pac. 196, 117 Am. St. Rep. 157. The case is not within the provision of section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure, declaring that a decree of foreclosure is binding against the holder of a subsequent unrecorded deed who has not been made party to the action, even if the plaintiff in the action had knowledge of such deed at the time the action was begun. Bracken was not the holder of title under an unrecorded deed. He held title under deed duly recorded prior to the beginning of the action and the prior deed to the company, subsequently recorded, was void as against him. It follows from these considerations that the finding that plaintiff was the owner of these water rights, and that Bracken had no interest therein, is without support in the evidence, and is contrary thereto.

[5] It is contended by the plaintiff that the evidence of the transaction between Bracken and Sparling at the time of the sale by the company to Bracken was not admissible because the facts were not alleged in the answer. The theory of the plaintiff is that these facts constituted an estoppel against the Barr Realty Company and its successors, and that an estoppel must be pleaded in order to authorize the admission of evidence in proof of it. While the facts might have constituted an estoppel, they were also admissible for the purpose of proving the acquisition of title under the deed from Smith to Bracken and to show that Bracken was a purchaser in good faith. Hence there is nothing in this objection. There are no other points which require notice. The facts above related are not seriously disputed, and, as the case is presented, it appears that they should have controlled the decision.

The judgment and order are reversed.

HANFORD GAS & POWER CO. v. CITY OF HANFORD. (Sac. 1,917.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 14, 1912.)

1. GAS (§ 10*)—"TAX"—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

A provision in a municipal franchise to a gas company for the payment to the city of a percentage of the company's gross receipts is not a provision for the payment of a "tax," but merely a provision for the payment of a consideration for the privilege.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 6867-6886; vol. 8, p. 7813.]

2. PAYMENT (§ 82*)—RECOVERY BACK—VOLUNTARY PAYMENTS.

In the absence of a statute, a person paying an illegal demand with knowledge of its illegality cannot recover it unless the payment was necessary to protect his person or property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 254-266; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

3. PAYMENT (§ 89*)—RECOVERY BACK—ACTIONS—PLEADING.

In an action by a gas company to recover back a percentage of its receipts paid to a city under the terms of its franchise, on the ground that the provision for such payment was illegal, allegations that the payment was made under menace, compulsion, or coercion are insufficient to show that the payments were involuntary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 291-296; Dec. Dig. § 89.*]

4. PAYMENT (§ 89*)—RECOVERY BACK—DURESS—THREAT OF LEGAL PROCEEDINGS.

In an action by a gas company to recover back payments to the city under the terms of its franchise on the ground that the provision for such payments was illegal, an allegation that the payments were made under threats that proceedings would be instituted for the forfeiture of the franchise are insufficient to show that the payment was involuntary, since the company could have contested the validity of the city's claim in the proceeding to forfeit the franchise.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; John G. Covert, Judge.

Action by the Hanford Gas & Power Company against the City of Hanford. From a judgment for plaintiff on demurrer, defendant appeals. Reversed.

H. Scott Jacobs, for appellant. M. L. Short, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action to recover from the city of Hanford $740.20, paid by plaintiff to said city under such circumstances as, it is claimed, entitles plaintiff to recover it with interest, and also to obtain a decree enjoining the city from doing certain things. A demurrer to the complaint for want of facts to state a cause of action was overruled, and, defendant failing to answer, judgment was given for the recovery of such money with interest, and restraining the city from the commission of any of the acts alleged to be threatened. Defendant appeals from such judgment.

The complaint is substantially as follows: Defendant is a municipal corporation of the sixth class. The plaintiff is a corporation organized for the purpose of constructing and maintaining gas plants in cities and towns and manufacturing and supplying gas to the inhabitants of said cities and towns to be used for heat, light, and power. On July 14, 1902, E. E. Bush and C. S. Young applied in writing to the board of trustees of defendant for a franchise and privilege for themselves, their successors and assigns, for a period of 50 years, to lay and maintain gas pipes for the purpose of conducting gas for heat, power, and light, over, upon, along, and under the public streets, alleys, etc., in the city of Hanford, and for selling and supplying the same to the inhabitants of said city. Notice of such application was given to the board of trustees by publication stating that it was intended to grant said privilege, and that sealed bids would be received therefor up to October 23, 1902, at 8 o'clock p. m. The notice stated that the principal bidder and his assigns must, during the life of said franchise, pay to the city 2 per cent. of the gross annual receipts arising from the use, operation, or possession of the franchise, except for the first five years. It stated that, "in the event said payment is not made, said franchise shall be forfeited." It further required a bond from the grantee in the sum of $2,500, conditioned for the observance by him of the stipulations on his part. On October 23, 1902, C. S. Young submitted a bid for such privilege in accordance with the conditions specified in the notice, offering to pay therefor $250. This bid was accepted. On October 28, 1902, Young gave the required bond, which was approved and accepted. On November 10, 1902, the board of trustees adopted an ordinance granting to Young and his assigns the privilege and franchise for the term of 50 years "to lay gas pipes for the purpose of carrying gas for heat, light, and power through the public highways, streets, and alleys in said city of Hanford" on the conditions specified in the notice for bids, one of which conditions was specified in the ordinance as follows: "First,

The said C. S. Young, and his assigns, must, during the life of said franchise, pay to the said municipality two (2) per cent. of the gross annual receipts arising from its use, operation or possession; provided, that no percentage shall be paid for the first five (5) years succeeding the date of the franchise, but thereafter such percentage shall be payable annually, and in the event said payment is not made, said franchise shall be forfeited." Thereafter Young assigned to plaintiff all his interest in and to said privilege, and plaintiff thereupon constructed a gas plant in said city, and laid gas pipes through the streets, highways, and alleys thereof, and ever since the completion of said work has operated said plant and has been engaged in the business of manufacturing gas and supplying the same to the inhabitants of the city. On March 25, 1909, plaintiff paid to the city $359.09; said sum being 2 per cent. of its gross earnings for the first year after the expiration of the first five years. On April 14, 1910, it paid to the city $385.11; the same being 2 per cent. of its gross earnings for the second year after the expiration of the first five years. Each of these payments was accompanied by a written notice to the effect that the same was paid "under protest," and under the claim that the ordinance in so far as it required the payment of said money was unconstitutional and void, and that the city has no power to exact such payment, and that the company does not waive any of its rights to object thereto.

It was alleged that "plaintiff was unlawfully required to pay" these sums, that the city "did, * * * unlawfully and without right, demand of said plaintiff" such payments; that "by reason of said demand" plaintiff made the payments; that "the collection and taking of said money * * * was unauthorized, unlawful, and without right, and without consideration of any kind whatever, and the payment thereof was made by plaintiff herein under menace, compulsion, and coercion and under a threat that, if the same were not paid, proceedings would be instituted for the forfeiture of said privilege granted by said ordinance No. 115." It was further alleged, as a basis for the injunction sought, that the defendant threatens to continue to collect said 2 per cent. of said gross annual receipts, and threatens that if the same is not paid it will take immediate steps for the forfeiture of said privilege, "and threatens to interfere with and obstruct the use and operation of said plant by the said plaintiff," all of which plaintiff verily believes it will do unless restrained, and that "great injury and damage will result therefrom to this plaintiff, not susceptible of computation or compensation in a suit at law, and plaintiff's right to the use of said plant and its works will be permanently interfered with and destroyed, and great damage and waste will be wrongfully inflicted on said plaintiff, and endless litigation will result therefrom."

[1] Plaintiffs claim that the ordinance purporting to grant the assignor the privilege of using the streets of the city for its gas pipes, which was sought and accepted by plaintiff's assignor, is void in so far as it attempts to impose upon the grantee the duty of paying to the city a certain percentage of its gross receipts, is based upon section 19, article 11, of the Constitution as it existed prior to the amendment of 1911. That section has several times been held to constitute a grant of the right to use the streets of a city for pipes, conduits, etc., "so far as may be necessary for introducing into and supplying such city and its inhabitants either with gas light or other illuminating light, or with fresh water for domestic and all other purposes," in any city where there are no public works owned and constructed by the municipality for such purposes, to any individual, or any company duly incorporated for such purpose under the laws of this state, leaving nothing for the city to grant so far as the use of such streets for such purposes is concerned. The charge of 2 per cent. of the annual gross receipts is styled an "annual tax" by plaintiff; but, of course, it is in no proper sense a "tax" at all, but is simply an amount that plaintiff's assignor agreed should be paid annually as a consideration for such privilege as was granted by the city. It is the amount fixed by the contract of the parties, and, unless it is paid, the agreement is that "said franchise (the franchise granted by the board of trustees) shall be forfeited." Plaintiff's real point is that inasmuch as it had everything purported to be granted by the city, under and by virtue of the grant contained in the Constitution, it has obtained nothing from the city, and that the undertaking to pay the city anything on account of this purported grant was entirely without consideration and unenforceable. The defendant claims that plaintiff has acquired by this contract something from the city in addition to the rights granted by the Constitution, and is therefore liable for the stipulated price. It is unnecessary on this appeal to determine the question, for we are satisfied that, however it be determined, plaintiff is not entitled to recover the money paid by it and for which it obtained judgment in the lower court.

[2] There is nothing in the complaint to warrant a conclusion that these payments made by plaintiff to defendant were not what are known in law as voluntary payments, free from duress. Unless otherwise provided by statute, as is the case in this state with relation to state and county taxes (Pol. Code, §§ 3804, 3819), one who pays an illegal demand with full knowledge of its illegality cannot recover it, unless the payment is necessary in order to protect his person or property. As said in Brumagin v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 271, 79 Am. Dec. 176, quoted approvingly in Maxwell v. San Luis Obispo Co., 71 Cal. 466, 12 Pac. 484: "The illegality of the demand paid constitutes, of itself, no ground for relief. There must be, in addition, some compulsion or coercion attending its assertion, which controls the conduct of the party making the payment." In Phelan v. San Francisco, 120 Cal. 5, 52 Pac. 38, where a written protest accompanied the payment, it was said: "If one pays an illegal demand, with full knowledge of its illegality, his protest does not take from the payment its voluntary character, unless the payment is necessary in order to protect his person or property." See, also, Rooney v. Snow, 131 Cal. 51, 63 Pac. 155. It is unnecessary to cite other authorities on this well-settled rule of law.

[3,4] Plaintiff claims that it has alleged facts warranting a conclusion of the duress or coercion essential to make the payments involuntary. We have set forth the allegations relied on. There is nothing therein hinting of duress, menace, or coercion, except the general allegation that the payments were made "under menace, compulsion, and coercion and under a threat that, if the same was not paid, proceedings would be instituted for the forfeiture of said privilege, granted by said ordinance No. 115." The general allegation as to menace, compulsion, and coercion is not sufficient to show any of these characteristics. It was said in Lewis v. San Francisco, 2 Cal. App. 114, 82 Pac. 1106, of an allegation that a payment was involuntary, that, while this was an allegation of the ultimate fact upon which plaintiff's right of recovery depended, nevertheless, "as in the case of a cause of action depending upon fraud or negligence, the allegation of this ultimate fact would have been insufficient against a general demurrer unless supported by an averment of the probative facts, and the sufficiency of the complaint is therefore to be determined by a consideration of these probative facts." The same is true as to the general allegation of menace, compulsion, and coercion. We have here no averment of any probative fact, except the allegation that the payments were made under a threat of the institution of proceedings for the forfeiture of the privilege granted by the city. In view of the fact that the claim of plaintiff for the recovery of this money is really based on the further claim that it had no privilege granted by the city, its contention that this threat is sufficient to show the duress essential to an involuntary payment is, to say the least, somewhat inconsistent. However this may be, a mere threat to institute a legal proceeding against the plaintiff, "for the forfeiture of said privilege granted by said ordinance No. 115," in which proceeding the validity of the claim of the city could be contested by the plaintiff and its legality determined, is not sufficient to render a payment made by reason thereof compulsory or other than voluntary. See Lewis v. San Francisco, 2 Cal. App. 115, 82 Pac. 1106. None of the cases cited by plaintiff on this question is in point here. The allegations made in support of the claim for relief by injunction are utterly insufficient to warrant the granting of such relief. So far as they attempt to state matters on account of which the equitable remedy by injunction may be invoked, they are entirely wanting in specific statement warranting the inference that an injunction was necessary to protect the plaintiff in so far as any of its rights is concerned.

The judgment is reversed..

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Action by Charles L. Donohoe and another against C. M. Wooster and another.

From an order granting the motion of defendant Wooster to change the place of trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Arthur C. Huston, for appellants. Frank H. Gould, Vincent Surr, W. T. Belieu, and George Freeman, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiffs appeal from an order granting the motion of the defendant Wooster for a change of place of trial. The action was commenced in Glenn county. The complaint alleges the making of a contract between Charles L. Donohoe and Frank Freeman of the one part, and C. M. Wooster of the other, whereby Wooster agreed to pay to Donohoe and Freeman certain sums in consideration of services to be performed by them in obtaining options for the purchase of lands. A one-third interest in the contract was transferred by Donohoe and Freeman to Barceloux. It is alleged that, pursuant to the terms of the contract, the plaintiffs and Freeman obtained certain options, and that thereby said three parties became and are entitled to receive from Wooster the sum of $15,737.24, of which amount Freeman is entitled to receive one-third. It is alleged that Freeman has refused to join Donohoe and Barceloux as a plaintiff in the action, and for that reason is joined as defendant. The prayer of the complaint is that the plaintiffs recover judgment against Wooster for $11,481.50. The complaint was filed in January, 1911. On the 31st day of January the defendant Freeman appeared by filing a demurrer. On the 25th day of February, 1911, the defendant Wooster appeared and filed a demurrer, together with a demand for a change of place of trial, notice of intention to move for such change, and an affidavit. The affidavit showed a meritorious defense, and alleged that said defendant Wooster is, and at all times since the commencement of the action has been, a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California. There was no counter showing, and upon the hearing of the motion the court made its order changing the place of trial from the county of Glenn to the city and county of San Francisco.

[1] Where there are several defendants in a personal action, a nonresident defendant, moving alone, is not entitled to have the place of trial changed to the county of his residence in the absence of a showing that none of the other defendants are residents of the county in which the action was brought. Code Civ. Proc. § 395; Hearne v. De Young, 111 Cal. 371, 43 Pac. 1103; Quint v. Dimond, 135 Cal. 572, 67 Pac. 1034; County of Modoc v. Madden, 136 Cal. 134, 68 Pac. 491; Sullivan v. Lusk, 7 Cal. App. 186, 94 Pac. 91, 92. Inasmuch, therefore, as Freeman is named as a party defendant, and there is no showing that he is not a resident of the county of Glenn, it is argued by the appellants that Wooster was not entitled to have the place of trial changed.

[2] On the other hand, the respondents contend that Freeman was not a "defendant" within the meaning of section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The latter view was the one adopted by the trial court, and we think the action taken was correct. As was said in Smith v. Smith, 88 Cal. 572, 575, 26 Pac. 356, 357: "The general spirit and policy of the statute is to give to the defendant the right of having all personal actions against him tried in the county of his residence. * * * It is intended to protect the defendant in the expense and inconvenience of being compelled to go to a distant county to defend himself against an action that might be commenced against him there, and is in accordance with the principles that obtain wherever the common law prevails, that a plaintiff who would seek redress from a defendant must seek it in the county where he resides." In conformity with this theory, it is settled that the joining as party defendant of one against whom no cause of action is stated does not deprive the other defendant of the right to have the action tried in the county of his residence. Buell v. Dodge, 57 Cal. 645; Sayward v. Houghton, 82 Cal. 628, 23 Pac. 120.

The joinder of Freeman as a party defendant is justified by the provision of section 382 of the Code of Civil Procedure that, "if the consent of any one who should have been joined as plaintiff cannot be obtained, he may be made a defendant; the reason therefor being stated in the complaint." The fact, however, that Freeman's refusal to join in bringing the action made it necessary to designate him as a defendant, does not alter the essential relations of the parties to one another. The cause of action alleged is one in favor of Donohoe, Freeman, and Barceloux, jointly, against Wooster. The plaintiffs are seeking no relief against Freeman; the only purpose of joining him being to have before the court all of the parties necessary to an adjudication of their claim against Wooster. Freeman has no such interest as would entitle him to a voice in fixing the place of trial. He must take one of two positions—either that he wishes to participate with the plaintiffs in such recovery as may be had against Wooster, or that he does not desire any benefit from the action. In either view his attitude will be substantially that of a plaintiff. In the one case that of a plaintiff asserting his right to recover; in the other, that of a plaintiff who waives such right.

It is apparent, therefore, that it is only in a narrow and technical sense that it can be said that the complaint states a cause of action against Freeman. While he was properly made a party defendant by virtue of the provisions of section 382, the plaintiffs cannot on the facts alleged obtain any relief against him. Nor can his action in asserting or waiving a right to participate in the recovery affect the rights which the plaintiffs are here attempting to assert against Wooster.

It is suggested by the appellants that Freeman may by appropriate pleadings seek relief adverse to the plaintiffs. But in seeking any such relief it is clear that Freeman would, whether he asserted his claim by cross-complaint or counterclaim, in reality assume the position of a plaintiff setting up a new cause of action by a new complaint.

[3] Furthermore, the right to a change of place of trial must be determined by the conditions existing at the time of the appearance of the party demanding the change. Buell v. Dodge, supra; Remington S. M. Co. v. Cole, 62 Cal. 318.

The order is affirmed.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 110*)—LEASE—REPUDIATION.

A mere threat on the part of a tenant that he would not be bound further by the lease was not a repudiation of it authorizing the recovery of damages from him, where he continued to occupy the premises and did not actually default in the performance of any of the conditions of his contract.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by Byron L. Oliver, for whom after his death Gertrude Oliver, his executrix, was substituted, against Fred R. Loydon. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Grant Jackson, for appellant. M. K. Young, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment given by the trial court in favor of defendant on the pleadings; the motion for such judgment being based on the ground, among others, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The action was instituted on April 10, 1909, to recover the sum of $455. The complaint showed substantially the following facts: On November 14, 1908, plaintiff's testator leased to defendant by an instrument in writing certain real property for the term of one year, commencing November 15, 1908, and ending November 14, 1909, in consideration of which defendant agreed to pay as rent $780 in monthly installments of $65, payable in advance on the 15th day of each month during said term, and also agreed that he would keep the premises in good order and repair and pay all water, gas, electric light, and telephone rates. On November 15, 1908, defendant entered into the sole and exclusive possession of said premises, "and has ever since remained therein, and has paid all rents thereon up to and including the month beginning the 15th day of March, 1909, together with" the expenses of repairs and other sums agreed by him to be paid. "On or about the 9th day of April, 1909, the defendant renounced and repudiated the said lease and notified the plaintiff that he would no longer be bound thereby, and that he did then and there refuse and would continually refuse to pay any further rental accruing under said lease" or the other expenses and charges provided therein. It was further alleged "that the premises of the kind and character described in said written lease are not rentable during the months of April, May, June, July, August, September, or October of any year; that plaintiff is and will be unable to rent said premises during said months; and that he will be compelled to permit said premises to remain unoccupied and unrented." It was also alleged "that there is now unpaid upon said lease the monthly installment of $65 per month for the months beginning April 15, 1909, and ending November 14, 1909, and amounting to the sum of" $455. Judgment was sought for that amount.

It will be observed from the foregoing that it is affirmatively shown by the complaint that, at the time of the commencement of this action, April 10, 1909, first, there was nothing due from defendant to plaintiff's testator on account of the rents agreed to be paid, and defendant had not committed any breach of any provision of the lease; and, second, that defendant had not abandoned or removed from the premises, but was still in possession thereof.

[1] It is settled by the recent decision in Bradbury v. Higginson (L. A. No. 2,885), 123 Pac. 797, that the repudiation of a lease by the lessee does not operate at once to mature all the rent reserved in the lease and to enable the lessor to recover, not only the installments already accrued, but those to accrue in the future. In that case it was said as to this proposition: "But the proposition cannot be successfully maintained. It finds no support in the authorities with the exception of a few cases decided in Louisiana, a jurisdiction which is largely governed by the doctrines of the civil law. The general common-law rule is that rent, as such, is not payable until it falls due under the lease, and this rule is not altered by the fact that the tenant has abandoned the premises and notified the landlord that he will repudiate the lease. Nicholes v. Swift, 118 Ga. 922, 45 S. E. 708. Viewing the action as one for rent, it is not distinguishable, in principle, from Tatum v. Ackerman, 148 Cal. 357 [83 Pac. 151, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 908, 113 Am. St. Rep. 276, 7 Ann. Cas. 511]." This statement is equally applicable here, even if we assume that a repudiation of the lease was shown by the complaint. According to the complaint, there was no rent due at the time of the commencement of the action.

[2] Viewing the action as one for damages caused plaintiff's testator by a repudiation of the lease, it was said in the opinion in Bradbury v. Higginson, supra: "When a lease is repudiated and the premises abandoned, the landlord may pursue one of two courses: He may rest upon his contract and sue his tenant as each installment of rent, or the whole thereof, becomes due; or he may take possession of the premises and recover damages, which damages will be the difference between what he may be able to rent the premises for and the price agreed to be paid under the lease." The complaint in the case at bar differs from that in Bradbury v. Higginson, supra, in that it does allege facts showing damage in the event that defendant does not perform his contract. But, notwithstanding the general allegation that defendant "renounced and repudiated the said lease," the complaint affirmatively shows that there had been no actual repudiation of the lease; nothing more, in fact, than a mere threat on the part of defendant that he would not be further bound thereby, notwithstanding which he continued to occupy the premises, and did not actually default in the performance of any of the conditions of his contract. As said by the District Court of Appeal in deciding this case, it thus appears that "there was no repudiation of the demised estate under the lease, but merely a repudiation of the obligation to pay the rent not yet due," and also, we may add, a repudiation of the obligation to pay other charges not yet due. In other words, whatever the defendant may have said, he had never surrendered or offered to surrender possession of the demised premises, and was still in possession thereof under his lease, without having actually defaulted in the performance of any covenant or condition thereof, and was entitled to continue in such possession as long as he actually performed, as they accrued, the various obligations imposed upon him by the lease. As said by Justice James in his concurring opinion filed in this case in the District Court of Appeal, the facts shown by the complaint "are inconsistent with the general allegation found in the complaint that * * * the defendant renounced and repudiated the said lease." It follows from what we have said that no cause of action for damages was shown by the complaint. Therefore the action of the court in granting the motion for judgment on the pleadings was correct.

The judgment is affirmed.

CONNER v. BLODGET. (Civ. 1,092.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 474*)—ATTORNEY'S FEES—ALLOWANCE—PLEADINGS.

An answer, in an action on a note, which merely denies that $500 is a reasonable attorney's fee in the collection of the note and prosecution of the suit as alleged in the complaint, setting forth the note stipulating for attorney's fees, admits that any sum less than $500 is a reasonable fee, and the court finding that $300 is a reasonable fee finds an amount within the admission in the answer.

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 534*)—ATTORNEY'S FEES—ALLOWANCE.

Where an action on a note was brought by an attorney who signed the complaint which set out the note stipulating for attorney's fees incurred in the collection thereof, and which alleged that a specified sum was a reasonable attorney's fee in the collection of the note and prosecution of the action, the court could, when the nature and extent of the services rendered by the attorney were shown, fix a reasonable compensation without hearing any expert evidence thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by C. L. Conner against H. A. Blodget. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. L. Foster, for appellant. George E. Whitaker, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This is an action brought upon a promissory note, executed by defendant, which contained the agreement of appellant to pay, in addition to the principal sum and interest, "all legal expenses and attorney's fees which may be incurred in the collection of this note." Plaintiff set out in his complaint the note in hæc verba, alleged the nonpayment of the balance due thereon, and with reference to the matter of attorney's fees alleged as follows: "That $500 is a reasonable fee to be allowed plaintiff as attorney's fees in the collection of said note and prosecution of this suit." To this complaint defendant filed an answer which contained only the following denial: "Denies that $500 is a reasonable fee to be allowed the plaintiff as attorney's fee in the collection of said note and prosecution of this suit in any manner, or otherwise, or at all." This being the state of the pleadings, a motion was made on behalf of plaintiff for judgment without trial, which motion was granted by the court, and judgment was thereupon entered for the amount of principal and interest due, together with $300 as attorney's fees and costs.

[1] Defendant on this appeal taken from that judgment makes the contention that, under the allegations of the complaint, it was not shown that any attorney's fees had been incurred, and that therefore there was no jurisdiction in the court to award to the plaintiff judgment for any amount on that account. By his answer defendant denied only that the amount of $500 was a reasonable attorney's fee to be allowed. The denial in that form admitted, of course, that any sum less than $500 was a reasonable fee, and the court by its judgment found the sum of $300 to be a reasonable fee, which was an amount within that admitted by appellant to be reasonable. In the case of Prescott v. Grady, 91 Cal. 518, 27 Pac. 755, the denial there made by the defendant to a like demand was "that $75, or any other sum, is a reasonable attorney's fee." In that case the court said: "We think, under this answer, defendant could have shown either that plaintiff was not entitled to any fee, as in Bank of Woodland v. Treadwell, 55 Cal. 379, or could have been heard as to what would have been a reasonable fee; and perhaps might have made some other defense." The denial made in that case by the defendant covered every amount asserted by the complaint to be a reasonable fee, which the denial here, as we have pointed out, did not do.

[2] Neither do we think that it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to allege and show by express proof that an attorney had been employed and an agreement had been made to pay him before the court was authorized to make an allowance for attorney's fees as having been "incurred" by the plaintiff. As affecting that question, the facts in this case are very similar to those disclosed by the opinion in the case of Alexander v. McDow, 108 Cal. 25, 41 Pac. 24. There the note provided that there should be paid "ten per cent. of total amount due for attorney's fees incurred in the collection of this note, when collection is made by attorney or other officer." In that case the complaint contained no allegation that attorney's fees had been incurred, and the court said: "We think, also, that there is sufficient in the complaint to support the allowance of attorney's fees. The note, which is set forth in full, provides for them, and the prayer of the complaint asks for them, and the action is brought by an attorney at law. The sum asked as attorney's fees is susceptible of exact determination by simple mathematical calculation. It is fairly deducible from the complaint, therefore, that plaintiff asks an allowance of a specific sum as being reasonable and due for attorney's fees under the contract. It is true that this demand is in the nature of special damages, the allowance of which might have been contested by defendant. Prescott v. Grady, 91 Cal. 518, 27 Pac. 755. But his default admits the truth of the matters pleaded, and must therefore be construed to admit that the amount claimed is both reasonable and due. Thus no evidence was required to be taken for the purpose of fixing that amount." It appears from the record in this case that the action was brought by an attorney at law, who signed the complaint and also appeared in court and presented the motion for judgment on the pleadings. The court was authorized, when the nature and extent of the services rendered by the attorney were made to appear from the papers and proceedings had, or by other evidence, to fix such an amount as would be a reasonable compensation for such services without hearing any expert evidence thereon. Spencer v. Collins, 156 Cal. 298, 104 Pac. 320, 20 Ann. Cas. 49. For the reasons stated, we think that under the pleadings the judgment as entered by the court was fully authorized.

The judgment is affirmed.

WENDLING LUMBER CO. v. GLENWOOD LUMBER CO. (Civ. 947.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 4, 1912. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 3, 1912.)

JURY (§ 25*)—RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL—DEMAND.

A rule of court provides that trial by jury is waived where a party does not demand the same either before or at the time a cause is set down upon the trial calendar, and does not deposit the jury fee within five days of the demand. After the first trial of an action, plaintiff demanded a jury and tendered the fee, and, though plaintiff's demand was refused, the cause was reset for a later date, and plaintiff, when the case was tried, excepted to the court's refusal of a jury trial, having again demanded a jury on the date of the trial. Held, that plaintiff's original demand, though not formally renewed after the court's refusal and the resetting of the case, entitled it to trial by jury; it being apparent that plaintiff still relied on that demand.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by the Wendling Lumber Company against the Glenwood Lumber Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Louis, Brownstone, Stratton & Kaufman, and Nicholas Bowden, for appellant. Walter H. Linforth, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The only question involved herein is whether the lower court erred in denying plaintiff's demand for a jury. The action, brought to recover the sum of $6,500 for the conversion of certain lumber, was begun on the 25th day of November, 1903, and on the 26th day of September, 1904, was tried before Hon. H. B. Tuttle and a jury, and a verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff. Thereafter a motion for a new trial was granted by Hon. J. R. Welch on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. An appeal was taken and this order affirmed by the Supreme Court. 153 Cal. 411, 95 Pac. 1029. When the action was originally set for trial, a demand was made by plaintiff for a jury, and the proper entry was made in the minutes of the court. On the 24th day of September, 1909, the case was reset, and at that time no additional demand was made for a jury. The case was called for trial on the 29th day of November, 1909; there being no jury in attendance. Plaintiff then demanded a jury and deposited the requisite fee. The demand was opposed by defendant on the ground that, under a rule of the court, the plaintiff, by failure to make the demand at the time the case was set for trial, had waived the right to a jury. The said rule provides that "trial by jury is deemed waived by a party who does not demand the same, either before or at the time when the cause is set down upon the trial calendar, and also does not, within five days after such demand, deposit with the clerk the fees for twelve jurors for one day." The court sustained defendant's contention and denied plaintiff's demand. The case was then continued until February 7, 1910, for further hearing. In the meantime plaintiff moved the court to vacate its order of November 29, 1909, denying a jury. This motion was heard December 29, 1909, and was denied. Thereafter the action came on for trial April 10, 1910, and plaintiff renewed the demand for a jury with the same result as before. Plaintiff thereupon declined to introduce any evidence, and judgment went for defendant.

Much argument is devoted by counsel to the consideration whether such a rule can be given effect to deprive a party of his constitutional right to a jury trial, and also to the question whether the rule represents a reasonable exercise of whatever power of regulation in this respect may be committed to a trial court. Among the cases cited in this connection are the following decisions of the Supreme Court of this state: Biggs v. Lloyd, 70 Cal. 448, 11 Pac. 831; Conneau v. Geis, 73 Cal. 176, 14 Pac. 580, 2 Am. St. Rep. 785; Swasey v. Adair, 88 Cal. 179, 25

Pac. 1119; Farwell v. Murray, 104 Cal. 467, 38 Pac. 199; Bank of Lassen v. Sherer, 108 Cal. 516, 41 Pac. 415; Adams v. Crawford, 116 Cal. 495, 48 Pac. 488; Platt v. Havens, 119 Cal. 247, 51 Pac. 342; Ferreira v. Chabot, 121 Cal. 233, 53 Pac. 689, 1092; Naphtaly v. Rovegno, 130 Cal. 639, 63 Pac. 66, 621.

We deem it unnecessary, however, to decide between these opposing contentions of the parties, or to review the authorities cited, as we are satisfied that, under a fair construction of said rule as applied to the peculiar circumstances of the case, plaintiff should have been accorded a jury trial as requested. Granting, for the sake of the argument, that the rule is within the power of the court to adopt, it could be justified as a reasonable regulation as to the demand for a jury only upon the ground, as stated by respondent, that "the orderly business of the court may proceed and causes tried at the times they are set," and as to the deposit, for the reason stated by the Supreme Court in Conneau v. Geis, supra, that it affords "a reasonable precaution to prevent the jurors from being defrauded by unscrupulous parties and to prevent the demand of a jury being used as a pretext to obtain continuances and thus trifle with justice."

But it is apparent that no purpose of the rule could have been thwarted or imperiled if plaintiff's demand, under the circumstances already narrated, had been allowed. After said demand was made, the cause was continued by consent for more than two months. As a matter of fact, indeed, by reason of subsequent events, the case is brought clearly within the requirement of said rule. As far as the demand and the deposit of the jury fee are concerned, when the case was reset for trial the situation was exactly the same as when the original order setting it was made. In fact, it can be said that, upon the very day that the cause was set for trial, plaintiff made its demand and deposit as required by the rule. When the case was called for trial, plaintiff made application for a continuance on the ground of the absence of certain witnesses. It was opposed by respondent; one of the reasons being stated by counsel as follows: "Under the rules and under the decisions they have waived a trial here by jury. I tell you frankly I don't want to try this case before a jury if I can avoid it." The trial judge, among other things, said: "Whatever disposition the court will make of this motion for a continuance, it will not place it upon a condition that the continuance will be granted provided one party or the other must waive a jury." The chief counsel for plaintiff, Mr. Brownstone, then stated to the court: "I had not the slightest idea that there would not be a jury here." Before that he had said: "Now it appears that there is no jury in attendance this morning, and we do desire a jury in this matter." Considerable discussion then ensued, during which the court called attention to the aforesaid rule, and Mr. Brownstone said: "I want to convince your honor that I had no idea there would not be a jury here this morning. I am not making the motion for a continuance, or did not let the thing wait, not to have a jury here so that we could ask a continuance. Mr. Linforth asked me if we expected a jury, and I says, yes, we wanted a jury, we would not waive a jury." Then Mr. Bowden, associate counsel for plaintiff, requested a continuance, stating, inter alia, that "it seems to me that under all the circumstances of the case it would not be unfair to say to your honor, and I ask at this time that, even if we are forced to go on with it, take until to-morrow morning, and then your honor in the meantime could have a jury drawn and have a jury here to-morrow morning." The court replied: "That is passed, Mr. Bowden. We have passed that milestone." Mr. Brownstone: "Before your honor makes that ruling, will it be deemed that I have offered the fees for the jury? I make the offer of $40, to deposit $40." And it was agreed that the money might be deemed deposited. The case was then set for February 7th; Mr. Linforth stating that "by my consent to the continuance to that time, without calling any witness on behalf of the plaintiff or the plaintiff offering any proof, no advantage of that fact will be taken between now and the 7th of February, and without making any demand for jury, or tendering any fees, will there?" Mr. Bowden: "Of course, if the judge has committed an error, it is preserved to us. Isn't that so, Mr. Brownstone?" Mr. Brownstone: "Yes, I think that is all right." Mr. Bowden: "We will take leave to have the record show a record of an exception to the denial of the jury."

There is thus exhibited a continuous transaction during which plaintiff makes the demand and deposit for a jury and the cause is reset for trial. There is no pretense that plaintiff waived its right to a jury, or that there was any rescission from its demand. Plaintiff was all the time insisting upon its claim, and it was so understood by all the parties.

If it should be conceded that the court was justified under the rule in denying the application before the case was reset, yet immediately thereafter it should have reconsidered the matter and granted the request. The demand and deposit were still operative and before the court. It was not necessary to formally renew them, since it appears that plaintiff was still relying upon them. The demand must be considered as a continuous refusal to waive the right to a jury. It was not necessary to repeat the demand. Swasey v. Adair, supra.

The understanding of defendant that no other demand and deposit would be made thereafter is, also, it may be said, beside the question. Why should plaintiff be required to repeat the performance in order to secure his constitutional right? At the time the cause was reset, the record of the court showed that the demand and the deposit for the jury had been made, and that is all that the rule requires. If it is to be given the exceedingly technical application contended for by respondent, it should be declared without hesitation unreasonable and invalid. The truth is it should be construed liberally in favor of the person demanding a jury in a case like this.

We think the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

Where plaintiff paid the consideration for a deed on the belief that defendant had title to the premises, and thereafter it appeared that she had no title because the conveyance to her was a forgery, plaintiff was entitled to recover the consideration as money paid under a mistake of fact under Civ. Code, § 1577, subd. 2, providing that mistake of fact is a mistake not caused by neglect of a legal duty, and consisting in the belief of the present existence of a thing material to the contract which does not exist or in the past existence of a thing which has not existed.

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 108*)—FAILURE OF TITLE—RESCISSI—“MISTAKE OF FACT.”

Where a grantor had no title because her interest rested on a forged deed, her grantee was entitled to rescind under Civ. Code, § 1689, authorizing a rescission if the consent of the party rescinding has been given by mistake, or if the consideration becomes entirely void from any cause.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Action by W. J. Horne against Ida D. Hughes. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Hanson, Hackler & Heath, for appellant. Denio & Hart, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. The allegations of the complaint, in substance, are these: Plaintiff bought of defendant an undivided half interest in a tract of land at Wilmington, paying therefor the sum of $675, defendant executing to plaintiff a bargain and sale deed. At the time of the sale and conveyance the defendant represented to plaintiff that she had a good and perfect title to the land and authority to sell and convey the same. Plaintiff relied upon these representations, and believed them to be true, and upon the faith thereof paid the purchase price, and accepted the conveyance. As a matter of fact, defendant had no title to said premises, and owned no interest therein; that she believed at the time, as did plaintiff, that a certain conveyance theretofore made under which she claimed title was valid, but in truth the same was a forgery, and defendant by reason thereof derived no title on account of such conveyance; that plaintiff did not discover this fact until in the year 1908, when such deed so made to defendant was by a court of competent jurisdiction declared to be invalid and a forgery. The action was brought to recover the amount of the purchase price so paid, with interest. A general demurrer was interposed to the complaint, which was by the court below sustained, and the complaint not being amended, judgment was rendered in favor of defendant for costs. From this judgment plaintiff appeals.

[1] It clearly appears from the averments of the complaint that the money paid in consideration of the execution of the deed and the whole transaction was occasioned by a mutual mistake of fact and such an one as is contemplated by subdivision 2 of section 1577 of the Civil Code.

[2] Section 1689 of the Civil Code confers the right of rescission, if the consent of the party rescinding was given by mistake, or if the consideration becomes entirely void from any cause. This transaction clearly comes within the provisions of the above named sections. Hartwig v. Clark, 138 Cal. 671, 72 Pac. 149. Defendant having no interest in the premises, her deed conveying none to plaintiff, no necessity existed for a reconveyance or tender thereof before the action was brought. Plaintiff received nothing which he could tender back, and defendant parted with nothing that she was entitled to have tendered to her as a condition precedent to the bringing of the action. We are of the opinion that the complaint stated a good cause of action, and that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer thereto.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

To relieve a guarantor of a note from liability on the ground of an extension of the time of payment, there must be a binding ex-

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by W. E. Dean against the Sedan Milling Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant H. W. Postlethwaite appeals. Affirmed.

G. F. Hatton and Hartley F. Peart, for appellant. A. F. St. Sure and J. Leonard Rose, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff commenced the action to recover the principal and interest of a certain promissory note, executed by defendant, Sedan Milling Company, dated September 3, 1908, for $2,000, payable 90 days after date to the Central Bank or order, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, payable monthly. The Central Bank assigned the note to plaintiff, who brings the action. Defendant Postlethwaite indorsed the note as follows: "For value received, I hereby guarantee the payment of the within note at maturity or at any time thereafter with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, until paid, waiving demand, notice of nonpayment and protest." Upon sufficient evidence the court made the following finding: "(6) That said note, together with the interest thereon, became due on the 2d day of December, 1908, and that the same was presented to the said Sedan Milling Company for payment thereof after said 2d day of December, 1908, and payment thereof demanded, but that the same was not paid except the sum of $40, which said sum was the interest on said note up to the said 2d day of December, 1908. That shortly after said 2d day of December, 1908, said Central Bank of Oakland entered into an oral agreement with the said Sedan Milling Company, without any notice to, and without the consent of, the said defendant H. W. Postlethwaite, whereby and wherein the said Central Bank of Oakland extended the time of payment of said promissory note as follows: $1,000 and the interest on said $2,000 at the same rate of interest as provided in said note, to wit, 8 per cent. per annum to be paid on the 2d day of January, 1909, and the balance of $1,000 with the same rate of interest as provided in said note, to wit, 8 per cent. per annum to be paid on the 2d day of February, 1909. That said Central Bank of Oakland and said Sedan Milling Company did not give said defendant, H. W. Postlethwaite, any notice of said oral extension of time, and that said defendant, H. W. Postlethwaite, did not at any time consent thereto. That said Sedan Milling Company did not pay said sum of $1,000 and interest on said $2,000, or any part thereof, on said 2d day of January, 1909, or at any other time. That on or about said 2d day of January, 1909, said Central Bank of Oakland demanded payment of said $1,000 together with the interest on the said $2,000 from said Sedan Milling Company, and that said Sedan Milling Company did not pay said sum and interest, or any part thereof. That on or about the 8th day of January, 1909, notice of nonpayment by said Sedan Milling Company of said note and interest was given to the said defendant, H. W. Postlethwaite, and payment of said note together with the interest thereon was demanded of said defendant, H. W. Postlethwaite, but the same was not paid." As conclusion of law the court found "that the oral extension of time of payment of principal and interest of said note mentioned in paragraph 6 of the findings of fact is void." Plaintiff had judgment from which and from the order denying his motion for a new trial defendant Postlethwaite appeals.

The foregoing finding of fact and conclusion of law present the principal question in the case, namely, Was the oral extension of time of the payment of the note void?

[1] Appellant, correctly, we think, states the rule that, in order to relieve the guarantor from liability, there must be a valid extension of time for a definite period, and there must exist the mutual promises, first, by the lender to forbear his right to full payment during the period of extension; second, by the debtor to retain the money for the extended time, and such extension must be supported by a sufficient consideration.

Where the agreement makes no change in the terms of the contract, and no additional burden is put upon the debtor, the creditor merely extending the time of payment, the decisions are in conflict as to whether such an agreement is supported by a sufficient consideration. Appellant cites Nelson v. Flagg, 18 Wash. 39, 50 Pac. 571, as presenting his view of the question. The court there said: "The effect of the indorsement in this case, in the light of the finding that it was at the maker's request and with his consent, was to postpone the time of payment for one year. The consideration flowing to the holder was the implied promise of the maker to pay interest during the full period of the extension, at the rate expressed in the instrument; and the promise of the holder to forbear suit for a definite period constituted a good consideration for the agreement upon the part of the maker to pay interest for such full period. Here are all the elements of a valid contract, and, upon principle, we are unable to see why such an agreement should not be sustained." The court expresses its unwillingness to agree with what it says is "the reasoning so often advanced by courts holding a contrary doctrine—that the maker under such circumstances assumes no additional obligation, that the note by its terms binds him to pay interest until the note is paid." Mr. Brandt says: "It seems the better opinion that the surety is thereby discharged. The reasoning upon which this rule is founded has been thus well expressed: 'It is a valuable right to have the privilege at any time of getting rid of the payment of interest by discharging the principal. By this contract the right to interest is secured for a definite period, and the right to pay off the principal and get rid of paying the interest is also relinquished for such period. Here then are all the elements of a binding contract'"—citing cases in footnote. Continuing, the author says: "Notwithstanding this reasoning seems invincible, the contrary has been repeatedly held, the ground upon which these decisions is founded being that the promise of the principal to pay the interest for the extended period creates no additional obligation upon him, as he would have been obliged to pay the interest without any new agreement if the time had not been given"—citing cases. Brandt on Suretyship & Guaranty, vol. 1, § 388 (3d Ed.). It would be difficult to determine where the weight of the decisions lies, if it were to depend upon the number of cases decided on each side, for they are pretty equally divided. We have a statute which must be taken into account in dealing with the question. Section 2819 of the Civil Code provides as follows: "A guarantor is exonerated, except so far as he may be indemnified by the principal, if by any act of the creditor, without the consent of the guarantor, the original obligation of the principal is altered in any respect, or the remedies or rights of the creditor against the principal, in respect thereto, in any way impaired or suspended." And section 2820 provides: "A promise by a creditor, which for any cause is void, or voidable by him at his option, does not alter the obligation or suspend or impair the remedy, within the meaning of the last section." Mere delay on the part of the creditor to proceed against the principal does not exonerate a guarantor. Section 2823.

[2] We are thus brought back to the question whether the promise of plaintiff was for any cause void. If it lacked consideration it was void, and the guarantor was not exonerated. The promise of forbearance leaves the obligation unchanged, and it remains the same as when guaranteed. By the terms of the guaranty the guarantor guaranteed "the payment of the within note at maturity or at any time thereafter with interest at 8 per cent. per annum until paid," contemplating, by the very terms of the guaranty, it seems to us, the contingency that the note might not be paid at maturity. The fact that the forbearance was without notice to or consent of the guarantor lends no weight to his claim to exoneration, for he waived "demand, notice of nonpayment, and protest." The promise to pay interest during the time of forbearance was held, in Reynolds v. Ward, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 501, to be "no consideration" for the agreement to forbear when the debtor is already bound to pay interest; such an extension does not release the guarantor or surety. In Davis v. Stout, 126 Ind. 12, 25 N. E. 862, 22 Am. St. Rep. 505, where the time of payment was extended, the court said: "The contract is not valid, for the reason that it is without consideration. It does not belong to the class of contracts in which a consideration is implied, nor do the recitals show a consideration; neither is there any extrinsic averment showing a valid consideration for the agreement of forbearance. The principal and interest of the note were due when the payments were made and the agreement extending the time of payment entered into; hence it is plain that the payors of the note neither did anything that they were not already under a binding obligation to do, nor undertook to do anything that they were not already bound to perform. * * * The surety is in no better situation than his principal, if it be true that the contract of forbearance was without consideration, * * * for, where there is no consideration for the contract, the surety will not be released." Many cases to like effect might be cited.

Turning to the California decisions, McCann v. Lewis, 9 Cal. 246, was a case where the time of payment of a promissory note was extended provided the interest was paid at the end of every twelve months. Said the court, by Field, J.: "The agreement for the extension of time for the payment of the principal of the note was without consideration. It conferred no rights which the holder did not possess." In Liening v. Gould, 13 Cal. 598, the maker of the promissory note set up as a defense that the holder had agreed to extend the time of payment on payment of part of the note then due. The court held that there was no consideration for the alleged agreement of extension. In Hughes v. Davis, 40 Cal. 117, the principle was declared that an agreement to extend the time of payment could not be enforced for want of consideration.

In Stroud v. Thomas, 139 Cal. 274, 72 Pac. 1008, 96 Am. St. Rep. 111, the surety on a promissory note sought exoneration on the ground, among others, that the principal extended the time of payment of the note for a valuable consideration. The consideration relied on was the payment of overdue interest. Said the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Shaw: "The money paid was due to the plaintiff by reason of the previous obligation. No additional benefit was received by the plaintiff and none could be conferred by the principal debtor by the payment of money on the obligation already existing and past due. * * * A promise made without a consideration is not binding. Consequently, the agreement for the extension of time was not a valid promise, and would not bind the plaintiff to forbear suit upon the note during the time specified in the agreement." Appellant contends that the facts were entirely different in the Stroud Case from the facts here. The only substantial difference that we can see is that a payment of interest already due was made which the court held was not a consideration. But it was also claimed, as showing a consideration, that there was an agreement to forbear suit, and on this point the court expressly said "the agreement for the extension of time was not a valid promise and could not bind the plaintiff to forbear suit during the time specified in the agreement."

[3] It may be that our Supreme Court has not had the precise question so clearly before it as is here presented, but we think the trend of its decisions is towards that class of cases in which it has been held that an agreement to forbear suit for a definite period, the obligation remaining unchanged, is not supported by sufficient consideration and does not discharge the guarantor.

[4] Another element is brought into the case. The contract (promissory note) is in writing, and section 1698 of the Civil Code provides: "A contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing or by an oral executed agreement, and not otherwise." And section 1661 provides: "An executed contract is one, the object of which is fully performed. All others are executory." Appellant claims that, one year having elapsed before suit was brought, the agreement was executed, at least, in part, by the creditor, and this was sufficient although no payment was made as agreed. If, as we hold, there was no consideration for the agreement and it was void, it is not easy to see how it was made valid by mere forbearance to sue, for there was in law nothing to execute. There is no element of estoppel here. Appellant had no knowledge of the agreement, did nothing by reason of it, and was not prejudiced by it. However this may be, can it be said that the agreement was executed in part? An "executed contract" is one in which both parties have fully performed the terms of the contract; a contract performed on one side only is not an executed contract. 9 Cyc. 244; 7 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 95; 1 Page on Contracts, § 18. In Pearsall v. Henry, 153 Cal. 315, 325, 95 Pac. 154, 157, the court, through Mr. Justice Sloss, said: "According to section 1661 of the Civil Code, an executed agreement is one 'the object of which is fully performed. All others are executory.' * * * An oral agreement altering a written agreement is not executed unless its terms have been fully performed. Performance on the one side is not sufficient. There must be a complete execution of the obligation of both parties in order to bring the modification within the terms of the statute"—citing numerous cases. See, also, Henahan v. Hart, 127 Cal. 656, 60 Pac. 426.

It is contended that findings 9, 10, and 11 are not supported by the evidence. These findings are to the effect that certain averments of the answer were untrue. If the court had held the agreement to forbear suit, as set forth in finding 6, supra, to have been valid, appellant's contention would have some foundation. But having found the facts and that they did not constitute a valid agreement, the averments of the answer were untrue in the sense they were used. And for like reason there is no conflict between finding 6 and these other findings.

No other question is presented in appellant's opening brief.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

DORE et al. v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

FOLGER v. SAME.

(S. F. 5,779 and 5,780.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1912.
Rehearing Denied July 26, 1912.)1. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 7*)—STATUTORY "ARBITRATION"—COMMON-LAW ARBITRATION.

An agreement to submit to arbitration the value of real estate sought to be acquired by a railroad company is not an agreement for a statutory arbitration, within Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1281-1290, authorizing the submission to arbitration "of any controversy which might be the subject of an action" except a question of title to real property, but it is an agreement for a common-law arbitration to afford the parties a hearing and an opportunity to offer evidence to enable the arbitrators to adjudge the value on a consideration of the evidence as well as their own opinion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 487-489.]

2. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 7*)—STATUTORY ARBITRATION—COMMON-LAW ARBITRATION.

An agreement to submit to arbitration a matter arbitrable only at common law, providing that the agreement shall be taken to be a submission within Code Civ. Proc. § 1283, and may be entered as an order of the court, gives the parties the right to arbitrate the controversy pursuant to the statutory mode, but it does not give the clerk of the court power to enter judgment as provided in section 1286 or give the court jurisdiction of such a matter, but the agreement is binding as a common-law arbitration agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

3. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 7*)—COMMON-LAW ARBITRATION—WAIVER OF STIPULATIONS.

A stipulation in an agreement to submit to arbitration a matter arbitrable at common law only, that the agreement shall be taken to be a submission within Code Civ. Proc. § 1283, providing for statutory arbitration, and the matter be entered as an order of court, may be waived, since it derives its force from the agreement and not from the statute as such, and where the parties proceeded with the arbitration, introduced evidence before the arbitrators, and proceeded to an award without objection on the ground that the submission had not been entered as an order of court, the parties, knowing the facts, waived any right to cause a submission to be so entered, and the award must be deemed binding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

4. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§§ 68, 46*)—COMMON-LAW ARBITRATION—FAILURE OF ARBITRATORS TO BE SWORN—WAIVER.

The failure of arbitrators in a common-law arbitration to be sworn and to serve a signed copy of the award, as required by the statute, providing for a statutory arbitration, may be waived by the parties, and, where they appeared before the arbitrators and several days were occupied in the hearings, and neither party objected on the ground that the arbitrators had not been sworn, and the parties entered into negotiations for the payment of the award, the parties waived the fact that the arbitrators were not sworn and did not serve a signed copy of the award.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. §§ 343-351, 230-243; Dec. Dig. §§ 68, 46.*]

5. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 121*)—TITLE OF VENDOR—EVIDENCE.

An agreement to arbitrate the value of real estate sought to be taken by a railroad company, and to purchase at the value found, recited that plaintiffs were the owners of the land. Plaintiffs, suing for specific performance, introduced in evidence judgments under St. 1906, p. 78, adjudging them to be the owners. The company did not show affirmatively any defect in the title of plaintiffs, and there was nothing to show that any appeal had been taken from the judgments. Held, to show that the plaintiffs were the owners at the time of the agreement to arbitrate, and at the time of the trial, authorizing judgment in favor of plaintiffs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 191-198; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

6. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 95*)—TITLE OF VENDOR—SUFFICIENCY—EFFECT.

An objection that a party who agreed to sell real estate at a value to be determined by arbitrators did not have title of record cannot be sustained where the parties, at the time of the agreement, knew that the records of the title had been destroyed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 191-198; Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

7. RECORDS (§ 22*)—REAL PROPERTY—TITLE—RECORD TITLE.

The destruction of the record title to real estate does not destroy the vested title nor deprive the owner of his title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Records, Cent. Dig. §§ 45-47; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

8. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 129*)—CONTRACTS—RIGHTS OF PARTIES.

Where time is not of the essence of a contract, and there is a positive agreement by a party thereto to purchase land, and not a mere option depending on the sufficiency of the showing of title, it is enough if the vendor is in fact the owner in fee, unincumbered at the time of performance or at the time of decree compelling performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 238-244, 249; Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

9. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 49*)—CONTRACTS FOR SALE OF REAL ESTATE—VALUABLE CONSIDERATION.

One seeking specific performance of an executory agreement for the sale of real estate must allege and prove, as required by Civ. Code, § 3391, that the consideration is adequate and that the agreement is just and reasonable, but where a party, with knowledge of the facts, freely enters into a contract without any unfair advantage being taken of him, the contract is not inequitable as to him, but is subject to specific performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 140-151; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

10. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 59*)—CONTRACTS—PERFORMANCE.

An agreement to buy land at a price to be fixed by arbitration is not complete until an award has been made, and it may then be enforced in the same manner as if the parties had agreed on the price and inserted it in the agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 181; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

11. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 59*) — CONTRACTS FOR SALE OF REAL ESTATE—VALUABLE CONSIDERATION.

Where an agreement to purchase land bound the purchaser to pay a price to be fixed by arbitration, and arbitrators on a hearing fixed the value and their award was not impeached in any particular, the contract could be specifically enforced because the award was prima facie evidence of adequate consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 181; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

12. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 837*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE — STATEMENTS OF FACTS IN BRIEFS OF COUNSEL.

The court on appeal cannot take notice of facts which rest merely on the assertion of counsel in the briefs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 837.*]

13. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 121*) — CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE—AGREEMENT TO SUBMIT TO ARBITRATION—TITLE.

An agreement was made to submit to common-law arbitration the value of real estate sought to be taken by a railroad company, and when the arbitration was concluded the company authorized its attorneys to examine the title of the alleged owner and determine its sufficiency. The attorneys determined that the title offered was satisfactory as based on a judgment under St. 1906, p. 81, providing that a judgment establishing title shall be binding on all existing claimants of any interest in the property, and persons claiming through them. No change occurred in the condition of the titles between the dates when the deeds to the company were tendered, and the time of the institution of the suits resulting in such judgment. There was no evidence to impeach the title of the alleged owner. Held to justify a finding that the alleged owner owned the premises, entitling him to compel specific performance of the agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 387-395; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

14. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—HARMLESS ERROR — ERRONEOUS ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The error, if any, in admitting evidence of a fact conclusively proved by other evidence is not prejudicial.

15. CORPORATIONS (§ 425*) — EXISTENCE OF RELATION.

Where a railroad company held out to the world persons as its agents authorized to do the business necessary for the acquisition of land, the company was bound by the acts of the agents, and a party seeking to hold the company liable need not show a resolution of the board of directors specifically authorizing every detail of the business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1697-1701, 1705; Dec. Dig. § 425.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; F. J. Murasky, Judge.

Actions by Ellen Dore and by Clara E. Folger against the Southern Pacific Company. From judgments for plaintiffs in each action, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. F. Herrin and J. E. Foulds (Peter F. Dunne, of counsel), for appellant. Charles S. Wheeler, J. W. Dorsey, and Stratton & Kaufman (J. F. Bowie, of counsel), for respondents.

SHAW, J. In each of these actions the defendant has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The cases depend mainly upon the same facts. They were tried together upon stipulations that the evidence taken should be considered in both cases so far as applicable.

The plaintiffs, respectively, sue to enforce an agreement for the sale of real estate, made by all of the plaintiffs as vendors, and by the defendant as vendee. The agreement and the circumstances under which it was made are peculiar. Two actions for the condemnation of said lands and other lands for railroad purposes were, and still are, pending in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. The Southern Pacific Railroad Company was the plaintiff in each of said actions, and the plaintiffs above named, together with other persons, were the defendants therein, except that the plaintiff Sharp was a party to only one of the actions. The Southern Pacific Railroad Company, it must be noted, is not the same company as the Southern Pacific Company, the defendant appealing herein. The Southern Pacific Company, however, owns a majority of the capital stock of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and it controls the latter company. The condemnation suits were carried on by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company at the direction and for the benefit of the Southern Pacific Company. The agreement aforesaid was made on December 17, 1906, and is as follows: It was first recited that Ellen Dore, Charlotte E. Dore Horrigan, Maurice Dore, and William B. Sharp, who are the plaintiffs in the first case above entitled, owned, or claim to own, interests in certain tracts of land described, and that Clara E. Folger owned a certain other tract in fee and an interest in one of the tracts in which the first-named parties also had interests. It appointed Frank S. Johnson, William Hale, and William Thomas as a board of arbitration, and empowered them to ascertain and determine the value of each separate tract of said land and of each separate interest therein belonging to said parties. The judgment of a majority of said board was to be conclusive. It further provided that, when the awards should be made, the Southern Pacific Company would, within 60 days thereafter, pay to the other parties, respectively, the sums so awarded to said parties, and that the said parties immediately thereupon would each, respectively, convey said parcels of land to said Southern Pacific Company by good and sufficient deeds. It was further provided, with respect to the lands owned or claimed by the plaintiffs in the Dore Case, that the sums fixed as the price thereof by the board of arbitration should be paid into the superior court in one of the condemnation suits above mentioned, being the case No. 1,675, in the superior court, entitled Southern Pacific Railroad Company v. Griffith J. Kinsey et al., and that such payment in the court should discharge said Southern Pacific Company from liability to said parties. Before the award was made, a supplementary agreement was made by the defendant, and the plaintiffs in the Dore Case, reciting that the said plaintiffs did not own the reversionary interest in one of the tracts, and providing that 5 per cent. of the value fixed for said tract by the arbitrators should be deducted and the remainder taken as the value thereof for the purposes of the contract of sale. The board of arbitration made an award fixing the value of the respective parcels of land in question. The respective parties, plaintiffs herein, thereupon tendered to said defendant good and sufficient deeds, duly executed, conveying the several parcels of land in question, and demanded payment of said sums so awarded and agreed on as the price thereof, but the defendant refused and still refuses to pay the same.

These facts are alleged, and the court found that they are true. Judgment was given in each case in favor of the respective plaintiffs enforcing the agreement of sale. As grounds for the reversal of the judgment and orders, the defendant contends that certain of the facts are contrary to the evidence, and that the court below erred in certain rulings at the trial.

[1] The agreement did not provide for a statutory arbitration under the provisions of title 10, pt. 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure. Sections 1281-1290. The matters which fall within the scope of these provisions are those described in section 1281. It reads as follows: "Persons capable of contracting may submit to arbitration any controversy which might be the subject of a civil action between them, except a question of title to real property in fee or for life. This qualification does not include questions relating merely to the partition or boundaries of real property." This section does not authorize the submission of any matter to arbitration except a "controversy which might be the subject of a civil action" between the parties concerned. The only thing submitted was the question of the value of the land. There might be a controversy over such value, of course, but that controversy could not be the subject of an action, and the value when fixed, either by an award, so called, or by an agreement, would, of itself, impose no obligation on either party, or determine anything that could be enforced as a judgment or entered on the judgment book as such, as provided in sections 1283 and 1286. An action will not lie for the mere purpose of fixing the value of property.

At common law it is competent for persons to submit any question or matter of difference between them to the decision of third persons, whether it could be the subject of an action or not, and, when they have done so, the decision will be binding upon them. 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law & Prac. 33. "To furnish a sufficient basis for entering into a submission, no legal cause of action in favor of either party need exist. That there is a dispute, controversy, or honest difference of opinion between them concerning any subject in which they are both interested is enough. Nor, indeed, is it necessary that they should have come to the actual point of a dispute, for a matter simply in doubt may be submitted." Morse on Arbitration, p. 36. Where the thing to be done is merely ministerial, as the casting up of an account, the measurement of timber, or the estimate of the quantity of work done under a contract, the decisions are somewhat at variance on the question whether such a submission is properly an arbitration in which the award, in the absence of fraud, will be conclusive on the parties, or a mere computation for the information of the parties. Ibid. Submissions to determine values are of two kinds: First, where the valuers are to examine the property and fix the value in accordance with their own opinion or judgment; second, where they are to afford the parties a hearing and an opportunity to offer evidence, and are to adjudge the value upon a consideration of the evidence, as well as their own opinion. In cases of the first class, it is usually held that the agreement is not properly a submission to arbitration, and is not subject to the rules which govern arbitrators, and that notice of the meetings of the valuers is not required. Church v. Seitz, 74 Cal. 287, 15 Pac. 839, was a case of this class, and it may be considered as establishing this doctrine in this state. See, also, Stockton, etc., Works v. Glen Falls Ins. Co., 98 Cal. 570, 33 Pac. 633; Foster v. Carr, 135 Cal. 86, 67 Pac. 43.

The agreement for submission in the case at bar was of the second class above mentioned. It expressly provides that the arbitrators should fix a day to begin the taking of testimony and hear the respective parties. Cases of this class are usually held to be common-law arbitrations and subject to the common-law rules on the subject. The distinction is not important, for notice was duly given, the parties appeared, and days were spent in the investigation. The above cases hold that, in the absence of fraud, the decision of persons appointed as mere appraisers or valuers, although not properly or technically an arbitration and award, is binding on the parties. It cannot be disputed that, where an award as to values is to be made after a hearing and upon a judicial investigation and consideration of evidence, as in the case at bar, such award, if regularly made, is final and conclusive upon the parties with respect to the matter submitted. Morse on Arbitration, 487.

[2] The defendant claims that, if the thing submitted does not come within the terms of the statute, then there was no agreement at all, and that the entire proceeding was unauthorized and the award void. This proposition is founded on the following stipulation in the agreement: "This agreement shall be held and taken to be a submission within the meaning of section 1283 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California, and may be entered as an order of the superior court of the state of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco."

The argument is that this stipulation shows that both parties intended that the controversy should be submitted under the statute, that the statute gives the right to have the award vacated for gross error, and to have it modified or corrected for miscalculation or imperfection by a motion made in the proceeding, which remedies are not available against a common-law award, and that, as it cannot be taken as a statutory submission, it cannot be said that the parties did agree, or ever would have agreed, to a common-law submission, that there was no meeting of minds in a valid agreement for any arbitration, and that, to hold the agreement good as a common-law arbitration, would require the court to make a new contract for the parties.

There are a number of cases which hold that where the parties agree to a statutory submission and follow it up by proceeding, or attempting to proceed, in the statutory mode, but because of fatal defects in the procedure the award is invalid, the reasons above stated will prevent it from enforcement by action as an award at common law. Williams v. Walton, 9 Cal. 142; Hepburn v. Jones, 4 Colo. 98; Estep v. Larsh, 16 Ind. 82; Francis v. Ames, 14 Ind. 251; Sargent v. Hampden, 32 Me. 78; Deerfield v. Arms, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 483, 32 Am. Dec. 228; Holdridge v. Stowell, 39 Minn. 360, 40 N. W. 259; Benjamin v. Benjamin, 5 Watts & S. (Pa.) 562. In Williams v. Walton the proceedings were in all respects regular and within the scope of the statute, but the submission and award were declared void because the jurisdiction of the county court, to which it was made, did not extend to awards. The statute giving that court such jurisdiction was itself invalid, being contrary to the Constitution. In all these cases the matter submitted was one which was subject to arbitration under the terms of the statute. There are other cases to the effect that, where upon a submission, avowedly under the statute, the award, or the judgment thereon, is void as a statutory award or judgment, because of a fatal defect in the proceedings, the award will nevertheless be good as a common-law award, and may be enforced by an ordinary action. Galloway v. Gibson, 51 Mich. 135, 16 N. W. 310; Gibson v. Burrows, 41 Mich. 713, 3 N. W. 200; Burnside v. Whitney, 21 N. Y. 148; Darling v. Darling, 16 Wis. 644. We do not find it necessary to attempt to reconcile these cases or to follow strictly the doctrine of either class. The matter to be submitted in this case, as we have seen, was not arbitrable under the statute, but was arbitrable at common law. If the statutory regulations apply at all, it is not because of their force as statutes, but solely because of the agreement of the parties, which, it may be said, makes the statutory provisions a part of the agreement. Such agreement could not give the clerk power to enter judgment, as provided in section 1286, or give the court jurisdiction of such a matter, as of an arbitration proceeding. At most, it could only give the parties the right to have the proceedings before the arbitrators and by them conducted in the statutory mode. As the parties are presumed to know the law, and it is not alleged that they were mistaken concerning it, we may presume that this was the extent of their purpose in declaring that the submission "may be entered as an order of the superior court."

[3] As this stipulation derives all its force from the agreement of the parties, and none from the statute as such, it follows that this part of the agreement could be waived. What the parties may do, by executory agreement, they may undo, or disregard, or waive by mutual consent duly carried into execution. The court below found that, notwithstanding the said stipulation, neither of the parties at any time caused the submission to be entered as an order of court, but that each of them, well knowing that it had not been so entered, proceeded with the arbitration, introduced evidence before the arbitrators, and proceeded to an award without objection on that score; that each waived any right to cause the submission to be so entered; and that the form and manner of the arbitration and of the proceedings therein, and the making of the award without such entry as an order of court, was with the knowledge and consent of each and all of the parties and was agreed to by them. These findings are not challenged by the defendant. We must accept them as true. Indeed, the evidence in the record tends strongly to support them. The facts found show that there was a complete waiver of the stipulation for the entry of the submission as an order of court and of the right to have it considered as a statutory submission, and a practical agreement to proceed in the manner actually followed.

The statute requires that before acting the arbitrators must be sworn and that the award must be signed and delivered to the parties. Sections 1285, 1286. The specifications of insufficiency of the evidence point out that there was no evidence that either of these things was done. The court found that the arbitrators were not sworn, and that on the day the award was signed an unsigned copy thereof was served on defendant, and that defendant waived all objections on account of the failure of the arbitrators to be sworn and the lack of a better service of the award.

[4] What we have said heretofore is a sufficient answer to the point that the failure of the arbitrators to be sworn, and the failure to serve a signed copy of the award, makes it invalid as a statutory award. It is not a statutory award, and we need not decide whether or not these defects would avoid such an award. We may concede, for the purposes of the case, that the stipulation above quoted was, in effect, an agreement that the arbitrators should be sworn and that the award should be delivered. As before stated, these requirements, if agreed to, could be waived. We think the finding that they were waived is supported by the evidence. The original agreement was made on December 17, 1906. The evidence does not show how soon thereafter the hearings before the arbitrators were begun, but it appears that many days were occupied in the hearings, and that defendant appeared and presented evidence and conducted the proceeding on its part without ever demanding or suggesting that the arbitrators be sworn, or objecting because they had not been sworn. The agreement for a 5 per cent. deduction from the amount awarded for a certain parcel was made on March 11, 1907. On April 30, 1907, the failure to make the award within the 90 days fixed in the original agreement was waived and the time was extended to May 15, 1907. The award was made on May 10, 1907, and on the same day the unsigned copy was delivered to defendant, and it was informed that the arbitrators had not been sworn. No objection was then or ever made on either ground. Negotiations to obtain payment before the expiration of the 60 days by allowing a discount, and for an approval of the title, were begun at once. Defendant agreed to make such payment if the title was good. Defendant's attorneys examined the evidences of title offered by plaintiffs and approved the same, except that there was an outstanding tax sale, and that one Kearney owned an equitable interest in a part of the Dore lands. The clause providing that the value awarded to the Dore lands should be paid into court in the condemnation suit was inserted in the original agreement to enable the defendant to secure the Kearney interest by a judgment in condemnation, if necessary, using said money to pay him. In order to obtain payment without delay, it was agreed by defendant and plaintiffs that the Dores should procure title to the Kearney interest. In pursuance of this agreement they obtained a deed from Kearney to the defendant for his interest and paid him $11,500 on account. They also redeemed the land from the tax sale. The defendant examined the award and pointed out an error in the calculations of the area of some of the parcels. On this account it was agreed that $5,371.86 should be deducted from the values of the Dore lands, as awarded. The defendant's attorneys then approved the title, and the defendant promised to pay the values as thus fixed. The plaintiff on July 9, 1907, appeared at defendant's offices, tendered to the defendant duly executed deeds, including that of Kearney, conveying the lands to defendant, and asked payment. It was late in the afternoon, too late to conclude the transaction on that day, and for that cause defendant asked plaintiffs to call again the next morning, at which time defendant promised to pay the money and take the deeds. Plaintiffs called the next morning with the deeds and were informed that the price was considered too high, and that defendant would not pay the price or take the land. No other objection was made. It is clear, from all these proceedings, that all objections to the arbitration proceedings and to the award were waived.

The finding that defendant, after the award was made and with full knowledge that the arbitrators were not sworn, treated the award as valid and promised to pay the amount allowed, is challenged. There was some conflict in the evidence on this point, but, as the facts already recited show, there was sufficient evidence to sustain it. The other findings attacked are (1) the finding that the respective plaintiffs were the owners of the property at the time the deeds were tendered and payment demanded; (2) the finding that the value of the property was fairly and properly determined by the arbitrators and that the value so fixed was the reasonable value of the property.

[5] The facts already stated in the discussion of the subject of waiver shows that the evidences of title exhibited by plaintiffs were satisfactory to the defendant, and that the refusal to pay was on other grounds. The agreement itself recites that the plaintiff Folger is the owner of the land which she agreed to convey. This is an admission by the defendant and is sufficient prima facie evidence of title to those lands. In addition to this, the plaintiffs introduced in evidence judgments in certain suits by the respective plaintiffs against "all persons," etc., under the so-called McEnerney act of 1906 (Stats. 1906, p. 78), adjudging and determining that the respective plaintiffs were the owners in fee of the said properties. These judgments were entered in 1909, after the present action was begun and before the trial. The said judgments would have become final, by expiration of time for appeal, before the findings were signed, and, as no showing was made to the contrary, we must presume that there was no appeal and that they were competent evidence of title during the continuance of the trial, which, in legal contemplation, continued until the decision of the court below was made. There was no attempt whatever, by the defendant, on the trial to show affirmatively any defect in plaintiffs' title. From all these facts and circumstances, the court could reasonably infer that the plaintiffs were the owners of the land at the time the contract was made, and thereafter until the time of trial. We think the evidence was sufficient to sustain the finding as to title. The ruling admitting in evidence the aforesaid judgments before they became final seems to be in accord with Cook v. Rice, 91 Cal. 668, 27 Pac. 1081, and contrary to Naftzger v. Gregg, 99 Cal. 88, 33 Pac. 757, 37 Am. St. Rep. 23. The error, if any, was harmless, since they became final before the trial was closed. Harris v. Barnhart, 97 Cal. 552, 32 Pac. 589.

[6] The objection that the evidence shows that, at the time performance was due under the agreement and at the time tender was made by the plaintiffs, they did not have title of record to the lands is without any force. It is based on the fact that this tender occurred after the great fire of April, 1906, in which practically all of the records of titles in San Francisco were burned. Upon this the defendant asserts that there was no record title in existence. The destruction by the fire mentioned occurred before the agreement was made. The parties must be presumed to have contracted with reference to the existing condition. It was well known to them at the time of the contract.

[7] Moreover, it cannot be said that the destruction of the record of title to real estate destroys vested titles thereto, or deprives persons of the title or ownership thereof. The title and the record of title are two distinct things.

[8] Under such circumstances, where, as here, time is not of the essence of the contract, and it is a positive agreement to buy and not a mere option depending on the sufficiency of the showing of title, it is enough if the vendor is in fact the owner in fee, unincumbered, at the time of performance or at the time of the decree. Alvarez v. Brannan, 7 Cal. 509, 68 Am. Dec. 274; Allstead v. Nicol, 123 Cal. 597, 56 Pac. 452; 36 Cyc. 719; 4 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1408; 26 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 114. The doctrine of Crim v. Umlsen, 155 Cal. 697, 103 Pac. 178, 132 Am. St. Rep. 127, is not applicable to such a case. That the plaintiffs were then the owners in fee was substantially admitted at the time by the defendant, and it was not seriously controverted at the trial.

[9] It is a well-established rule of equity that, in an action to enforce specific performance of an executory agreement for the sale of land, the plaintiff must allege and prove that the consideration received by the other party was adequate, and that the agreement is, as to him, just and reasonable; in other words, that it is not, as to the other party, an unconscionable, inequitable, or hard bargain that the value of the land and the price to be paid are in reasonable approximation to equality. Civ. Code, § 3391; White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 615, 87 Pac. 193; Kaiser v. Barron, 153 Cal. 790, 96 Pac. 806; Stiles v. Cain, 134 Cal. 171, 66 Pac. 231; Bruck v. Tucker, 42 Cal. 353. There are many other cases. If the other party, with knowledge of such inequality as there may be, nevertheless desired to and freely did enter into the contract without any unfair advantage being taken of him, it will not be deemed inequitable as to him. The demands of this rule will be considered as sufficiently met by these circumstances. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 926; 6 Ibid. § 790.

[10] An agreement to buy land at a price to be fixed by arbitration is not complete until the award has been made. It may then be enforced in the same manner as if the parties had agreed upon the price and inserted it in the agreement themselves. The defendant contends that, where the price is fixed by arbitration, the equitable rule above stated applies to the same extent as where the parties agree on the price, and that the vendor must prove that the price is reasonably adequate and just. For the purposes of this case, this may be conceded. In the present case, the award was introduced in evidence. It was, in effect, decided, in the cases heretofore cited, that an award as to value, whether technically a common-law arbitration or a mere appraisal, is nevertheless binding on the parties, and, in the absence of fraud or mistake, conclusive. Church v. Seitz, supra. On principle, it would appear to be at least competent evidence of value. It was the judgment of the arbitrators duly given upon a consideration of the evidence and arguments offered by both parties bearing upon the question to be decided by them. They were selected by both parties to make the decision, and were the authorized agents of both to declare it. It is a declaration by agents as to a matter within the scope of their authority and made in the performance of their delegated duty. Such declarations, on familiar principles, are evidence against the principals. The agreement in this case declares that "the judgment of a majority of said board of arbitrators shall be conclusive as to such values." The following authorities are to the effect that such an award is conclusive as to the value of the property. Collier v. Mason, 25 Beav. 204; Smith v. Boston, etc., Co., 36 N. H. 490; Underhill v. Van Cortlandt, 2 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 361; Van Cortlandt v. Underhill, 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 408; Hartford Fire I. Co. v. Bonner M. Co., 56 Fed. 382, 5 C. C. A. 524; Baltimore, etc., Co. v. Canton Co., 70 Md. 408, 17 Atl. 394; Atkinson v. Whitney, 67 Miss. 662, 7 South. 644; Montgomery v. American I. Co., 108 Wis. 158, 84 N. W. 175; Chandos v. Insurance Co., 84 Wis. 184, 54 N. W. 390, 19 L. R. A. 321; Water Power Co. v. Gray, 6 Metc. (Mass.) 173; Brigham v. Evans, 113 Mass. 538. Some of these cases were actions to set aside an award. The defendant claims that such cases are not in point. It is unnecessary to discuss the question, for many of the other cases were actions to enforce an award, or a contract in which the award was an essential term, and several of them were actions in equity to compel specific performance of agreements for the sale of land, in no way distinguishable from the case at bar.

The defendant cites the case of Parken v. Whitby, Turn. & Russ. 367, 37 Eng. Rep. 1142, to the point that a court of equity is not bound by such an award of value. It was there decided that, notwithstanding such award, the court could require other evidence of value in order to satisfy its conscience, if there were circumstances raising a suspicion that the valuation was unfair. In support of this statement the court cited Emery v. Wase, 5 Ves. Jr. 846; Emery v. Wase, 8 Ves. Jr. 517; s. c. on appeal; and Hall v. Warren, 9 Ves. Jr. 605. Emery v. Wase was a suit for specific performance similar to the case at bar. The court, both at the trial and on appeal, declared that the award of value was conclusive in the action unless it was shown that it was procured by fraud or was made under gross mistake, and that the burden to show these matters was upon the party who sought to impeach the award. Hill v. Warren strongly intimates that the award is conclusive unless it is impeached for fraud. It was also a suit for specific performance.

[11] Upon the authority of these cases we hold that the award was evidence of value and was sufficient to support the finding. There was no evidence offered by the defendant to impeach the award in any particular, or to show that the value fixed thereon was too high, and the only error disclosed was corrected by agreement of the parties before the award became due. It is perhaps inaccurate to say that the error was shown. The evidence was that, during the negotiations for settlement at a discount, the defendant asserted that there was an error in the computation of the area, and that the plaintiffs thereupon agreed to the deduction mentioned. They did not admit that there was in fact such an error, but they acceded to the defendant's claim in regard to it, and it is allowed in the complaint.

[12] In the defendant's brief some objections are made to the proceedings of the arbitrators and to the accuracy of the facts recited in the award. No evidence was introduced to show that the facts therein stated were untrue, and with the single exception already referred to, which was corrected by agreement of the parties after the award was made, there was no evidence to show any inaccuracy or defect whatever in the award. This answers the objections. We cannot take notice of facts which rest upon the mere assertion of counsel in the briefs.

It is claimed that the court erred in admitting in evidence four volumes of so-called abstracts of title from the plant of the California Title Insurance and Trust Company a corporation, which, ever since the year 1886, has been engaged in the business of preparing and issuing abstracts of title to lands in San Francisco. These volumes comprised an abstract of title, as shown by the public records, to the lands in question belonging to the Dores. They were prepared and made up prior to the great fire of April, 1906. Objection was made to them on the grounds that they had not been "issued and certified to as correct" by the company which made them in the manner provided by section 1855a of the Code of Civil Procedure. They purported to show the contents of the public records affecting said lands prior to the destruction of said records by the great fire in San Francisco in April, 1906. We do not deem it necessary to decide whether they were admissible or not.

[13] The evidence shows that, when the arbitration was concluded, the defendant authorized and directed its attorneys to examine the title of the plaintiffs to these lands and determine as to its sufficiency, and that said attorneys did make such examination and determined for the defendant that the title offered was satisfactory. Section 11 of the so-called McEnerney act of 1906 provides that a judgment procured under that act, establishing the title of the petitioner thereunder, is "binding and conclusive upon every person who, at the time of the commencement of the action, had or claimed any estate, right, title, or interest in or to said property, or any part thereof, and upon every person claiming under him by title subsequent to the commencement of the action." Stats. 1906, p. 81. The aforesaid judgment under that act establishing the respective titles of the plaintiffs in the lands in controversy were made in suits begun in May, 1909, and July, 1909, respectively, and they are conclusive. It is not claimed that any change occurred in the condition of the titles between the 9th of July, 1907, when the deeds were tendered, and the time of the beginning of these McEnerney suits, nor after they were begun and up to the time of the decision of the court in the case at bar. The defendant offered no evidence to impeach the plaintiff's title. It does not now point out any defect therein.

[14] It is apparent, therefore, that the evidence, without the aid of these abstracts, was conclusive of the fact that the title is in the plaintiffs, and that the ruling admitting the abstracts could not have prejudiced the defendant. The finding on that point must of necessity have been against defendant, even if they had been excluded. It is proper to add that section 1855a has been amended (Stats. Extra Sess. 1911, p. 64), so that the precise question is not likely to again arise in the trial court.

[15] Twelve pages of appellant's brief are occupied in enumerating some 28 alleged errors in the admission of evidence. None of them affect the substantial merits of the case. Many of them are covered by what we have already said in this opinion. We do not deem it necessary to discuss them. Indeed, with one exception, appellant does not discuss them, but merely states the objection. Such discussion deserves scant notice. Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 690, 76 Pac. 661; People v. Glaze, 139 Cal. 163, 72 Pac. 965. There was objection to testimony as to the negotiations between the defendant and the plaintiffs concerning the title, the proposed discount, and the agreement, on the ground that the persons who represented defendant in these negotiations had no authority from defendant to act in that behalf. Defendant has put itself in the position of employing persons to act as its agents, and its only agents, to carry on its business, and then denying that these persons have any authority to act in every instance in which such action does not redound to its advantage. It does not deny the execution of the agreement in question, nor that the officers and agents in question were the persons to whom this business was intrusted. The agreement was made by the persons whose authority it now disputes. The objection appears to be that the plaintiffs did not offer some resolution of the board of directors specifically authorizing every detail of the business. There was ample proof that defendant held out these persons to the world as its agents authorized to do this business. It is unnecessary to state it. The objection was well overruled. We find no prejudicial error in the record.

The judgments and orders are affirmed.

CALIFORNIA FRUIT EXCHANGE v. BUCK. (Sac. 1,908.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 28, 1912.)
CORPORATIONS (§ 34*) — EXISTENCE — ESTOPPEL.

One who deals with a corporation as such in executing notes and a chattel mortgage is estopped to deny its corporate capacity in suit to foreclose the mortgage.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by the California Fruit Exchange against Fred M. Buck. From a judgment for defendant and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. L. Shinn, C. G. Shinn, C. L. Shinn, C. F. Stewart, and Frank R. Devlin, for appellant. T. T. C. Gregory, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This appeal presents the same essential facts, and calls for the application of the same legal principles as in the case of Frank H. Buck Co. v. F. M. Buck et al. and the California Fruit Exchange, 122 Pac. 466, where the present plaintiff was defendant and appellant.

That action was brought by the Buck Company against the present defendant Buck to foreclose a crop mortgage given to it by him on May 19, 1909, and against the present plaintiff, the California Fruit Exchange, which, it was alleged, asserted some right or lien under a prior crop mortgage executed in its favor by Buck.

The California Fruit Exchange set up by answer in that suit a priority of right and lien over the crop mortgage to the Buck Company by virtue of a similar mortgage to it made in December, 1905, by the defendant, Buck, covering the same farm and orchard premises, and which mortgage provided that it was security for a present indebtedness of $2,500 and to secure future advances. The trial court in that action held that while the mortgage of Buck from the California Fruit Exchange had been executed prior to his mortgage to the Buck Company, and on October 27, 1908, there was a balance of indebtedness due to said California Fruit Exchange from Buck for advances to the amount of $5,447.70, that this indebtedness was not secured by that mortgage. This conclusion of the court was derived from the fact that as the books of account between the California Fruit Exchange and Buck, kept by the former, show that on September 15, 1907, there was a credit balance in favor of Buck of $442.32, the mortgage had thereby been paid, and in effect canceled, and that subsequent advances made by the California Fruit Exchange to Buck which aggregated the $5,447.70 found due it was not secured by that mortgage, and judgment was entered accordingly.

On the appeal from that judgment taken by the California Fruit Exchange this court, on a consideration of the conceded facts and the terms of the mortgage, held that this conclusion of the trial court was erroneous; that as the mortgage provided for future advances which were represented by the indebtedness which the court found due from Buck to the California Fruit Exchange the "mere accidental circumstance that the books of one or another of the parties show a balance in favor of the mortgagor on a given date" did not extinguish the mortgage as a security for such future advances. A reversal of the judgment was ordered. This present action was brought by the California Fruit Exchange to foreclose this same mortgage, and the action was tried and a judgment rendered in favor of the respondent, Buck, before the appeal in the case just referred to was determined. In the court below the same claim of extinguishment of the mortgage and on the same ground as was asserted by the Buck Company in the other case was made by the defendant Buck (who in the previous action had suffered default), and the court sustained it. Plaintiff appeals from this judgment, and the order denying its motion for a new trial.

The evidence in this case was exactly the same as in the other case and calls for the application of the same principle of law. It is unnecessary to detail that evidence or to again discuss these principles. It is sufficient to refer to the opinion of this court in the former case where they are fully set forth and considered, and, under the views which are expressed there and are applicable here, the present judgment and order appealed from must be reversed. The court found in this case that the plaintiff was not a corporation, the defendant attempting by its answer to raise an issue in that respect. But as the evidence conclusively shows that the defendant dealt with the corporation as such in the execution of his mortgage, and the making of his notes to it, he is estopped from denying its corporate capacity in an action to foreclose the mortgage. Bank of Shasta v. Boyd, 99 Cal. 604, 34 Pac. 337; Weill v. Crittenden, 139 Cal. 488, 73 Pac. 238.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by John R. Leahy against Julia P. Warden and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John F. Poole, Julia P. Warden, and C. D. Warden, for appellants. Andrew H. Rose, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This cause was transferred to the District Court of Appeal for the Second District for decision. In that court the judgment was affirmed upon the following opinion prepared by Justice Allen:

"The action was one to foreclose a mortgage executed to plaintiff's assignor by one Jackson, defendants' grantor. The note and mortgage were dated August 15, 1908, note due three years after date, bearing interest at the rate of 11 per cent. per annum, with a condition that, if default be made in the payment of any installment of interest, the principal should become due, at the option of the holder.

"The findings of the court are to the effect that, notwithstanding the rate of interest specified, a contemporaneous written agreement was entered into whereby 3 per cent. of the interest was to be rebated upon payment of taxes, which taxes had been paid up to September 27, 1909, by the makers of the note; that defendants' grantor had paid interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum each and every quarter up to and including August 15, 1909; that no payments of interest were made thereafter; that these payments of interest were made voluntarily and in accordance with the terms of the note. The court further finds that the note and mortgage were made in consideration of a promise of the payee to pay a building contractor, then engaged in the construction of a house for the maker of the note, $2,750 and an additional sum of $250 to cover incidental and extra expenses in connection with the construction of such house; that the payee advanced only the sum of $2,290, together with $65 incidental expenses, which was the entire amount of the advances made; that the sum of $710, the difference between the sum so advanced and the $3,000, remained unadvanced; that, after such advances were made, the maker of the note and mortgage conveyed the premises so mortgaged, subject to said mortgage, to appellants, and, in addition thereto, assigned and transferred whatever claim the grantor had against the payee of the note as to the sum of $710, the unadvanced amount evidenced by the note. The court found that there was due and owing upon said note and mortgage the sum of $2,290, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, from August 15, 1909, compounded quarterly, to the date of judgment, and, further, that defendants had expended $7.50 in searching title to the mortgaged premises, and that $200 was a reasonable attorney's fee for the foreclosure proceedings, and directed a sale of the mortgaged premises in satisfaction thereof. From the judgment alone, upon the roll, defendants appeal.

[1] "Two errors are assigned and claimed: First, that under the findings the action of foreclosure could not be maintained so long as plaintiff was in default in advancing any portion of the sum so agreed to be advanced; and, second, that the interest paid upon the $3,000 at the rate of 8 per cent., being in excess of the amount actually due, should be credited upon the interest account generally, which, if done, would extinguish all of the interest due, up until the commencement of the action, upon the sum actually advanced. The first contention is maintained upon the authority of Savings Bank of Southern California v. Asbury, 117 Cal. 96, 48 Pac. 1081. That case, however, only determines that a mortgagee cannot maintain an action for foreclosure so long as he has not complied with a condition to be performed by him as a part of the consideration of the mortgage, as where he retains in his hands a part of the money which he was to loan and advance to the mortgagor, and refuses to pay it over. In the case at bar there is no allegation nor finding with reference to any demand upon the part of appellants or of their grantor, for the payment or advancement of any portion of the $710. That a mortgagee should be barred of the right to foreclose on account of partial advancements made, it must be made to appear that he has refused to comply with the terms of the contract. For aught that appears in this record, there was no necessity or occasion for the advancement of the full amount, or that the entire sum was required for the construction of the house, or the payment of any incidental expenses. It would be a harsh rule to say that the maker of a note and mortgage, under the circumstances of this case, should be compelled to take and receive the full stipulated amount agreed to be advanced, without reference to necessity or desire, or that one advancing in good faith all of the sums required by the other should be barred of a right to recover the amount so advanced where no demand or refusal for the advancement of the additional sum is made to appear.

[2-4] "As to the second point, the court finds that the payment of 8 per cent. interest upon the $3,000 was voluntarily made. It must be assumed upon this appeal from the judgment that there was evidence before the court warranting such finding. In addition to this, in the absence of an express finding as to the character of the payment, the payment being made with knowledge of the facts is to be regarded as voluntary, in the absence of any showing of duress. Assuming that these payments of interest in excess of the amount due were necessary in order to avoid a foreclosure of the mortgage, this would not be sufficient to render such payments other than voluntary. Burke v. Gould, 105 Cal. 282, 38 Pac. 733. Payments voluntarily made cannot be recovered. The amounts found due on account of the examination of title and attorney's fees for foreclosure were stipulated in the mortgage, and were properly included in the decree."

A rehearing in the Supreme Court was granted for the purpose of examining the question of the right of the defendants to have the amount paid as interest credited upon the principal, in so far as it exceeded the interest that would have been due at 8 per cent. upon the amount actually loaned to the mortgagor, the question whether or not, as to such excess, the payments were voluntary.

[5] Upon further consideration, we can see no escape from the conclusion of the District Court of Appeal upon this point. The findings, not only state that they were voluntary, but they further state that the interest maturing on August 15, 1909, was not paid at that time, that a suit to foreclose for that default was begun, that thereafter, on September 28, 1909, said installment of interest, calculated at 8 per cent. per annum upon a principal sum of $3,000, was paid, by the mortgagor, the former owner, and thereupon that suit was dismissed. It is therefore evident that the payments were made after the mortgagor had full opportunity to know the facts and his legal rights. Haralson v. Barrett, 99 Cal. 611, 34 Pac. 342, is a direct authority for the proposition that such payments of interest cannot be afterward credited upon the principal against the will of the creditor. See, also, London Bank v. Bandmann, 120 Cal. 224, 52 Pac. 583, 65 Am. St. Rep. 179; Matthews v. Ormerd, 140 Cal. 581, 74 Pac. 136.

The judgment is affirmed.

AHLERS et al. v. SMILEY et al. (L. A. 2,890.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1912.
Rehearing Denied July 26, 1912.)

1. PLEADING (§ 248*)—STATEMENT OF CAUSE OF ACTION—PARTIES.

Where the cause of action for damages was the same in both, an amended complaint does not state a different cause of action from the original, because in one the parties are described as partners and in the other as individuals, both complaints showing that the cause of action accrued during the existence of the partnership.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 686, 687, 689-706, 709; Dec. Dig. § 248.*]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 24*)—CONTRACTS IN WRITING.

The four years' limitation fixed by Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1, for the bringing of an action upon any contract, obligation, or liability founded upon an instrument in writing, applies wherever the instrument itself contains the contract to do the thing for the non-performance of which the action is brought.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 112-117; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

3. CONTRACTS (§ 303*)—BREACH—PERFORMANCE.

Where defendants contracted with plaintiff to purchase all ice necessary for their customers from plaintiff, and before the expiration of the contract abandoned the ice business, after having refused to purchase from plaintiff, plaintiff's sale of their ice plant after defendants' abandonment did not deprive them of their action for damages which had accrued up to that time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1409-1443; Dec. Dig. § 303.*]

4. SALES (§ 384*)—BREACH BY PURCHASER—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

In view of Civ. Code, § 1512, providing that, if the performance of an obligation be prevented by the creditor, the debtor is entitled to all benefits which he would have obtained, if it had been performed, the measure of damages for buyer's breach of a contract to purchase ice is the loss of profits which the seller would have made had the contract been fully performed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1098-1107; Dec. Dig. § 384.*]

5. JUDGMENT (§ 721*)—CONCLUSIVENESS—MATTERS CONCLUDED.

Where plaintiffs first sought an injunction to prevent the defendants from violating their contract to buy all their ice from plaintiff, and in that proceeding it was found that plaintiffs daily furnished four to six tons of ice to defendants at a profit to plaintiffs of at least $1 per ton, and that plaintiffs' damages for defendants' breach was at least $16 a day, was not conclusive of plaintiffs' damages, so as to fix the amount of such damages in a later action for damages.

6. JUDGMENT (§ 724*)—DETERMINATION—FORMER ADJUDICATION.

Where the judgment in an action for an injunction to restrain breach of contract expressly excepted plaintiff's right of action for damages, defendants cannot in a subsequent action for damages set up the proceeding for an injunction as a bar.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by J. L. Ahlers and S. S. East, partners as Ahlers & East, against A. J. Smiley and R. R. Smith, partners as Smiley & Smith. From a judgment for plaintiffs and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. O. Daniel, for appellants. E. E. Keech, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment against them, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The action was one for damages for the violation of a certain contract. Ahlers & East were copartners engaged in the business, among other things, of manufacturing ice. Defendants, also copartners, were retailers of ice. By the terms of the contract, the firm of Ahlers & East agreed to furnish to defendants at the price of $4 per ton all of the ice necessary for defendants to supply their customers. Under this agreement, the plaintiff copartnership continued to furnish and the defendants to receive large quantities of ice until July 24, 1905, when the latter refused longer to abide by the terms of the contract, and thereafter furnished their customers with ice purchased from the Union Ice Company and other manufacturers. On July 28, 1905, an action was brought to restrain defendants from purchasing ice from any other manufactory than that of Ahlers & East. Judgment enjoining them from the violation of their contract was entered March 15, 1906. From this judgment defendants appealed, but, as they had abandoned the business of selling ice, they failed to file a transcript in this court, and their appeal was dismissed.

On September 6, 1907, the plaintiffs sued for damages, and after trial were awarded the sum of $480. This judgment and an order denying a motion for a new trial were reversed on appeal, but leave was granted to file amended pleadings. Ahlers v. Smiley, 11 Cal. App. 343, 104 Pac. 997. On December 14, 1909, a "second amended complaint" was filed, but, a demurrer to it having been sustained with leave to amend, a "third amended complaint" was filed. After a demurrer and a motion to strike out had been denied, defendants answered. Upon the issues then joined a trial was had, and judgment was given in favor of plaintiffs for the sum of $2,250.

[1] Defendants take the position that the demurrer to the "third amended complaint" should have been sustained or the motion to strike it out should have been granted, because it states a different cause of action from that originally alleged. In their initial complaint for damages plaintiffs were described in the caption as "formerly copartners doing business under the firm name of Ahlers & East." In the body of the pleading they alleged the dissolution of the copartnership in June, 1906. There is also the averment that "on and after July 24, 1905, and until the entry of said judgment on March 15, 1906, these plaintiffs as such copartners were able, willing, and ready to perform all the conditions and covenants on their part contained in said contract." The caption of the third amended complaint describes them as "copartners doing business under the firm name of Ahlers & East." There are averments that on or about April 1, 1906, the copartners Ahlers & East sold their business and divided the assets of the partnership "except said ice contract and the damages which had accrued to them," and that as to these matters the partnership continued. Defendants conclude, therefore, that in the original complaint plaintiffs sued as individuals while in the final purported amendment thereto they appeared as copartners. We do not see, however, that a cause of action different from that originally stated is set forth in the third amended complaint. The same contract, the same parties defendant, the same breach, and the same sort of damages are alleged in both pleadings. The same parties plaintiff appear in both except in one they are described as formerly copartners and in the latter as continuing to be copartners in the subject-matter of the cause of action. In both pleadings the injury wrought by defendants is described as occurring during the time that the plaintiffs were copartners. In Stewart v. Spaulding, 72 Cal. 265, 13 Pac. 661, the plaintiffs in their original pleading described themselves as "late partners." The suit was on a foreign judgment rendered while they were copartners. Demurrer to this complaint was sustained for nonjoinder of parties defendant, and in their amended complaint the plaintiffs omitted the designation of themselves as "late partners." A motion was made to strike the amended complaint from the files on the ground that plaintiffs had alleged a different cause of action from that originally set up. This court held that the motion was properly denied, saying: "In one sense it was a different cause of action, but plainly the same judgment was attempted to be set up in each complaint, and the same relief demanded upon the same facts, which were only stated in a different legal aspect." Appellant cites McCord v. Seale, 56 Cal. 262, Harrison v. McCormick, 69 Cal. 617, 11 Pac. 456, and Weinreich v. Johnston, 78 Cal. 255, 20 Pac. 556; but those cases merely hold that a variance arises when persons are described as individuals in the caption and as partners in the body of a pleading, and that proof of partnership liability or credit will not sustain a personal judgment or vice versa. It is to be noticed that the doctrine announced in these cases has been somewhat modified by the later cases of Williams v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 110 Cal. 461, 42 Pac. 974, and Grangers' Union v. Ashe, 12 Cal. App. 757, 108 Pac. 533. In the case at bar a demurrer to one of the complaints was sustained because the plaintiffs described themselves as "formerly copartners," while the pleading stated a cause of action in favor of a partnership of which they were the members. This ambiguity was corrected, but the cause of action set forth in their last pleading was essentially the same as that which was formerly alleged. The ambiguity which was called to the court's attention and because of which the demurrer was sustained was a mere defect of parties, capable of correction by a new pleading.

[2] Defendants pleaded the bar of the statute of limitation, and assigned as error the finding of the court against them. They insist that, while the obligation of the contract between the parties was founded upon a written instrument, the breach of the agreement is not subject to the provisions of section 337, subd. 1, but to those of section 339, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure. This contention is fully answered by the opinion of this court in the case of McCarthy v. Mt. Tecarte Land & Water Co., 111 Cal. 340, 43 Pac. 959 (one of the cases cited by appellants themselves), where it is said: "In order to be founded upon an instrument in writing, the instrument must itself contain a contract to do the thing for the non-performance of which the action is brought."

[3] A number of the findings are attacked by appellants upon the theory that they were not sustained by the evidence. The court found the making and delivery of the contract and the breach thereof, but appellants assert that the plaintiffs put themselves beyond the power of fulfilling their part of the agreement by selling their ice manufacturing plant on April 1, 1906. But the damages alleged and recovered all accrued prior to March 15, 1906, and defendant Smiley testified that defendants ceased to sell ice on that date. There was, therefore, no reason why plaintiffs should have been prepared to deliver ice after March 15, 1906.

[4] Appellants question the measure of damages applied by the court, and insist, also, that the damages awarded were excessive, and assert that the evidence was insufficient to support the amount found to be due by way of damages. These contentions are all without merit. There was no denial of the execution by the parties of the contract which required that defendants buy all ice for the supplying of their customers from plaintiffs. It was admitted that defendants had received from sources other than plaintiffs' factory 600 tons of ice, and that they sold 480 tons thereof. What they did with the difference between 480 tons and 600 tons does not appear. Whether a surplus was kept on hand for sale and melted or the difference was used in some other way is not disclosed. Since defendants joined in the stipulation without any qualification to explain this matter, we must assume that the entire 600 tons was purchased in the course of the business of supplying their customers. It was shown that the capacity of the ice plant was sufficient to supply all of defendants' wants, and that the ice for their use could be produced at an added cost to plaintiffs of 25 cents per ton, and therefore at a profit of $3.75. The loss of this sum per ton on 600 tons made the aggregate amount of damages $2,250. Section 1512 of the Civil Code is as follows: "If the performance of an obligation be prevented by the creditor, the debtor is entitled to all the benefits which he would have obtained if it had been performed by both parties." The judgment is in accord with this rule. The rule of damages in such cases is the difference between the cost of manufacture and the contract price. Hale v. Trout, 35 Cal. 229; Winans v. Sierra Lumber Co., 66 Cal. 61, 4 Pac. 952. Loss of profits which are the natural result of a contract and which the law implies from a breach may be recovered without allegations of special damage. Tahoe Ice Co. v. Union Ice Co., 109 Cal. 249, 41 Pac. 1020.

[5] Appellants call our attention to a finding in the former action between these parties which they say limits the possible recovery in this action to $1 per ton. That case was one in which an injunction was sought. The finding in question was in part as follows: "That since the execution of said contract, and until the 24th day of July, 1905, the defendants have duly performed all the conditions on their part; and during said time, in accordance with said provisions, have advanced the sale of ice manufactured by the plaintiffs, until the said defendants were so receiving and selling from four to six tons of ice per day from the plaintiffs, at a profit to the plaintiffs of at least $1 per ton. That on the said 24th day of July, 1905, without the consent of the plaintiffs, and contrary to the provisions of said contract, the defendants ceased and refused to receive any more ice from the plaintiffs, and began to receive from the Union Ice Company and from ice companies other than the plaintiffs all the ice required by the defendants, * * * to the daily loss and damage of the plaintiffs of at least $16 per day." It will be seen at a glance that the above-quoted finding established only a minimum amount of damage as showing a reason for the issuance of an injunction. There is nothing in that finding inconsistent with the subsequent adjudication that the loss to plaintiffs was greater than $1 a ton.

[6] There is also a claim on the part of appellants that respondents were estopped by the previous decision and by their election of a remedy by injunction. This same point was made in the former appeal herein and was by the district court of appeal determined adversely to appellants, as follows: "For the purpose of determining whether the issues involved in a former suit constitute a bar to a second action reference will ordinarily be had to a comparison of the record in the two cases. Here, however, the judgment in the former action which defendants attempt to plead as a bar solemnly adjudges and decrees 'that on account of the insufficiency of the pleadings * * * in this action to warrant or sustain a judgment for damages which may have accrued to the plaintiffs, the matter of damages is hereby reversed and excepted from the operation of this judgment, to be determined by a separate action to be brought by the plaintiffs for that purpose if necessary.' Without regard to the rule, this judgment, so long as it stands, presents an insurmountable obstacle to defendants' contention on the grounds stated. There is no merit in defendants' contention that electing to sue for an injunction was a waiver of plaintiffs' right to assert a claim for damages in a subsequent action." This correctly disposes of the matter.

Other alleged errors are called to our attention, but we do not think it necessary to treat of them in detail. Suffice it to say that they are without merit.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO v. ARNOLD.
(L. A. 2,255.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 28, 1912.)

1. TRIAL (§ 404*)—FINDINGS—CONSTRUCTION.

A finding that complainant railroad under certain specified decisions of the United States Supreme Court had no right in certain land described by virtue of its selections on a specified date was not a finding of fact but a conclusion of law resulting from the court's interpretation of the decisions of the Supreme Court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Celt. Dig. §§ 957-962; Dec. Dig. § 404.*]

2. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 81*)—RAILROAD GRANTS—INDEMNITY LANDS

Under Act Cong. March 3, 1871, c. 122, 16 Stat. 573, making a branch line land grant to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, such company was not entitled to select as indemnity lands under that grant lands lying within the granted or indemnity limits of the Atlantic and Pacific grant of 1866.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. §§ 250-252; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

3. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 81*)—RAILROAD GRANT—BRANCH LINE GRANT.

The fact that public lands had been adjudicated not to be subject to selection as indemnity lands under the Southern Pacific branch line grant of 1871 did not deprive that company of its right to make a separate and independent selection of the same lands under its main line grant of 1866; the adjudication against the validity of the branch line selection not being conclusive against the company except on the title actually adjudicated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. §§ 250-252; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

4. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 81*)—RAILROAD LANDS—INDEMNITY SELECTION.

The right of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to make an indemnity selection of public lands under its land grant depends on the status of the land at the date of the selection, irrespective of its status at any earlier period.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. §§ 250-252; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

5. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 81*)—RAILROAD LANDS—PRIMARY INDEMNITY GRANTS.

Primary and indemnity grants of public lands to a railroad company differ in that the primary grant, on the filing and approval of maps of definite location, take effect in presenti by relation as of the date of the passage of the granting act, while indemnity grants do not transfer title until (1) a right to select has arisen by virtue of the performance of the railroad construction contemplated by the granting act; (2) after appropriate filing of the selected indemnity lands; and (3) after approval of the Secretary of the Interior of such selections, on which approval by relation the grant takes effect, not as of the date of the granting act, but as of the date of selection.

6. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 88*)—RAILROAD GRANT—INDEMNITY LANDS.

The Southern Pacific Railroad Company has a general right to select indemnity lands under its main line grant within the place limits of the Atlantic and Pacific primary grant forfeited by Act Cong. July 6, 1886, c. 637, 24 Stat. 123.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. §§ 235, 266-269; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

7. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 82*)—RAILROAD GRANT—REJECTION.

Restoration by the Secretary of the Interior to the public domain of indemnity land selected by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company under its main line grant, rendering such land subject to entry, constituted a rejection or disapproval of the selection by the railroad company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. §§ 236, 253-256; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

8. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 82*)—RAILROAD LANDS—SELECTED INDEMNITY LANDS—REJECTION—ACTS OF SECRETARY OF INTERIOR.

The duty of the Secretary of the Interior to approve or reject selected indemnity land claimed by a railroad company under a land grant is not merely a formal or ministerial act, but one involving judgment and discretion, first in determining whether the selection has been properly made, and second in protecting the interests of the United States and persons who may have claims on any portion of the land in accordance with the land laws of the United States, and hence his power, while not unlimited or subject to arbitrary exercise, is not subject to review by judicial mandate.

9. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 128*)—RAILROAD LANDS—INDEMNITY SELECTION—REJECTION—REMEDY OF RAILROAD COMPANY.

Where the Secretary of the Interior improperly rejected an indemnity land selection by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, either through fraud or mistake of law or fact, and the mistake was not corrected by the Secretary of his own initiative, the railroad company, not being authorized to enforce a reversal of the ruling by mandamus, was bound to await the time when the United States had parted with the title and then institute proceedings to have the patentee declared a trustee of the land for its benefit.

10. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 125*)—PATENT—ERRONEOUS AWARD—TRUSTS.

Where the Interior Department has fallen into error in awarding a patent to public land to one not entitled thereto as against the selector under a railroad indemnity grant, the railroad company, in order to recover the land from the patentee, must not only show that the department was in error in granting the patent, but that the error was one injurious to complainant's vested rights in that, by the law properly administered, the title should have been awarded to him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. § 341; Dec. Dig. § 125.*]

11. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 82*)—RAILROAD GRANT—INDEMNITY LIMITS—SELECTION.

A due selection by a railroad company of public lands, free from other claims and within the indemnity limits of its grant, vests in the railroad company a right to the land against all third persons attempting thereafter to initiate a claim to the selected land under any of the general land laws.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. §§ 236, 253-256; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

12. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 128*)—RAILROAD GRANT—SELECTION—ERRONEOUS REJECTION—RIGHTS OF ENTRYMEN.

Complainant railroad company having made a due selection of certain public lands free from other claims and within the indemnity limits of its grant, such selection was erroneously rejected by the Secretary of the Interior, whereupon the railroad company contracted to sell the land to defendant by a contract binding complainant to use ordinary diligence to procure a patent to the land, defendant agreeing to make payment on account of the purchase price, and never to deny that any part of the land was a part of the railroad's grant, and not to do any act to hinder, delay, or impede the obtaining of a patent by complainant. Defendant thereafter repudiated the contract, failed to make the payments required, and secured a patent to himself by representing that he was a bona fide purchaser from complainant. Held, that complainant was entitled to have defendant declared a constructive trustee of the title for it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. § 344; Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company against George L. Arnold. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Wm. Singer, Jr., and D. V. Cowden, for appellant. Anderson & Anderson, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff brought this action to compel the defendant to convey unto it a quarter section of land for which defendant had received patent from the United States, or pay the amount due under an executory contract by which defendant agreed to purchase the land from the plaintiff. The form of this contract and many facts and much law bearing upon this case will be found set forth in Wilson v. Southern Pacific Railroad Company, 135 Cal. 421, 67 Pac. 688, Southern Pacific Railroad Co. v. Lippman, 148 Cal. 480, 83 Pac. 445, and Southern Pacific Co. v. Bovard, 4 Cal. App. 76, 87 Pac. 203. In brief, plaintiff agreed to use ordinary diligence to procure a patent for the land, and defendant agreed to make payment on account of the purchase price of the land at stated periods, and bound himself "never to deny that the tracts herein described, or any part of them, are a part of said grant, and will do no act to hinder, delay, or impede the obtaining of patent for them by the party of the first part." "In case it be finally determined that patent shall not issue to said party of the first part (plaintiff) for all or any of the tracts herein described," the purchase money paid was to be refunded. The land in controversy is within the indemnity limits common to the Atlantic and Pacific grant made by the act of Congress of July 27, 1866 [Act July 27, 1866, c. 278, 14 Stat. 292], the Southern Pacific main line grant made by the same act, and the Southern Pacific branch line grant made by act of Congress of March 3, 1871 [Act March 3, 1871, c. 122, 16 Stat. 573]. It was selected by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company on October 3, 1887, as branch line indemnity land, and on March 3, 1898, as main line indemnity land. The court finds that these selections were duly made, and that, in their making, all the requirements of law and the rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office were complied with, and that at the date of such selection the land in suit was public land to which the United States then had full title, was not reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated, and was free from pre-emption or other claims or rights.

[1] The court found: "That by the decisions of the United States Supreme Court in United States v. Southern Pacific Railroad Company, 146 U. S. 570, 13 Sup. Ct. 152, 36 L. Ed. 1091, and Southern Pacific Railroad Company v. United States, 168 U. S. 1, 18 Sup. Ct. 18, 42 L. Ed. 355, decided on the 18th day of October, 1897, it was finally determined that the plaintiff had no right in the land described in the first finding hereof, by virtue of its selections on October 3, 1887." This, of course, is not a finding of fact, but a conclusion of law resulting from the interpretation which the trial court placed upon the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

[2] Its conclusion is sound. It may be considered as having been definitely settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in cases decided since this appeal was taken, that, by reason of the peculiar wording of the Southern Pacific grant of 1871 (its branch line grant,) that company was not entitled to select as indemnity lands, under its branch line grant, lands lying within the granted or within the indemnity limits of the Atlantic and Pacific grant of 1866. Southern Pacific R. R. Co. et al. v. United States, 223 U. S. 560, 32 Sup. Ct. 325, 56 L. Ed. —. We may therefore turn this consideration to the main line indemnity selection of March 3, 1898. The finding as to this selection, as above set forth, is that it conformed in all respects to law, was of lands within the indemnity limits of the Southern Pacific grant of 1866, and was of lands which, at the time of the selection, were owned by the United States, free from any private claim of right.

[3] By United States v. S. P. R. R. Co., 223 U. S. 565, 32 Sup. Ct. 326, 56 L. Ed. —, it is declared that the fact that the lands had been adjudicated not to be liable to selection as indemnity lands under the branch line grant to the Southern Pacific did not deprive the Southern Pacific of its right to make another separate and independent selection of the same lands under its main line grant of 1866, and that the adjudication against the validity of the branch line selections did not conclude the Southern Pacific, excepting upon the title actually adjudicated in such cases as United States v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 146 U. S. 570, 13 Sup. Ct. 152, 36 L. Ed. 1091; Southern Pacific R. R. Co. v. United States, 168 U. S. 1, 18 Sup. Ct. 18, 42 L. Ed. 355; Southern Pacific R. R. Co. v. United States, 189 U. S. 447, 23 Sup. Ct. 567, 47 L. Ed. 896.

[4] The doctrine of Ryan v. Central Pacific Ry. Co., 99 U. S. 382, 25 L. Ed. 305, to the effect that the right to make an indemnity selection depends upon the status of the land at the date of such selection, irrespective of its status at any earlier period, is reaffirmed, and it is declared that this decision should be taken to express an "established and general principle." Such is the import and effect of the latests utterance of the Supreme Court of the United States.

[5] The most important consideration which differentiates the primary grants from the indemnity grants is that the primary grants, upon the filing and approval of maps of definite location, took effect in præsentia by relation as of the date of the passage of the respective acts of grant. The indemnity grants, being designed merely to make up deficiencies in the primary grants, did not transfer title until, first, a right to make selection had arisen by virtue of the performance of the railroad construction contemplated by the granting act; second, after the appropriate filing of the selected indemnity lands; and, third, after the approval of the Secretary of the Interior of such selections, upon which approval, by relation, the grant took effect, not as of the date of the granting act, but as the date of selection. Oregon & California R. R. Co. v. United States, 189 U. S. 112, 23 Sup. Ct. 615, 47 L. Ed. 726. Therefore, as the Atlantic and Pacific had never performed its work so as to entitle it to make selection of indemnities, and so, of course, had never made such selections, there is here a freedom from any embarrassment which might have arisen under those conditions. It may be added that the Atlantic and Pacific grant was forfeited by act of Congress of July 6, 1886 (Act July 6, 1886, c. 637, 24 U. S. Stats. 123); that the indemnity selection was made after this forfeiture and restoration of title to the United States; and that it is well settled that the right to make an indemnity selection depends upon the status of the land at the date of such selection, irrespective of its status at any earlier period. Ryan v. Railroad Co., 99 U. S. 382, 25 L. Ed. 305.

[6] And, finally, upon this point it should be remembered that the question of the general right of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to select indemnity lands under its main line grant within the place limits of the Atlantic and Pacific primary grant has been resolved in favor of the railroad company since this appeal was taken, and such selections have been upheld as to all lands, including those directly adjudicated upon by the Supreme Court of the United States in Southern Pacific R. R. Co. v. United States, 168 U. S. 1, 18 Sup. Ct. 18, 42 L. Ed. 355, where the selection was under the branch line grant of 1871. S. P. R. R. Co. v. United States, 223 U. S. 565, 32 Sup. Ct. 326, 56 L. Ed. —. Since it is thus placed beyond peradventure that the indemnity selection may be made of lands affected by the primary grant to the Atlantic and Pacific, no doubt can be entertained of the right of selection of the land here in question which is within the indemnity limits of both grants.

Notwithstanding the facts above found and shown to be correctly found, that the indemnity selection was in all respects proper, the Secretary of the Interior restored the land so covered by the selection to the public domain. This action of the Interior Department followed the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Southern Pacific Railroad Co. v. United States, 168 U. S. 1, 18 Sup. Ct. 18, 42 L. Ed. 355, and was manifestly taken under a mistaken view of the effect of that decision and of the rights of the appellant under its main line indemnity selection, rights which have above been briefly touched upon, and which will require later consideration. The order of restoration declared the lands to be subject to entry with preferential right to purchase from the United States in favor of bona fide purchasers from the railroad company as contemplated by the act of Congress of March 3, 1887 (Act March 1887, c. 376, 24 Stat. 556). Under this provision, defendant, representing himself to be a bona fide purchaser from the plaintiff, applied for and secured patent from the United States; the title derived under which patent, as has been said, plaintiff seeks to have decreed to be held in trust for it.

The order of the Secretary of the Interior restoring all these lands to the public domain was based upon a mistake of law—a misconstruction of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in 168 U. S., a misconstruction which led the department to believe that plaintiff was not entitled to select indemnity lands under its main line grant lying within the limits of the forfeited Atlantic and Pacific grant. That such an interpretation of the decision is erroneous in point of law is made plain by the later decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States which we have just considered (S. P. R. R. Co. v. United States, 183 U. S. 519, 22 Sup. Ct. 154, 46 L. Ed. 307, and S. P. R. R. Co. v. United States, 223 U. S. 565, 32 Sup. Ct. 326, 56 L. Ed. —).

[7] The restoration by the Secretary of the Interior to the public domain of the selected indemnity land with the right of entry thereon may be considered as a rejection or disapproval by him of such selection. We are brought to consider the correlated rights and duties of the Secretary and of the selector under such circumstances.

[8] The duty of the Secretary in approving or rejecting such selection is not merely formal or ministerial. He has to exercise judgment and discretion, first, in determining whether the selection was or was not properly made, and, second, in protecting the interests of the United States and such entrymen or others as may have claims upon any portion of the land in accordance with the laws of the United States. His action, then, in approving or rejecting, is judicial. Northwestern Pacific v. Soderberg (C. C.) 86 Fed. 49; Kirwan v. Murphy, 189 U. S. 35, 23 Sup. Ct. 599, 47 L. Ed. 698; Riverside Oil Co. v. Secretary Hitchcock, 190 U. S. 317, 23 Sup. Ct. 698, 47 L. Ed. 1074. The determination and action of the Secretary thus being judicial, mandate will not lie to compel him to reverse his ruling or order, either of approval or rejection. But upon the other hand, as said in Cornelius v. Kessel, 128 U. S. 461, 9 Sup. Ct. 122, 32 L. Ed. 482, his "power of supervision and correction is not an unlimited or arbitrary power." If it were, it would vest the Secretary with an extraordinary power beyond the reach of the courts arbitrarily to destroy this and like grants; for, if the Secretary could thus arbitrarily reject one indemnity selection, he could reject all indemnity selections, and the grantees would never be able to take that which the United States, through its Congress, had granted to them.

[9] It follows therefore, that, in case such a rejection is made through fraud or mistake of law or fact, if the wrong be not corrected by the Secretary of his own initiative by a revocation of the order, since mandamus will not lie to enforce a reversal of his ruling, the aggrieved party can only await the time when the United States shall have parted with title and then, under well-recognized and well-settled principles of equity, begin his action to have the patentee declared his trustee; for, as said in Lytle v. Arkansas, 9 How. 332, 13 L. Ed. 153, "it is a well-established principle that, where an individual in the prosecution of a right does everything which the law requires him to do, and he fails to attain his right by the misconduct or neglect of a public officer, the law will protect him." See, also, Yosemite Valley Case, 15 Wall. 91, 21 L. Ed. 82; Duluth, etc., R. R. Co. v. Roy, 173 U. S. 587, 19 Sup. Ct. 549, 43 L. Ed. 820; United States v. Winona, etc., R. R. Co., 67 Fed. 959, 15 C. C. A. 96; 26 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 397; 10 Ency. U. S. Sup. Ct. Repts. p. 261.

[10] Coming thus to the correlative rights of the selector, all that has been said, of course, presupposes not only that the department has fallen into error, but that it is an error injurious to his vested rights, for, "to enable one to attack a patent from the government, it is not sufficient for him to show that there may have been error in adjudging the patent to the patentee; he must show that by the law properly administered, the title should have been awarded to him. This does not mean that, at the moment of time the patent issued, it should have been awarded to him. The acts performed by him may or may not have reached that completeness; but the claimant against the patent must so far bring himself within the laws as to entitle him, if not obstructed or prevented, to complete his claim." 10 Ency. of U. S. Sup. Ct. Repts. p. 261.

What, if any, then, were the rights which this appellant acquired by virtue of its main line grant selection of indemnity lands subject to selection? The trial court held that the selector acquired no rights by virtue of these facts. It is proper to say that the last utterances of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the subject at the time of the trial of this case were those reported in Sjoli v. Dreschel, 199 U. S. 564, 26 Sup. Ct. 154, 50 L. Ed. 311, and the learned judge of the trial court based his decision upon statements to be found in that case like the following: "Mere filing of lists of selections of indemnity lands did not have the effect to exclude them from occupancy under the pre-emption or homestead laws. * * * They remained open, as before, to settlement or occupancy under the laws until the selections were formally approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

[11] Subsequently, however, and since the submission of this cause, the Supreme Court of the United States has declared this and like expressions in the Sjoli Case to be dicta, has denied them any persuasive force, and has declared that a due selection by a railroad company of public lands, free from other claims and within the indemnity limits of its grant (such a selection as it is here found was made), vests in the selector a right to the land against all third persons attempting thereafter to initiate a claim to the selected lands under any of the general land laws. Weyerhaeuser v. Hoyt, 219 U. S. 380, 31 Sup. Ct. 300, 55 L. Ed. 258; Campbell v. Weyerhaeuser, 219 U. S. 425, 31 Sup. Ct. 321, 55 L. Ed. 279. In the course of its opinion, the court quotes from its own earlier opinion in St. Paul Railroad v. Winona Railroad, 112 U. S. 720, 5 Sup. Ct. 334, 28 L. Ed. 872: "It is no answer to this to say that the Secretary of the Interior certified these lands to the state for the use of the appellant. It is manifest that he did so under a mistake of the law, namely, that appellant, having made the earlier location of its road through these lands, became entitled to satisfy all its demands, either for lieu lands or for the extended grant of 1864, out of any odd section within 20 miles of that location, without regard to its proximity to the line of the other road. We have already shown that such is not the law, and this erroneous decision of his cannot deprive the Winona Company of rights which became vested by its selection of those lands. Johnson v. Towsley, 13 Wall. 72, 80 [20 L. Ed. 485]; Gibson v. Chouteau, 13 Wall. 92, 102 [20 L. Ed. 534]; Shepley v. Cowan, 91 U. S. 330, 340 [23 L. Ed. 424]; Moore v. Robbins, 96 U. S. 530, 536 [24 L. Ed. 848].'" And this, it may be added, is in conformity with the opinion of this court upon a similar question, expressed in Farnum v. Clarke, 148 Cal. 610, 84 Pac. 166.

[12] It results, therefore, that, while by the selection thus duly made the appellant did not acquire a perfected title, it did acquire vested equitable rights to title of which it could not be deprived by the fraud or mistake of the Interior Department and to which rights the courts will afford full protection when, as here, they are presented for consideration. The rejection of the selection was arbitrary and unwarranted, and so appellant's equitable vested rights are superior to those of any claimants whose rights have been initiated subsequent to the filing of the due selection. Were the patentee in this case an entryman wholly dissociated from and disconnected with plaintiff, his title would still be subject to the superior equities of the appellant. Much more must this be true in the case of the vendee of plaintiff who has repudiated his contract by a failure to comply with its terms in the matter of payments (S. P. R. R. Co. v. Allen, 112 Cal. 455, 44 Pac. 796), and has secured his patent by representation that he is a bona fide purchaser from appellant, and who has done this in defiance of his written contract to do no act to hinder, delay, or impede the appellant from obtaining patent.

It is apparent, therefore, that plaintiff's bill is not lacking in equity. We express no opinion upon the equitable considerations of minor consequence, namely, whether defendant should at this date and after his repudiation of the contract be allowed to retain title to the land by a belated performance of his contract, or whether or not he should be allowed compensation for his costs and disbursements in the matter of securing the patent, since these are questions which can properly only come before us in review of the decision which the trial court may actually make upon these questions.

It should be plain, we think, from the foregoing that the order of restoration by the Secretary of the Interior was not a final determination that patent should not issue to appellant. The circumstances under which respondent secured patent from the United States are such as, under the plainest principles of equity, make him an involuntary trustee of the appellant of the title derived under that patent.

For which reasons the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

PEEK v. STEINBERG et al. (S. F. 5,421.) (Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1912.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 448*)—CONTRACT BY ORGANIZERS—LIABILITY FOR BREACH.

A corporation is not liable for breach of a contract made by its organizers before its organization, that they would have the corporation adopt certain by-laws and make a certain contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1709, 1789-1792; Dec. Dig. § 448.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 513*)—CONTRACT BY ORGANIZERS — BREACH — PLEADINGS — SUFFICIENCY.

Where, in an action for breach of a contract made by the organizers of the corporation prior to its organization, the complaint alleged that these organizers owned nearly all of the corporate stock when suit was filed, and that the corporation received the benefits of the contract, but did not allege that they owned such stock or that the corporation knew of the contract when such benefits were received, it failed to show an estoppel on the corporation to deny liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2017-2027, 2031-2034, 2036-2045; Dec. Dig. § 513.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 333*)—VERDICT—INTERPRETATION. Where the complaint set out two items of damage, each in a stated amount, the fact that the jury's verdict was for a total sum equal to the amount claimed for one item did not justify an inference that the damages were fixed with reference to this item alone.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 784, 786; Dec. Dig. § 333.*]

4. CONTRACTS (§ 346*)—BREACH—PLEADINGS—VARIANCE.

An allegation of the complaint in an action for breach of contract that the plaintiff has performed his part will not justify a recovery on proof of excuse for nonperformance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1714, 1718-1751; Dec. Dig. § 346.*]

5. CORPORATIONS (§ 77*)—STOCK AGREEMENT — CONSTRUCTION.

An agreement that plaintiff was to receive paid-up corporate stock to a stated amount did not entitle him to receive stock actually worth that amount, but merely to have stock of that total par value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 210-212, 219-243, 455; Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

6. CORPORATIONS (§ 78*)—STOCK AGREEMENT — BREACH—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Where such corporate stock had no ascertainable market value, the measure of damages for failure to issue it to the plaintiff was its actual or intrinsic value at the time it should have been received by him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 219-231, 420-424, 429-434; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

7. CORPORATIONS (§ 78*)—MEASURE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action for breach of contract to issue corporate stock to plaintiff, the burden was upon the plaintiff to show the extent of his damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 219-231, 420-424, 429-434; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

8. CORPORATIONS (§ 78*)—STOCK AGREEMENT — BREACH—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for breach of a contract to issue corporate stock to plaintiff, where the corporate assets consisted principally of contracts under which it should receive lumber, defendant's evidence of how much lumber was received by the corporation under these contracts was admissible upon the value of the stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 219-231, 420-424, 429-434; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by G. W. Peek against S. Steinberg and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Froman & Jacobs and Louis H. Brownstone, for appellants. Otto Irving Wise and R. S. Goldman, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The action was brought to recover damages for the breach of an agreement alleged to have been entered into between plaintiff on the one hand and the defendants Steinberg and Strauss on the other. The agreement relied upon was in the form of a letter addressed by plaintiff to said defendants. It is set out in full in the complaint as follows: "San Francisco, June 4th, 1906. Messrs. Steinberg and Strauss—In accordance with our talk and understanding in organizing an incorporated company for the carrying on of the lumber business, the copartnership known as the Greater San Francisco Lumber Company, consisting of S. Steinberg and myself, it is agreed that we shall assign all interest in said partnership to the new corporation, excepting my agency commission to the amount of 15 million feet, with the mills, and to take paid-up stock in said company in payment. These contracts to be assigned to said company are as follows: The purchase of ten million feet of lumber from the Skelley Lumber Co. at $11 per M, two million feet from the Palmer Lumber Co. at same price, and ten million feet from the Riverton Lumber Co., besides such lumber as may be purchased from various mills. For such interest in these contracts as I hold I am to receive paid-up stock in said corporation to the amount of $12,000 as soon as said stock can be issued, and to hold the position as a director and general manager of said corporation for the term of at least two years at a salary of $175 per month and all business expenses paid. My duty shall be the managing of all outside business, the purchasing of all lumber, shingle and other forest products handled by said corporation, and the hiring and discharging of all help employed by said company outside of the office help. It is further understood and agreed that a complete inventory shall be taken every 90 days and a dividend thus declared from the profits, quarterly. That both Mr. Steinberg and Strauss shall invest each $10,000 in cash and receive each a salary of $175 per month. If you find these conditions satisfactory kindly agree that they will be adopted in the by-laws of the corporation and a contract made with me accordingly. Truly yours, G. W. Peek."

Under this writing appeared the following: "We approve of these conditions and agree to carry out same in the new corporation"—to which the defendants Steinberg and Strauss signed their names. The complaint alleges that in accordance with this agreement the plaintiff did assign to the defendant corporation the Greater City Lumber Company all of his interest in the copartnership referred to, but the defendants have failed to deliver to the plaintiff stock of said corporation of the value of $12,000, and have refused to employ plaintiff as the general manager of the corporation. The plaintiff further alleges performance on his part of all the terms and conditions of his agreement, and alleges that, by reason of the failure of the defendants to comply with their obligations, he has been damaged in the sum of $12,000, the value of the stock agreed to be delivered to him, and the further sum of $4,200, his salary for two years as general manager of the corporation. The complaint concludes with a prayer for judgment in the sum of $16,200. The defendants answered, denying performance by the plaintiff of the agreement on his part, and denying breach of the agreement by them. The case was tried before a jury which awarded a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff and against all three defendants for $12,000. Judgment was entered accordingly. From the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, the defendants appeal.

[1] It is quite apparent that the judgment against the Greater City Lumber Company cannot be sustained. The corporation was not a party to the agreement, and the writing, on its face, did not assume to bind any one but the three individuals who executed it. The concluding words of the paper indicate that the signers contemplated that a further contract between Peek and the corporation should be made. But it is not alleged that this provision was carried out. If Steinberg and Strauss failed to comply with their undertaking to have the corporation "adopt certain by-laws and make a contract with Peek accordingly," their failure could not make the corporation liable for the breach of a contract which it had never made.

[2] The respondent advances the contention that the corporation is liable because it accepted the benefits of the contract with knowledge of its terms. But this theory, if well founded in law, is not presented by the pleadings. All that is averred by the complaint is the making of the agreement by Peek, Steinberg, and Strauss, the assignment by Peek to the corporation of his interest in the copartnership, and the failure of the defendants to carry out the terms of the agreement. There is no averment that the corporation, at the time it took the assignment, had any knowledge of the agreement. The complaint does allege that Steinberg and Strauss own nearly all of the issued stock of the corporation. It is generally held that notice to a mere shareholder is not to be imputed to the corporation (10 Cyc. 1061, and cases cited), but, if the rule were otherwise, the plaintiff would not be aided, for the reason that the allegation of ownership of the stock is directed to the time of the filing of the complaint, not to the time of the assignment to the corporation.

[3] But there are further and more serious objections to the maintenance of the judgment as against any of the appellants. The plaintiff claimed two elements of damage, one of $12,000 for the failure to issue stock to him, the other of $4,200 for the failure to employ him for two years as general manager at a salary of $175 per month. The jury returned a general verdict in the sum of $12,000. It cannot be said, from the face of the verdict, whether it is based on only one or both of these items. The respondent contends that the verdict is to be interpreted as refusing any relief for the failure to employ and as awarding the full amount claimed for the failure to issue stock. But we think the record affords no basis for so reading the verdict. The case was submitted to the jury on instructions presenting for determination the issues relating to both demands, and, as the verdict was single, we cannot say that the jury did not consider both in fixing the amount of damages. The fact that the total sum awarded was equal to the claim for nondelivery of stock alone does not justify an inference that the damages were fixed with reference to this item alone. The jury was not bound to find that plaintiff was entitled to the full amount claimed in this behalf, and the verdict is entirely consistent with the view that something less than $12,000 was allowed on account of the stock, and the balance for failure to carry out the contract of employment.

[4] In so far as the award may have been based on the failure to employ plaintiff as general manager, it is not sustained by the evidence. The averment of the complaint is that the defendants refused and failed to so employ him. The evidence is uncontradicted that he was so employed, and that he of his own motion terminated his relations with the corporation and declined to further serve as general manager. It is claimed that the defendant Steinberg, by interfering with the performance of his duties, prevented his acting as general manager. Without detailing the testimony, we content ourselves with saying that the evidence of interference was too trivial to justify a finding of prevention. But beyond all this the complaint did not tender any issue of prevention of performance. The allegation was that the plaintiff had performed on his part. Such an allegation will not justify a recovery on proof of a valid excuse for nonperformance. "The rule is fundamental that the complaint must either allege performance or a valid excuse for nonperformance. One is not the same as the other." Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 114, 24 Pac. 867; Kredo v. Phelps, 145 Cal. 526, 78 Pac. 1044; Estate of Warner, 158 Cal. 441-445, 111 Pac. 352. It must therefore be held that the court erred in instructing the jury that, if the defendants prevented the plaintiff from carrying out or performing the duty of general manager, such prevention would excuse the plaintiff from the further performance of his obligation to act as such general manager, and he would be entitled to all the benefits of such contract which he would have obtained if the contract had been performed by all the parties. This instruction correctly defines the law in a proper case, but it is inapplicable to a case where the plaintiff, instead of averring prevention of performance or a good excuse for nonperformance, pleads and relies upon a full performance of the obligation on his part.

Since the amount claimed for failure to employ was only $4,200, a large part of the verdict must, in any view, have been based on the failure to issue stock, and it becomes important, therefore, to ascertain what plaintiff's rights in this regard were, and whether those rights were properly submitted to the jury for its determination.

[5, 6] The agreement that plaintiff was to receive "paid-up stock in said corporation to the amount of $12,000" did not entitle him to receive stock actually worth $12,000, but merely to have stock of the nominal or par value of $12,000 issued to him. Noonan v. Ilsley, 17 Wis. 314, 84 Am. Dec. 742. The corporation was organized with a capital stock of $100,000 divided into 1,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. An issue to plaintiff of 120 of these shares, fully paid, would undoubtedly have been a full compliance with this part of the agreement. If such shares had been issued to him, it would hardly have been claimed that the defendants were bound under their contract to make the actual value of the stock equal to its par value. The measure of damages for the failure to issue the stock would then be the detriment suffered by plaintiff for such failure; that is to say, the actual value of the stock at the time when he should have received it. Civ. Code, §§ 3356-3358. Ordinarily the amount recoverable for failure to deliver stock of a corporation is measured by the market value of such stock, but where, as here, the stock has no ascertainable market value, "then the actual or intrinsic value must be taken as the basis." Moffitt v. Hereford, 132 Mo. 513, 34 S. W. 252; Barnes v. Brown, 130 N. Y. 372, 29 N. E. 760; Neher v. Hansen, 12 Cal. App. 370, 107 Pac. 565.

[7] The burden of proving the extent of his damage was, of course, upon the plaintiff.

[8] The record discloses no substantial evidence tending to show, with any approach to accuracy, the value of stock in the defendant corporation. But it is urged that, in the absence of evidence, the par value of stock is, prima facie, its actual value. Conceding the correctness of this view, which has the support of authority (Alexander v. Relfe, 74 Mo. 495; Trust & Sav. Co. v. Home Lumber Co., 118 Mo. 447, 24 S. W. 129), it must certainly be open to the defendants to meet the prima facie case by proof that the actual value of the stock was not equal to its par value. Where there is no established market value for shares, the inquiry into the actual or intrinsic value should not be closely restricted. "This value may depend on many facts and circumstances, such as the value of the property and assets owned, the dividends paid, the character and permanency of the business, the control of the stock, the management, the markets for articles produced if a manufacturing concern, and other facts. The evidence would necessarily take a broad range, and would properly be admissible to prove any fact calculated to affect the value." Moffitt v. Hereford, 132 Mo. 513, 34 S. W. 252. The defendants undertook to show how much lumber had been received by the corporation, and, more specifically, how much had been received under the contracts with the several lumber companies mentioned in the agreement sued upon. Testimony relating to these matters was ruled out on the objection of the plaintiff. The evidence thus excluded was clearly relevant. The corporation was organized for the purpose of carrying on the lumber business. Among its principal assets, as plaintiff claimed, were contracts under which it was to receive, at stated prices, large quantities of lumber from the various companies named in the agreement. It was also to receive lumber to be purchased by Peek from various other mills. The value of these assets, and of the stock of the corporation, would be directly affected by the amount of lumber which the corporation could thus obtain. The defendants had the right to go into all the circumstances affecting these contracts for the delivery of lumber, as well as purchases made by Peek outside of the specified contracts, and to show, as bearing upon the value of the stock, how much lumber had been received by the corporation and how much it had been unable to receive. The rejection of this testimony was erroneous and manifestly prejudicial.

It becomes unnecessary, under the views expressed, to consider further points made by the appellants.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

HENRY v. PHILLIPS et al. (S. F. 5,794.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1912.)

1. PLEADING (§ 248*)—AMENDMENT—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

Where plaintiff's original complaint set out an action to quiet title in the usual form, and an amended complaint alleged plaintiff's title in substantially the same language as the original, but further set out at length facts constituting fraud, for which plaintiff sought to set aside a deed to one of the defendants which was one of the instruments as to which plaintiff sought to have his title quieted in the original complaint, the amendment was not objectionable as charging a new and different cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 686, 687, 689-706, 709; Dec. Dig. § 248.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 244*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS—FRAUD—NOTICE.

In a suit to set aside certain deeds for fraud of the original grantee in obtaining a conveyance from plaintiff, evidence held insufficient to show that the subsequent grantees to whom the land was conveyed had any notice of the original grantee's fraud practiced on plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 609-611; Dec. Dig. § 244.*]

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 228*)—DEED FROM FRAUDULENT GRANTOR—PART PAYMENT—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER.

Where a purchaser of real estate, having received a conveyance of the title and paid a part of the purchase money, obtains notice that his vendor obtained the land by fraud from the previous owner, such purchaser is not ordinarily entitled to protection as a bona fide purchaser except to the extent of the money paid by him before receiving such notice; the defrauded party being entitled to recover the land from such purchaser on condition that the latter be reimbursed for the amount paid before notice.

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 228*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—FRAUDULENT VENDOR.

The rule that a purchaser from a fraudulent vendor will not be regarded as a bona fide purchaser except as to the extent of the money paid before notice of his fraud by the vendor, but will be entitled to hold the land until he is reimbursed for the consideration paid before notice of fraud, does not apply where the amount paid is only nominal or where, by reason of other circumstances, it would be a great hardship on the vendee to take the land from him, in which case he will be allowed to retain the land, and the defrauded party will be limited to a recovery of the unpaid portion of the price.

5. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 59*)—PURCHASE FROM FRAUDULENT VENDOR—REIMBURSEMENT FOR PURCHASE MONEY.

Where plaintiff was induced to convey land by fraud, and his vendee conveyed the same to R., who paid half of the purchase price on execution of the deed without notice of the fraud, he was entitled, in plaintiff's action to quiet title and cancel the deeds, to a provision in the decree for his protection as to the money so paid either by making a return thereof, a condition precedent to any relief, or by declaring a lien therefor on a part of the land against plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Cancellation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 119-125; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by Michael Henry against Dixon L. Phillips and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Dixon L. Phillips and M. K. Harris, for appellants. F. H. Short and F. E. Cook, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendants appeal from the judgment. The evidence is presented in a bill of exceptions.

[1] 1. The objection that the court erred in allowing the amended complaint to be filed is not well taken. The claim is made that it states a cause of action different from that set up in the original complaint. The first complaint states a cause of action, in the usual general form, to quiet plaintiff's title to a tract of land. The amended complaint sets forth the plaintiff's title in substantially the same language as in the first complaint, but it further alleges that the defendants' alleged unfounded claims are based on a certain deed executed by Henry to Phillips, and that said deed was void because it was without consideration and was procured by fraud. The facts constituting the fraud are stated at length. There is a specific prayer that said deed be declared void, otherwise the prayer is in substance the same as before. It is practically the same cause of action; the only difference being that the first complaint states the wrongful claim of defendants in general terms, while the second gives the details.

2. The deed from Henry to Phillips was executed on July 22, 1907. The land conveyed is the northwest quarter of section 10, township 20 south, range 15 east, Mt. Diablo meridian, containing 160 acres. On July 23, 1907, Phillips conveyed an undivided one-third thereof to Robert S. Rendall, who, on February 12, 1908, conveyed said one-third to the defendant George D. Roberts. Each of these deeds, including that of Phillips, recited a money consideration of $10. The evidence, however, shows without conflict that the consideration of the deed from Phillips to Rendall was $500, of which $250 was paid at the time, and the balance was to be paid on December 1, 1907. Rendall was absent when this deed was made and Roberts, as his agent, paid the $250 to Phillips and accepted the deed for Rendall. With respect to the deed from Rendall to Roberts, the evidence is to the effect that Roberts merely took the bargain from Rendall as it stood, allowing the $250 which he had advanced for Rendall to stand as a payment by him to Rendall, and assumed the payment of the remaining $250 due from Rendall to Phillips. This balance still remains unpaid.

[2] There is no evidence that either Rendall or Roberts had knowledge or notice of the negotiations between Henry and Phillips or of any fraud claimed to have been practiced by Phillips in obtaining the deed from Henry. On the contrary, the testimony of Roberts shows that he had no knowledge thereof. The court finds that Roberts took the deed from Rendall with full knowledge of the facts constituting the fraud. This finding has no support in the evidence.

From the evidence and from the other findings in the case, it is a fair inference that the finding just referred to was made by the court as its theory of the legal effect of other facts stated in the other findings, upon which facts it based a conclusion that Roberts and Rendall were chargeable with knowledge of fraud. These findings are that Phillips and Roberts "acted in conjunction in the matter of said transaction with the plaintiff in connection with the deeds to said land, and the said transaction with relation thereto as herein found, and at said time the said Roberts was acting for the said Robert S. Rendall, and in the said transaction in connection with which said Roberts received the said deed from the said plaintiff (defendant Phillips) to the said Rendall, the said Roberts was counseling and advising with said Phillips as to the value of said land and the transactions concerning the same, and it was understood and arranged between the said Phillips and the said Roberts, acting for the said Rendall, that, if the said Phillips purchased and acquired said land, he, the said Phillips, was to convey to the said Rendall, acting through the said Roberts, for a consideration of $500, an undivided one-third interest in and to said land, and the said defendants were acting together in the said transaction, and were jointly interested therein, and each of the said defendants is charged with notice of all of the acts and transactions of the other, and of all of the communications or notices received by either of them." Other findings show that Rendall was in Los Angeles and had no part, personally, in any of the transactions.

There is no substantial evidence of any joint interest, or of any agreement, plan, or scheme that Phillips should obtain the land for the joint benefit of himself and Roberts or Rendall, or in order that he might convey one-third to Rendall, or that Phillips and Roberts "acted in conjunction" in the affair with Henry, or that it was "understood and arranged" that, if Phillips bought the land of Henry, he should convey one-third to Rendall. Roberts testified that he was familiar with the oil business in that vicinity; that Rendall was his brother-in-law; that Rendall told him (apparently prior to the Henry deed, though it is not directly stated) that he (Rendall) could buy a one-third interest in the Henry land from Phillips for $500, and asked as to its value; that he then advised Rendall that the land was worth nothing unless it was oil land, and that, on the chance that it might be oil land, it was worth that sum as a kind of gamble; that he (Rendall) was obliged to go away, and he then authorized and requested Roberts to close the deal with Phillips; that he (Roberts) did so, and at the time paid Phillips $250 for Rendall on the price. Phillips testified that he understood that Roberts was representing Rendall, and after he obtained Henry's deed for the land, and on the same day, he telephoned from Hanford to Roberts, who was at Coalinga, to meet him in Fresno on the following day; that they met in Hanford the next day and went together to Fresno, where Phillips searched the public records and found the title satisfactory; that Roberts then said that Rendall wanted to buy a third interest, and would pay $500 for it; that thereupon he accepted the offer, and at that time, being in the recorder's office, he drew up the Rendall deed, signed and acknowledged it, and delivered it to Roberts, and that Roberts paid $250 on the price. He also testified that, after the execution of the deed from Rendall to Roberts, Roberts told him that Rendall had gone to South America, and had asked Roberts to take this one-third interest off his hands, whereupon Rendall and his wife had conveyed the same to Roberts. There was no other evidence on this branch of the case.

No joint interest is here shown. No writing or other binding agreement concerning the one-third interest is even suggested by the testimony. No consideration had passed for any such agreement, and there is no proof that there had been anything looking towards an agreement between Phillips and Rendall or Roberts concerning this land other than a mere proposal or statement by Rendall to Phillips that, if Phillips got the land that, he (Rendall) would give him $500 for a one-third interest in it. Neither party was bound either in law or equity, and there is nothing to warrant a conclusion that Rendall, in order that he might secure the one-third interest, had delegated or requested Phillips to buy the land from Henry for that purpose, even by fair means, much less by deceit or fraud. There is nothing which makes Phillips the agent of Rendall or Roberts, or which makes either of them responsible for any fraud which may have been practiced by Phillips upon Henry to procure Henry's deed. The judgment declares that the deeds from Phillips to Rendall and that from Rendall to Roberts are null and void, and that Roberts has no right, title, or interest in the land. It makes no provision for the return of the $250 paid by Roberts for Rendall to Phillips, and afterwards adjusted by him with Rendall, and it gives Roberts no lien or claim on Henry or on the land therefor.

[3] The established rule is that the vendee of real estate, who has received a conveyance of the title and has paid a part of the purchase money, but who, before he pays all of it, receives notice of the fact that his vendor obtained the real estate by fraud from the previous owner, is not, under ordinary circumstances, entitled to protection as a bona fide purchaser, except to the extent of the money paid by him before receiving such notice, and that the defrauded party can obtain the land from such vendee, but that he can do so only upon the condition that the vendee is reimbursed what he had paid before notice. The following authorities support this view: Lewis v. Phillips, 17 Ind. 113, 79 Am. Dec. 457; Rhode v. Green, 36 Ind. 10; Burton v. Reagan, 75 Ind. 81; Clift v. Nay, 105 Ind. 356, 5 N. E. 1; Baldwin v. Sager, 70 Ill. 503; Webb v.

Bailey, 41 W. Va. 469, 23 S. E. 644; Youst v. Martin, 3 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 428, 432; Lewis v. Bradford, 10 Watts (Pa.) 82; Kitteridge v. Chapman, 36 Iowa, 348; Warner v. Whitaker, 6 Mich. 133, 72 Am. Dec. 65; Digby v. Jones, 67 Mo. 104; Hardin v. Harrington, 74 Ky. 374; Davis v. Ward, 109 Cal. 191, 41 Pac. 1010, 50 Am. St. Rep. 29; 2 Warvelle on Vendors, § 610; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 750, 755. Many others to the same effect might be cited.

[4] The rule is not absolute or invariable, but depends upon circumstances, and is governed by principles of equity and justice. For example, where the price was $1,000, and only $1 had been paid, it was said that the payment was merely nominal, and that the vendee had no standing as an innocent purchaser for value if he received notice before paying more. Kitteridge v. Chapman, supra. In other cases, where a very small part of the price was unpaid when notice was received, or where the defrauded party was negligent to the prejudice of the purchaser, or where, from the fact of improvements made in good faith, or other conditions, it would be a great hardship upon the vendee to take the land from him, it is said that he should be allowed to retain the land and the defrauded party limited to the recovery of the part of the purchase money still owing by such vendee. Haughwout v. Murphy, 22 N. J. Eq. 548; Frost v. Beekman, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 300; Flagg v. Mann, 2 Sumn. 563, Fed. Cas. No. 4,847. None of these conditions exist here. Roberts therefore is only entitled to the return of the amount paid by him to Phillips on the purchase price of the one-third interest sold by Phillips to Rendall.

[5] The decree should at least have made provision therefor, either by making such return a condition precedent to any relief at all, or by declaring a lien therefor on the undivided one-third of the land in favor of Roberts against Henry. Whether the decree is supportable against attack on other grounds remains to be considered.

3. The decree is not in accordance with the case stated in the complaint, and it is not in all respects supported by the evidence. As we have hereinbefore shown, the amended complaint, in effect, states a cause of action to quiet title, differing from the usual form in that it states the details of the defendants' claim and the facts to show that it is invalid. It does not purport to seek a rescission, and it does not show that Phillips had paid Henry any money on account of their dealings concerning the land. On the contrary, it alleges that the deed from Henry to Phillips was wholly without consideration. It proceeds entirely upon the theory that a deed, obtained by fraud without any consideration, is wholly void between the parties and others with notice, whenever the fraud is shown in a proper case.

The decree adjudges that the respective deeds of Henry to Phillips, Phillips to Rendall, and Rendall to Roberts, are void; that defendants have no right, title, claim, or interest in or to the land, or any part thereof; that the plaintiff is the owner thereof in fee; that his title thereto be quieted; and that the defendants be forever enjoined from claiming or asserting any right, title, or interest in or to the same. It further orders and adjudges that Henry pay to Phillips the sum of $255. It does not declare this sum a lien upon the land, nor make the relief awarded to Henry conditional upon such payment.

There is no foundation in the complaint for this provision in favor of Phillips. The answer of Phillips denies the allegation of the complaint that the deed of Henry was without consideration. It alleges that $245 of the consideration still remains unpaid; that Phillips is ready, able, and willing to pay it and makes tender of it; but it does not state what was the price agreed on, or that any money had been paid thereon. The court made a finding that a few days after the execution of the Henry deed Phillips paid to Henry $250, and later $5, which Henry received in the belief that it was an advance payment upon a sale of the land at $250 an acre made by Phillips for Henry to some third person not named. The judgment for the payment of this $255 would seem to be based upon this finding.

Such a decree cannot be sustained except upon the theory that the contract between Phillips and Henry, whatever its nature, was without consideration, and consequently that no restoration, or offer to restore, from Henry to Phillips, nor any provision securing restoration, was necessary. If a consideration was received by Henry, he could not maintain the action without either restoring it or tendering it to Phillips before the action was begun, or making an offer to do so in his complaint, and in either case the decree should make provision to secure the repayment if restoration was not made before. There are some cases which hold that a prior rescission or offer to rescind and restore is not always essential; that, under some circumstances, as where some reasonable excuse for not sooner restoring or offering to restore the consideration is shown, relief may be granted, notwithstanding the failure to make a previous offer to restore, and the decree may declare the party guilty of fraud, a trustee for the plaintiff, and direct a reconveyance upon terms which will be just and equitable to both parties. More v. More, 133 Cal. 493, 65 Pac. 1044, 66 Pac. 76, is an example of this class of cases. But in that case a good excuse for not making the prior offer was shown, and the court below had adjudged a reconveyance only upon the condition that the money paid by the guilty party be concurrently restored to him. It was because of these provisions that the judgment was approved. We know of no authority for the proposition that, where a grantee who obtains his deed by fraud has paid a part of the price, and has received no rents or other advantage from his bargain equivalent to what he has paid, he can be compelled to reconvey or to submit to a decree canceling his deed, without requiring repayment to him as a condition to the relief granted, or at least declaring a lien upon the land in his favor for the sum paid by him. The decree that the deeds are void, therefore, depends upon the accuracy of the finding that there was no consideration paid by Phillips.

The evidence on this subject consists entirely of the testimony of Phillips and Henry. That of Phillips showed that the transaction was a bona fide sale and conveyance of the land by Henry to him for $500, of which $255 had been paid. Henry's testimony is rambling, confused, and somewhat inconsistent with itself. It can be deemed veracious in intent only upon the theory that his recollection of the transaction is not good. The complaint avers that he understood and believed that the paper he signed was not an agreement or option to buy the land, but a mere power of attorney authorizing Phillips to sell the land as his agent. This allegation is not sustained by any evidence. Henry testified as follows: "I considered it was an option he had fixed up. * * * I thought as long as it was an option and would get me all the money out of this land I wanted, I thought I would let him handle it; I thought that was good enough to get. He didn't say whether it was $100 an acre or $1,000; nothing said about it." Being asked if any papers were read to him, he replied: "He read one, but I don't know how he did read it, I couldn't tell that, whether he called it a deed or an option; I couldn't tell which way he read it. Q. How did you understand it? A. I understood he was making out a deed to sell the land. Q. Would you know the difference between a deed and an agreement for a deed? A. Well, I don't know as I would." On cross-examination the following occurred: "Q. And did you know what the paper was? A. Well, I understood by my attorney that he was making out a deed to sell this land. Q. Making out a deed to sell it? A. An option. Q. Which do you mean, a deed or an option? A. An option. I understood he was making out an option, and he got a deed made out. * * * Q. Well, the paper you signed, who did you understand that deed or option, or whatever you thought it was, was made to? A. He made it out to himself. He didn't tell me about anybody else. Q. You understood at that time that this paper was from you to Phillips? A. Yes, sir."

In regard to the payment of $255, Phillips testified that, after recording the Henry deed at Fresno, he returned to Hanford on July 24th, and there paid Henry $250 as part of the price of the land; that Henry asked him to keep the $250 for him as a custodian and pay it out to or for him in small sums as he wanted it; that he assented to this arrangement and drew up a statement in duplicate, which they both signed, one of which Henry kept. This statement declared that Henry had deposited with Phillips $250 on account of the purchase price of the land, describing it; that Henry had received said sum from Phillips; that Henry could draw said deposited money from time to time as he desired it; and that the reason for making this deposit with Phillips was because of the reckless manner in which said Henry handles his money, especially when he is drinking. This instrument was signed in duplicate by both parties, and its execution is admitted, as also is the delivery of the duplicate copy to Henry. The money so deposited was paid over by Phillips to Henry thereafter in small sums, the last payment, $119.95, being paid on September 10, 1907. The additional $5 was paid on February 11, 1909. Henry made no denial of the payment of this money in the manner stated, nor of the reason therefor as stated in the writing aforesaid. His testimony as to the payment was that Phillips returned to Hanford and reported to him that he made a sale of the land to some one, whose name Phillips did not give, at $250 an acre; that the purchase money would be paid in full within 30 days; that Henry would then get all of his money; and that this $250 was given to him (Henry) as an advance payment on said sale.

It is clear that this evidence does not support a finding that Henry was informed or believed that the paper he signed was a mere authorization to Phillips to sell the land for him as his agent, or a finding that it was in fact of that character. Disregarding Phillips' testimony, that of Henry shows that he understood that he was signing either an agreement to sell the land to Phillips, or an agreement giving Phillips an option to buy it from him. The paper of July 24th, the execution of which he admits, shows that the $250 was paid to him as part of the consideration for the land sold by him to Phillips. His testimony contains no denial of this fact. The finding that there was no consideration was therefore contrary to the evidence. The evidence is conflicting in this: That one party says the sale was evidenced by a deed, while the other understood, or at least says he understood, that it was evidenced by an executory agreement. In either case it would be necessary, as a condition to granting Henry any relief, to make adequate provision securing the return to Phillips of the money he paid to Henry. The case made by the evidence does not authorize a positive decree quieting plaintiff's title, but only a decree for the rescission of the contract, requiring repayment of the $250 as a condition thereof, or declaring it a lien on the land, or, what is in substance as equitable, declaring Phillips a trustee and directing a reconveyance concurrently with repayment of said sum to him. To this extent, there is a material variance between the pleadings and the proof. The judgment given is not warranted by the pleadings, the findings in some particulars are outside of the issues, and neither the complaint nor the findings are in entire harmony with the evidence.

This makes a reversal necessary. A large portion of the appellants' brief is devoted to a consideration of the relative credibility of the plaintiff and defendant Phillips. This is a question which must be determined by the trial court. We cannot enter upon a discussion of it.

The judgment is reversed.

BOYD v. WARDEN et al. (L. A. 2,901.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 114*)—CONTRACTS FOR SALE OF REAL ESTATE—COMPLAINT—REQUISITES—"ADEQUATE CONSIDERATION,"

A complaint in an action for specific performance of a contract to sell real estate need not allege in hac verba that the contract is supported by adequate consideration, but an allegation that the value of the real estate at the time of the contract did not exceed $500, the consideration mentioned in the contract with interest, and that $440 with interest had been paid, and the remainder deposited in court for the vendor, alleges adequate consideration within Civ. Code, § 3391, prohibiting specific performance against a party who has not received an adequate consideration for the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 356-372; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, p. 7565.]

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 12*)—CONTRACTS FOR SALE OF REAL ESTATE—DEFENSES.

Where a contract for the sale of real estate contained an acknowledgment by the vendor of a receipt of a specified sum on account of the price, which sum was the amount fixed as the value of land conveyed by the purchaser to the vendor, and the vendor thereafter accepted monthly installments of the balance of the price, without objecting that the land received was not worth the amount specified, the vendor, in the absence of fraud preventing him from knowing the value of the land conveyed to him, could not rely on the fact that the land was not worth the amount represented by the purchaser, to defeat specific performance of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 26-28, 37; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 185*)—SECONDARY EVIDENCE—OBJECTIONS.

Where a party denied under oath the receipt of a letter from the adverse party, the admission of secondary evidence of the contents of the letter, without first making a written demand on the party for the letter, was not prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 642-660; Dec. Dig. § 185.*]

4. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 120*)—CONTRACTS FOR SALE OF REAL ESTATE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where, in a suit to enforce specific performance of a contract to sell real estate, the vendor relied on a forfeiture of the contract for nonpayment of installments of the price at maturity, evidence that the vendor had offered a discount for an immediate payment of the entire price, and that he had agreed to execute a deed on the payment of a specified sum, was admissible to show a course of dealing between the parties, and as indicating that the vendor did not treat the contract as at an end.

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 187*)—CONTRACTS—NONPAYMENT OF INSTALLMENTS—FORFEITURE—WAIVER.

A contract for the sale of real estate made time of the essence, and called for monthly installments of the price. Various installments and interest were paid, but seldom on the exact dates fixed by the contract. The vendor in acknowledging the receipt of an installment paid a few days after maturity wrote, "Look to the terms of your contract." Thereafter the purchaser offered to pay the balance of the price on condition that she obtained a deed. The vendor gave no notice of his unwillingness to accept such payment. About three months later, she again tendered the amount due and tendered monthly installments due. The tenders were refused. Held, that the vendor waived his right to declare the contract forfeited for nonpayment of installments at maturity.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by L. Agnes Boyd against Julia P. Warden and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Julia P. Warden and C. D. Warden, in pro. per. Constan Jensen and Moore & Evans, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff sued to enforce specific performance of a contract for the conveyance of real property. Defendants appeal from a judgment against them on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence, and they appeal generally from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The contract was signed by plaintiff and by Julia P. Warden. Defendant C. D. Warden is sued as the husband of the latter. By the terms of the instrument, Julia P. Warden agreed, upon full payment of the purchase price of the property described therein, to convey it by a good and sufficient deed of grant to L. Agnes Boyd, and to furnish a certificate by a certain abstract company showing the title to be vested in said Julia P. Warden. By the contract, the vendor acknowledged the receipt of $285, and the vendee agreed to pay $10 on the first of each month, beginning with November, 1907, until the full sum of $215 should be paid, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly. Time was made of the essence of the contract, which provided that, in the event of failure by the vendee to comply with the terms thereof, the vendor should be "released from all obligations in law and equity to convey said property," and the vendee should "forfeit all right thereto and all money theretofore paid under the contract." The evidence showed that various amounts of principal and interest were paid by L. Agnes Boyd, seldom upon the exact dates fixed by the contract, but never very long thereafter. These were accepted by the vendor, and it was stipulated at the trial that on or about January 4, 1909, all payments due to February 1, 1909, had been made. The amount of the principal then unpaid was $60. The court found, upon conflicting testimony, that on or about January 8, 1909, plaintiff wrote defendant a letter requesting that she be permitted to pay the balance of the purchase price, $60 (no part of which was then due under the terms of the contract), and that upon said payment she should receive a deed and certificate as provided by the terms of the agreement. There was a further finding that this offer was bona fide; that defendants gave no notice of their unwillingness to accept it; that not until some time in March, 1909, when plaintiff called at the office of C. P. Warden, the agent of Julia P. Warden, to inquire for her certificate and deed, did she learn of the vendor's unwillingness to accept her offer; that she then and there tendered the whole sum of $60 which was refused; and that she also tendered $30, the payments for February, March, and April, 1909, which were also refused by the agent of the vendor. The court also found that, by mutual agreement of the parties thereto, payments under the contract were made at various places, sometimes to the agent of the vendor at the banking establishment in which plaintiff was employed, and that by reason thereof plaintiff relied on the said agent calling at the bank to get the balance due for the property and to deliver the certificate of title and the deed; that plaintiff was at all times ready, able, and willing to make good her offer; and that defendants had acted in bad faith and had practiced fraud and deceit upon plaintiff in seeking to gain advantage under the strict terms of the contract. Among the conclusions of law was one to the effect that defendants, by their acts and conduct, were estopped from forfeiting and canceling the contract.

[1] Several objections to the rulings of the court with reference to the demurrer to the complaint and the motion to strike out certain parts thereof are made, but they are without merit, and no one of them deserves

notice except the contention that the complaint does not characterize the consideration to be paid under the contract as adequate and the contract just and reasonable to defendants (citing Fritz v. Mills, 12 Cal. App. 115, 106 Pac. 725). This court has consistently upheld the rule set forth in the cited case, but it is not necessary that, to conform to the requirements of section 3391 of the Civil Code, there must be averment and finding in haec verba of "adequate consideration." Wait v. Kern River Mining, etc., Co., 157 Cal. 25, 106 Pac. 98; Sunrise Land Co. v. Root, 160 Cal. 97, 116 Pac. 72. In the complaint in this case, there was an averment, found by the court to be true, "that the value of said real property at the time of the making of said contract did not exceed the sum of $500." As the consideration mentioned in the contract was $500 with interest, and as of that amount $440 with interest had been paid, and the remainder was deposited in court for the vendor, adequacy of consideration was sufficiently alleged and found.

[2] The court on motion struck out a so-called special defense, by which defendants alleged that the $285 mentioned in the contract as paid at the date thereof was represented by plaintiff's conveyance to Julia P. Warden of a lot in Tehama county, which did not exceed $50 in value, and that there was a failure of consideration as to $235. The mere statement of this purported defense shows the propriety of the court's action in striking it out. In the contract itself Julia P. Warden acknowledged the receipt of $285 on account of the purchase price. No court of equity should allow her, after many months during which she had accepted plaintiff's payments under the contract, to endeavor to impeach her own solemn acknowledgment of the payment to her of the $285, unless she fully averred fraud by which she was prevented from knowing the value of the land in Tehama county. There was no such allegation of fraud, and the statement of the attempted defense was wholly insufficient.

[3] Appellants complain of the ruling whereby plaintiff was permitted to testify to the contents of her letter of January 8, 1909, in which she tendered the balance of the purchase price for the property. Their objection to this testimony was based upon the failure to make written demand upon them for the letter, but, as its receipt by them was denied under oath, we fail to see how they were injured by the ruling.

[4] Plaintiff testified that she had a certain conversation with the agent of Julia P. Warden during 1908 in which he offered her a discount for an immediate payment to close the purchase of the property, and was told by her that she would consider the offer and let him know of her determination. This was admissible as showing the course of dealing between the parties, and as indicating one of plaintiff's reasons for believing that her offer, made in good faith, was being considered by the vendor. Testimony was given of another conversation between the same persons in which C. P. Warden, the agent of Julia P. Warden, offered, in March, 1909, to give plaintiff a deed upon payment of $125. But this was admissible, not upon the theory that the agent might vary the terms of the contract, but as one of the indications that the contract was not treated by the vendor as being at an end. It was not offered to show the making of a new contract, for plaintiff never contended that any new contract was made, consequently the case of Niles v. Hancock, 140 Cal. 157, 73 Pac. 840, cited by appellants, is not in point.

[5] The finding that defendants were guilty of fraud is not sustained by the evidence. The mere facts that plaintiff's letter in which she offered to pay the entire balance due on the property was not answered, that Julia P. Warden's agent in refusing the tender subsequently made expressed his intention of "getting even" with Miss Boyd, and the other circumstances given in evidence, are not sufficient to uphold the finding that Julia P. Warden, the vendor, and her husband, were, or that either of them was, guilty of actual fraud; but the finding of fraud is not essential to the upholding of the judgment. Without it, plaintiff is entitled to prevail in this suit. The conduct of defendants did amount to a waiver of the rights which they now assert under the clause of the contract declaring a forfeiture for failure to pay installments exactly on time. Miss Boyd was lulled into the belief that her offer of payment was acceptable. As soon as she learned that her written tender was repudiated, she again offered either to pay the balance due under the contract and a month's installment, or to make good her original tender of the whole balance. Both offers were refused. It was not shown at the trial that defendants were injured by the delay, or that the property had greatly increased in value. No demand was made upon plaintiff after January 1, 1909, nor was anything done by Julia P. Warden or her agent to give notice of the strict enforcement of the terms of the contract in the future. In the letter of January 8, 1909, acknowledging the receipt of the installment due on the first of that month, but paid on or about the fourth, was the sentence, "Look to the terms of your contract," and appellants took the position that this was notice of the intention of the vendor to stand thereafter strictly upon the provisions of the agreement. But the quoted sentence was unrelated to any other part of the letter and was not in any manner illuminated by the context. While somewhat portentous in sound, like the soothsayer's warning to Caesar, "Beware the ides of March," it was equally cryptic, and cannot be construed as the formal notice which appellants would have us pronounce it.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

FAY v. GERMAN GENERAL BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.

(S. F. 5,768.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1912.
Rehearing Denied July 17, 1912.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 292*)—EXISTENCE OF RELATION—INDEPENDENT CONTRACTORS AND THEIR EMPLOYEES.

An agreement between an owner and contractor provided that the owner might remove the contractor under specified circumstances, that the labor should be paid by the owner and the materials by the contractor who should present a bill therefor to the owner with 5 per cent. added, and 5 per cent. of the bills for labor. The owner's superintendent testified that he had a right to discharge workmen for idling or shirking, but he had never exercised that power, and there was no evidence of any contract giving him any powers in excess of those given by the original agreement. The time of the workmen was kept by an employé of the owner. Held, that an instruction in an action by a workman employed by the contractor against the owner for negligence, that where the owner pays another a percentage of the cost of labor and materials, the labor and materials being paid for by the owner, and where the owner has power to discharge the workmen, such workmen are the servants of the owner, was improper, since the evidence did not show any right in the owner to discharge the workmen, and, even if he had that right, the instruction ignored direction and control required by Civ. Code, § 2009, as an essential element of the relation of master and servant.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 277*)—ACTIONS FOR INJURIES—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—EXISTENCE OF RELATION.

In such action a verdict for the workman was unsupported by the evidence which failed to show the existence of the relation of master and servant.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 321*)—INDEPENDENT CONTRACTORS—FURNISHING DANGEROUS APPLIANCES.

In an action by an employé of an independent contractor against an owner for injuries caused by the breaking of a rope belonging to the owner, where it did not appear that the owner insisted on the use of the rope, or that the rope was not merely loaned to the contractor, the owner was not liable on the theory that he furnished an inherent dangerous instrumentality, especially where the case was not tried on that theory.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Edward Fay against the German General Benevolent Society. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Lillienthal, McKinstry & Raymond and Goodfellow, Eells & Orrick, for appellant. Earl H. Webb, Robert P. Troy, and Andrew Thorne, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff, who was a plasterer, was seriously hurt by a fall due to the breaking of a rope holding the platform upon which he was standing while at work. That he was badly injured is not controverted, and that at the time of the accident he was putting a coat of plaster upon the sides of an air shaft in one of the buildings of the German Hospital which the defendant corporation was constructing is also undenied. Judgment was given in favor of plaintiff for $7,500. From this judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

The principal attack of defendant's counsel on the judgment is based upon the argument to the effect that the plaintiff was employed by an independent contractor and not by defendant. A contract had been let for the construction of the hospital, but the contractor failed to complete his work, and thereafter the superintendent of the hospital, W. P. Barry, was appointed to take charge of the work and to see that the building should be completed in accordance with the plans and specifications prepared by the architect. In performing his duties, Barry, as he testified, sometimes made contracts and sometimes did not. He entered into a written arrangement with Smythe Bros. for the work of plastering. By the terms of this agreement, Smythe Bros. were to do all the work of plastering to be done in the group of buildings known as the German Hospital. They promised to perform their part of the contract in a thorough and workmanlike manner, and in strict accordance with the plans and specifications of defendant's architects. This writing also contains the following: "Should the said Smythe Bros. fail at any time to have sufficient men or materials so as to delay the general work, or neglect the same in any way, or act in any way unsatisfactory to architect, it shall be in the power of said W. P. Barry to remove said Smythe Bros. from the work and continue the same without hindrance. All material necessary for said plastering to be purchased by said Smythe Bros. as required and they shall present a bill for the same monthly to the said German General Benevolent Society, adding to said bill 5 per cent. of the same and 5 per cent. of labor paid during the month said bills were contracted. All of the labor required in said plaster work shall be paid net by the German General Benevolent Society each week. On the final and satisfactory completion and acceptance of said work, said Smythe Bros. are to receive an additional 5 per cent. of all bills, for material and all labor paid during the progress of the work."

Under this agreement the work went on. Plaintiff was put to work by Gauldie, who was the foreman for Smythe Bros. Gauldie agreed with plaintiff how much the latter's pay should be, and his wages were handed to him by Gauldie. He testified that he took no orders from Barry, defendant's superintendent. On the witness stand, Barry stated that no one but Smythe and his foreman had control over the plasterers. Their money was sometimes paid by checks, drawn by Barry in favor of Smythe Bros., and sometimes sufficient sums of money for the wages were paid directly to Gauldie, foreman for the Smythes. The weekly receipts, signed by plaintiff and his co-workers, were given to Smythe Bros., and payment was acknowledged by them. The rope which broke and precipitated plaintiff down the airshaft was the property of defendant, but the court properly instructed the jury that that fact alone would not make defendant liable. The court gave the following instruction which may well be taken as the basis of the determination by the jury that Fay was a servant of the defendant corporation: "You are instructed that, where the owner of a building has certain work done thereon under another and pays that other as his compensation therefor a percentage upon the cost of labor performed and materials furnished, and the owner pays for the materials used and pays the men each week to perform the work and has the power to discharge them, then in that case the owner is the master, and the men who do the work are the servants of the master or owner, and the person who is thus paid such a percentage as his compensation is only the agent of the owner, and the men who do the work in such a case are the servants of the owner of the building."

[1, 2] This instruction ignored the elements of entire direction and control prescribed by section 2009 of the Civil Code, as defining the relation of master and servant. It overlooked the clear terms of the contract which did not give defendant the right to select or discharge the plasterers, but only to remove Smythe Bros., if at any time that firm should fail to have sufficient men or materials to prevent delay of the general work. As was said in Callan v. Bull, 113 Cal. 598, 45 Pac. 1018: "The master's liability for the negligence of his servant rests upon his right to select the servant and to control his work, but, when this selection and control rests in another, he is freed from such liability." See, also, Houghton v. Loma Prieta Lumber Co., 152 Cal. 577, 93 Pac. 377; Teller v. Bay & River Dredging Co., 151 Cal. 211, 90 Pac. 942, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 267, 12 Ann. Cas. 779; Boswell v. Laird, 8 Cal. 489, 493, 68 Am. Dec. 345. There is nothing in the case of Needham v. Chandler, 8 Cal. App. 126, 96 Pac. 325, to sustain the position of respondent that a contract like the one here considered gives no independent status to the contractor. The point decided in that case was that, in a controversy between the original parties to the agreement, it was wholly immaterial whether or not the contract was filed for record. The contract provided for the payment of the architect by a percentage of the cost of constructing the building, and the court did say that, "in effect," the contract was "merely an authorization in writing by which plaintiff was to act as agent for defendant for a compensation named in the writing"; but the court was discussing the question of the alleged necessity for recording such an instrument. Responsibility for the act of a servant was in no manner involved in the case of Needham v. Chandler.

Respondent's belief is that the jury found upon conflicting evidence that Fay was a servant of the German General Benevolent Society. Really there was no substantial conflict. It is true that Barry testified to his right to discharge men if they were drinking, idling, shirking, "or anything of that kind"; but he never did exercise that authority, and there was no evidence of any contract, written or verbal, giving him powers in excess of those provided for in the agreement heretofore mentioned. Mere power to discharge men does not necessarily imply that they are the servants of the person possessing that authority. In Callan v. Bull, supra, the court held that: "The reservation by the employer of the right to remove any of the employés of the contractor does not relieve the latter from liability for the negligence of his employés. Reedie v. Railway Co., 4 Ex. 244; Cuff v. Newark, etc., R. R. Co., 35 N. J. Law, 17, 10 Am. Rep. 205."

So in this case, if the authority of Barry or of Walsh, his assistant, to remove men from the work be conceded, that does not indicate that Smythe Bros. were not independent contractors. Nor is the circumstance that defendant's servant kept the time of the plasterers at all significant of a condition not shown by the written contract. As the compensation of the firm having the contract for plastering depended partly upon the cost of the labor, it was very natural that defendant, acting after default of its general contractor as its own builder, should keep account of the labor and material used in the work of plastering. That Barry had the general direction of the work as to the results thereof is doubtless true, but he did not have authority to direct the manner in which the work was to be performed. As he himself said: "I did not offer any suggestions or opinions to the workmen at any time; I am not a plasterer; I would not know how to do the work." It would not be valuable to review the testimony of Barry and Walsh further regarding their own views of their powers as employés of the defendant corporation. It is sufficient to say that nothing in their conduct demonstrated a state of facts inconsistent with the standing of Smythe Bros. as independent contractors. We are satisfied that the instruction given by the court and quoted herein was not a correct statement of the law applicable to the evidence adduced at the trial, and that the proof did not justify the verdict.

[3] The only other matter requiring notice is the furnishing by defendant of the rope which broke and caused the accident. We are not unmindful of the rule that makes a principal responsible where he arbitrarily assumes to direct the employes of a subcontractor and thereby creates an unsafe place or furnishes an unsafe appliance for the conduct of their work. Majors v. Connor, 121 Pac. 373. In this case there was proof that many appliances, used by the original general contractor and others purchased by the defendant after it, through its agents, took charge of the work, were upon the premises. It does not appear that defendant's superintendent insisted upon the use by the servants of Smythe Bros. of the rope belonging to the defendant. For all the evidence shows, the rope may have been merely loaned to Smythe Bros. The case was not tried upon the theory that defendant was liable because it had furnished an inherently dangerous instrumentality. The court properly instructed the jury that this was a suit brought by the plaintiff as a servant against a master, and that, if the jurors believed Smythe Bros. to be independent contractors, their verdict should be for the defendant. No other questions in this case require consideration.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. R. Hervey, Judge.

Action by Willard H. Clark against N. C. Kelley and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Hanson, Hackler & Heath, for appellant. Schweitzer & Hutton, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendant Kelley appeals from a judgment against him entered after his default, following the court's order sustaining a demurrer to his cross-complaint.

In December, 1907, N. C. Kelley executed his promissory note to W. P. Fuller & Co. for $2,471.54, and at the same time by way of security assigned and delivered to W. P. Fuller & Co. three contracts executed by one Owings in favor of Kelley, by which said Owings agreed to purchase from Kelley certain parcels of real property. Subsequently the notes and contracts were assigned to Willard H. Clark, plaintiff and respondent herein, who, after the maturity of the note, commenced an action thereon, and procured the issuance of a writ of attachment under which the sheriff of Los Angeles county attached certain real property belonging to Kelley. He defended upon the ground that plaintiff had security in the shape of real estate for the payment of the note sued upon, and on the same ground moved for the dissolution of the attachment. The court determined that the attachment was improperly issued; dismissed it; and, finding that the note was secured by an equitable mortgage on real property, gave judgment for defendant.

In January, 1910, Willard H. Clark commenced the action at bar, joining Owings as a defendant with Kelley, and asking for the foreclosure of the equitable mortgage. To the complaint defendant Kelley demurred upon several grounds, and upon the overruling of his demurrer he filed an answer and cross-complaint. Both pleadings sought to bring into the case W. P. Fuller & Co. as the real parties in interest upon the ground that Clark was merely an agent in bringing the suit. The cross-complaint demanded damages for the improper levy of attachment upon Kelley's property, consisting of attorneys' fees incurred in defending the action, injury to cross-complainant's credit, and clouding his title to certain property with the result that pending and prospective sales were spoiled. Both cross-defendants successfully demurred to this cross-complaint.

But two questions are argued in the briefs, appellant insisting that the court erred in (1) overruling his demurrer to the complaint, and (2) in sustaining the demurrers to his cross-complaint.

[1] The demurrer to the complaint was special and was based upon the contentions that Owings was improperly joined as a party defendant, as he had no privity of contract with the plaintiff; that the spouses of Owings and Kelley were not made parties defendant; that there was a misjoinder of causes of action because plaintiff sought to combine an action to foreclose an equitable mortgage with one to terminate the interest of Owings in the contracts for the purchase of real property; and that each of the three contracts should have been made the subject of a separate action. In their briefs, counsel for appellant merely restate these causes of demurrer without favoring us with any citations or argument in favor of their position, so without further comment we indorse the ruling of the lower court.

[2] The demurrer to the cross-complaint was based upon a number of objections, but counsel have devoted their briefs to the proposition that the matters set up in the cross-complaint are not so related to the main action that they are the proper subject of such a pleading. It is provided by section 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure that: "Whenever the defendant seeks affirmative relief against any party to the action, relating to or depending upon the contract or transaction upon which the action is brought, or affecting the property to which the action relates, he may * * * file * * * a cross-complaint." As Whittier, Fuller & Co. were not "parties to the action," the demurrer interposed on their behalf was properly sustained. A defendant may not, under the power given by section 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure, bring in new parties by way of cross-complaint. Alpers v. Bliss, 145 Cal. 570, 79 Pac. 171; Merchants' Trust Co. v. Bentel, 10 Cal. App. 76, 101 Pac. 31.

[3] There is a wide diversity of decision in other jurisdictions with reference to cross-complaints and counterclaims pleaded under the provisions of statutes akin to sections 438 and 442 of our Code of Civil Procedure. Even in California there is apparent inconsistency of ruling in the earlier cases. In Waugenheim v. Graham, 39 Cal. 177, this court held (although that determination was not absolutely essential to the decision of the case) that, where a contract was payable in lumber, the demand of plaintiff for its payment in money and the suing out of an attachment prematurely might be made the bases of a cross-complaint for damages, while in the later case of Jeffreys v. Hancock, 57 Cal. 646, it was held that damages, arising by reason of an excessive attachment levy on defendant's property in the same action, might not be pleaded in a cross-complaint. In Glide v. Kayser, 142 Cal. 419, 76 Pac. 50, this court held that, in an action of claim and delivery, defendant may not recover damages by way of cross-complaint for injury by plaintiff's cattle to his realty. Mr. Justice McFarland, who wrote the opinion in that case, rather inclined to the doctrine (not necessarily involved therein, however) that "the term 'transaction' in a statute limiting counterclaims to demands arising out of the same transaction intends some commercial or business negotiation, and not a wrong of violence or fraud"—citing Abbott's Law Dictionary, and the court reaffirmed the rule announced in Meyer v. Quiggle, 140 Cal. 495, 74 Pac. 40: "It was not the intention of the reformed procedure to allow persons having independent claims against each other the relief authorized in one having no relation to that which could be given in the other, nor in any manner affecting it, to settle them all in one action upon the sole ground that, as they had been brought into court to contend against each other with respect to one case or dispute, they should at that time and place settle all other matters of controversy existing between them." The later case of Engelbreton v. Gay, 158 Cal. 28, 109 Pac. 879, emphasizes the interpretation which denies the right to counterclaim or to file a cross-complaint for damages merely collateral to the main contract upon which suit is brought. If defendant Kelley had commenced an action against plaintiff Clark, asking for damages for the improper issuance and levy of an attachment in the former action, we do not think that the latter would or should have been permitted to set up by way of cross-complaint the note and assigned contracts here pleaded, because surely they would not have been "matters arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint." The converse of this proposition is equally plain.

Judgment affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by the City of Santa Ana and others against the Santa Ana Valley Irrigation Company. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. E. Keech, for appellant. W. F. Heathman and Williams & Rutan, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. The plaintiff city, and the other plaintiffs who are abutting owners on the south side of West Washington avenue in said city between Ross and Baker streets, a distance of some five blocks, and on East Seventeenth street, between Bush and French streets, a distance of two blocks, sued to restrain the defendant from maintaining an open water ditch on the south side of said avenue and street between said side streets, to have the same declared a public nuisance, and to require defendant to construct instead of said open water ditch some suitable, reasonable, and proper conduit placed underground along the street in its stead. A decree to that effect was awarded plaintiffs, and defendant appeals therefrom and from the order denying its motion for a new trial. The principal attack made by appellant is upon the findings as they apply to the open water ditch running along West Washington avenue between the streets mentioned. No attack is made on the findings or judgment as far as they affect the open water ditch of appellant on East Seventeenth street. It was stipulated on the trial that, if the ditch was found to be located on Seventeenth street, it was a nuisance thereon. The court found it was so located, but only to a very slight extent, and appellant acquiesces in the judgment so far as it affects the ditch on that street.

It may be said, preliminarily, that in 1868 a partition of the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana, through which the Santa Ana river runs, was decreed and allotments made to the several tenants in common with the right to use the waters of the river on such lands as were irrigable therefrom. By the decree a right of way through the allotments was given for ditch purposes to carry water to such irrigable lands. It was in general terms; no way or course being described or specifically provided for. In 1882 a ditch, a portion of which is involved here, was constructed by the owners of certain allotments for the irrigation of some of their lands and was subsequently turned over to the defendant corporation. In 1886 the plaintiff city of Santa Ana was incorporated, and embraced within its corporate boundaries were included some of said allotments and a large portion of the ditch in question, including its length along what is now West Washington avenue between the streets referred to.

As to West Washington avenue and the ditch upon it, the court found that during the year 1882, and at the time of the construction of the ditch along the south of the center line of said avenue, there was, and ever since had been, and now is, a traveled public road, highway, and street along and on each side of the center line of said avenue, and that a portion of said road, highway, and street extended 25 feet south of the center line thereof; that said road, highway, and street ever since the year 1882, and prior to the construction of said ditch, have included within it the land over and upon which said ditch is constructed; that said open water ditch is 3 feet wide at the top, and 1 foot wide at the bottom, and 2½ feet deep; that the maintenance of said ditch as an open water ditch on said West Washington avenue was and is dangerous to the public and the lives and property of the persons traveling or living on either side of said street, and is an obstruction to the free use in the customary manner of said public street upon which it is situated; that the lands lying south of said avenue have not since the construction of said ditch along the south side of said avenue, and are not now, used entirely for agricultural purposes; that the larger portion of said lands are now used for building lots and residence purposes, and the lands lying north have never been irrigated from said ditch, and the owners thereof have no interest in it, and said property therein is used for residence purposes; that said defendant can change said open ditch where it is now located to a pipe line and conduct said water therein in order to supply abutting landowners and stockholders with water for irrigation, and can make the necessary standpipes therefor without interfering or obstructing said street.

It is insisted by appellant that there was no evidence to sustain the particular finding that, when the ditch was located in 1882, what is now known as West Washington avenue was a traveled public road, highway, and street, and that the ditch of appellant was constructed thereon. The legal proposition relied on by appellant under this claim of the insufficiency of the evidence is that, if, when the ditch was dug, the land over which it was then constructed was not included within a then public road or highway and only became included as such subsequently, the right to the easement over it for the ditch had become a prior vested property right to which the easement for a public road, highway, or street was subordinate, and that the city in the exercise of its police powers, under which now it attempts to compel a change in its use, could not interfere with or impair this vested right; that such vested right could only be affected through condemnation or similar proceedings in which suit aside from other damages to which the appellant might be entitled the expense of making the change from an open to a covered ditch should be awarded it, or the expense of doing so should be borne by the municipality.

This question of who shall bear the burden of the change is really the only point in controversy in the case presented under the attack upon the findings. There seems, under the evidence, to be no room for any serious complaint on the part of the appellant against the finding that the maintenance of the ditch on the avenue in its present condition is under the existing and growing conditions of the city in its vicinity a nuisance; nor that the change as decreed from an open to a closed ditch is not entirely practicable. Neither do we understand counsel for appellant to question but that if there existed a public road or highway along what is now West Washington avenue in 1882, which then included the land on which its ditch was afterwards constructed, that the municipality, in the exercise of its police power, could not require the change in the use which has been decreed by the court, and that appellant must make the change at its own expense.

Now as to the finding of a pre-existing easement for highway purposes over the land when the ditch was constructed. While the existence of a public highway over the land when the ditch was constructed along it was made an issue under the pleadings, the evidence produced respecting it was presented exclusively by the respondent city. There can be no manner of question but that in 1887, a year after the incorporation of the city of Santa Ana, what is now known as West Washington avenue, and upon which the ditch in question was constructed, was and ever since has been a public highway or street. The claim of appellant, however, is that, when the ditch was constructed in 1882, it had not been established or dedicated as a highway, and that the evidence by which respondent sought to establish it fails to show it. Before considering this claim, it may be said that as early as 1875, and up to the time of the construction of the ditch, there was an existing highway running to a considerable width over and along the present course of what is now West Washington avenue. The country was then sparsely settled and the travel was not extensive, but it was generally used as a highway; the beaten track lying on either side of the center line of the present West Washington avenue, though not actually traveled as far south as along the 25 feet from said center line within which the ditch was thereafter located. At the time it was so being used as such highway, the title to the land over which it existed was in one Jacob Ross as allottee under the decree of partition of the Santa Ana Rancho made in 1868. In 1871 Jacob Ross conveyed his allotment to one Josiah Ross, who, by sundry deeds made between 1876 and 1881, conveyed to various persons portions thereof; the northern line of the lands conveyed being the center line of said highway, and in such deeds reserving 25 feet off of and along the northern boundary of the lands conveyed "for road purposes." These reservations included the land lying 25 feet south of the center line of the public road as it had theretofore for years existed. Ross also made conveyances of land in this allotment immediately north of the center line of the said existing highway, and made similar reservations of 25 feet along the north of the center line of said highway for road purposes, disposing of the last portion of the land owned by him abutting on the center line of said avenue in 1892. The plaintiffs in this action other than the city of Santa Ana are the successors in interest of Ross to the fee in the lands south of the center line of said avenue covered by the reservations for road purposes made by him. Subsequent to said reservations, and in 1882, the appellant proceeded to build its ditch. It was shown in evidence that, when the construction of this ditch was commenced, Ross protested against it being done, objecting, however, only to what he claimed was the construction of a canal, saying that in his "reserves for streets" he had put reserves in the deeds for ditches (which was an error on his part, because he had not), but that a canal was being constructed and not a ditch, and ordered the parties constructing it to desist. No attention was paid to his objection, and the ditch was constructed within the reserved 25-foot strip south of the center line of the highway, as it was the avowed purpose and intention of the builders to do when they commenced constructing it. The ditch has remained there ever since.

[1] Under the evidence, the claim of appellant is that as the old highway did not cover by actual user the strip of land 25 feet from the center line when the ditch was constructed thereover, the only support for the finding that it did must be based on the reservation thereof for road purposes made by Ross in his conveyances, and it is insisted that these reservations did not amount to a dedication of the strip to the public for road, highway, or street purposes; that the reservations by Ross were for his own use and not for the benefit of the public; that the right of the public to an easement over the portion reserved for road purposes did not attach until adverse user of it for such purposes for five years, which was long after the construction of the ditch over the reservations had occurred. In support of this claim they cite such cases as Taft v. Tarpey, 125 Cal. 376, 58 Pac. 24, and Pitcairn v. Harkness, 10 Cal. App. 295, 101 Pac. 809. But these cases are not in point under the evidence here. In those cases it is true the question was the extent to which the party making a reservation for road purposes intended it to apply, whether it showed an intention to dedicate the strip described to the public as a highway, or to declare a reservation for the benefit of the grantor alone. The actions were between successors in interest of the former owner who made the reservations and those claiming that the reservations were in effect a dedication for public use as a highway. The language used in making the reservations was similar to that used by Ross in his conveyances. But there was no evidence in those cases of any intent to devote the use of the land reserved for road purposes except as the language employed disclosed it. It was held that, considering the language alone in which the reservations were expressed, they appeared to be made for the benefit of the grantor only, and disclosed no intention to dedicate the land for public use.

But here the trial court had not only before it the language of the reservations themselves, but the circumstances and surroundings under which Ross made them, and his conduct after they were made, which sufficiently warranted it in concluding that Ross intended to and did by these reservations immediately dedicate all the land embraced therein to the use of the public as a highway.

It appears that Ross made many other deeds of portions of the large tract of land he owned besides those in which the reservations along what was then the old highway, but now West Washington avenue, were made; reservations along the four sides of said particular tracts from which it is only a fair and reasonable inference that in doing so he intended that these reservations should be used as public roads or streets connecting with each other as they thereafter did.

As far as the reservation of 25 feet along both sides of the center line of the present avenue is concerned, the use of the term "for road purposes" therein must, as reflecting his intention, be considered in the light of existing conditions when he used it. It is true that in his reservations he did not refer to an existing highway, nor make his reservations in terms on either side of the center line thereof, but there is no question in the case that the center line of the old highway was the line along which, on either side thereof, he reserved a 25-foot strip for road purposes. At the time he made his reservation, there existed, in fact, over his land and was included within its description an open road or highway. Whether a public easement had at that time been acquired or not over any portion of the strip reserved is immaterial. It was certainly then being traveled as a public highway under a claim of right and without objection or hindrance from Ross. He knew of this use and acquiesced in it. If by user the public had acquired an easement therein, the reservation of Ross could not have affected it and it is not to be assumed that he intended to do so. If an easement had not been acquired, then certainly it could not be questioned but that his reservation for "road purposes," used in general terms and applying to a strip of land a part of which was then being and had been for years actually used by the public for road purposes, would be construed as granting to or confirming in the public the same right to the use thereof and to the same extent that it was then being enjoyed, namely, as a public highway. But it is said that these circumstances, applied to the reservations, would at most only disclose an intention on the part of Ross to create an easement for highway purposes to the extent that the highway was then being traveled or used which did not actually extend to the full width of the strip described in the reservations and upon which the ditch of the appellant was constructed.

But, taking the reservations as disclosing an intention on the part of Ross to dedicate or confirm to the public an easement over the strip for at least the then existing highway which, we are satisfied, they do, there is no plausible ground for claiming any limitation as to his intention, or that he did not intend the entire width to be devoted to the same public highway purposes. The highway was being traveled, but it had no defined limits as to width. As is common on ungraded roads in an open country, the travel will at times vary largely on one side or the other from the general center line, depending on conditions of the road or the weather.

As the owner of the fee in land over which the highway existed, and while intending by his reservations to dedicate or confirm an easement therein to the public as such, it was to the interest of Ross to define the limits to which thereafter it should be used for that purpose, and he did so. This intention to devote the entire strip for public use as a highway is to some extent further disclosed from his language and conduct when the ditch was being constructed over it. While objecting to what he claimed was digging a canal instead of a ditch, he did not declare that the reservations were for his exclusive benefit, or that there was any restrictions upon their use for ordinary highway purposes, but on the contrary designated them as reserves for "streets." This was not the term he used in the reservations; there they are made for "road purposes." But when on the one hand he designates his reserves as for "road purposes," and on the other declares that they were made for "streets," a term which, as applied to cities or towns or growing communities contiguous thereto, means a public thoroughfare, the use of the terms interchangeably fairly indicates that what reservations he did make were not for his own benefit, but as highways for public use.

Upon these considerations and others which might be suggested, the trial court was warranted in finding that, prior to and at the time the ditch of appellant was constructed, the present West Washington avenue was and ever since has been a public highway, and that, when the ditch was constructed, it was constructed on land included in said highway.

[2] It is hardly necessary to say that, after the dedication of the strip for a public highway by Ross, the use of only a portion of it for such purposes by the public shows no abandonment of the unused portion. The acceptance by user of a portion of a road dedicated is an acceptance of it in its entirety. S. P. R. R. Co. v. Ferris, 93 Cal. 263, 28 Pac. 828, 18 L. R. A. 510.

[3] Aside from the claim that the portion of the strip upon which the ditch is located was not a portion of the public highway when the ditch was constructed, it is further insisted that, even if it was, it only became so under the reservations by Ross, and his right to create the easement for highway purposes, and the easement itself, were subject to and subordinate to a prior vested right in the defendant under the partition decree of 1868 to an easement over this strip for ditch purposes. This claim is based upon the terms of the partition decree which preserved to the several allottees under the partition a right to the use of the waters of the Santa Ana river on their allotments containing arable and irrigable lands and which provided that "any party, * * * holding allotment * * * of land irrigable from the waters of the Santa Ana river, shall have the right of way to enter over and upon the allotments lying above them for the purpose of keeping up a convenient zanja (ditch) and running water therein for irrigation." As we have heretofore stated, this ditch was constructed by the property owners other than Ross, having lands to the south thereof and on completion turned over to appellant. But this provision in the decree gave neither the allottees nor the defendant, their successor in interest to the ditch, any right to enter upon any portion of the lands of the owners of allotments that they saw fit. In constructing the ditch, the original constructors might have refused to construct it anywhere other than within the boundary lines of allotments, and could have refused to construct it along a public highway, or appellant refused to accept it as so constructed. This was not done. It was constructed over the strip which they knew had theretofore been dedicated and accepted as a highway, and, having done so, they made their location, subject to the prior easement vested in the public for highway purposes, and subordinate to the right of the public to so control the easement for the ditch that it should not interfere with such prior and paramount right and subject to a reasonable regulation of the use of the easement for ditch purposes by the municipality in the exercise of its police powers for the safety and comfort of the civic community.

[4] It appearing, therefore, that the avenue had been dedicated to public use as a highway or street when the ditch of the appellant was constructed thereon, and the easement acquired thereby was subject and subordinate to the prior right of the public to its use for highway purposes, it is quite clear that the judgment, at the instance of the city regulating its further use, was proper and warranted under section 11, art. 11, of the Constitution of the state, which empowers any municipality to enforce within its limits "local, police, sanitary and other regulations." It is to be noticed that this is not a case where it is claimed, on the part of the municipality, that the defendant has no right at all to occupy the public street with its ditch. It concedes the right to do so, but only requires that the manner of its use be changed so as not to interfere with the right of the public and the municipality to the free and unobstructed use and control of the street in the customary manner.

When the city of Santa Ana was incorporated in 1886, it included within its municipal boundaries the avenue upon which the ditch was constructed, and thereby acquired the right to control its use as a public street to the full extent that the public necessity then or thereafter demanded. At the time of the incorporation, and for years thereafter, the land on either side of the avenue and in its vicinity being principally farming or orchard property, and there being but a limited travel over the avenue, there was no necessity for interfering with the ditch as an open one. But within the past few years these land along the avenue and between the streets heretofore referred to have been laid out into blocks and lots, and to a large extent have become populous portions of the city with an increased travel along the avenue. The ditch in question consists of a cement open ditch 3 feet wide and 2½ feet deep, raised a foot and a half above the line of the street, and located along that portion of it where a sidewalk would ordinarily be placed. A ditch of this character, located on a public highway in the immediate vicinity of a residential part of the city, is, as the court found it to be, a public nuisance, and subjects the public traveling along the highway and the property owners and residents in its vicinity to danger, and is an interference with the right of the public to a free and unobstructed and entire use of the street for the purposes of travel, as it likewise prevents the municipality in the discharge of its public duty from placing and maintaining the street in its entirety for public use. That the police power of the city of Santa Ana, under the facts disclosed, is ample to require the defendant to change the manner of the use of one of the public streets of the municipality so as not to endanger the public safety or interfere with the free and unobstructed use thereof cannot be questioned. Nor need authorities in support of it be cited, because we do not understand counsel to claim that, if a public easement for highway or street purposes existed at the time the easement in West Washington avenue therefor for ditch purposes was imposed, the city of Santa Ana could not, under its police power, control or regulate the use of such ditch easement. We understand this to be conceded; the only claim being that the easement for the ditch was, for the reasons heretofore assigned and discussed, superior to the easement for a public highway. But that position we have decided is under the evidence untenable.

It is asserted by appellant that the only easement it acquired through the original and actual location of the ditch in 1882 was a right thereafter to maintain it as an open one only; that it has no legal right to use, nor could the court empower or compel it to use, a different conduit than such open ditch. But if this position were correct, as the easement of the appellant is subordinate to the easement for highway purposes, and the present manner of its maintenance has become a nuisance if it were impossible for it legally to change its present use, it would have to be abolished entirely. But to the advantage of appellant there is no merit in the claim of its counsel, because all the owners in fee in the lands impressed with the easements, both for highway and ditch purposes, are plaintiffs in this action, as well as the city having control of the highway easement, and, are all consenting and requiring that appellant make the change.

We are not to be understood in the discussion of this case to intimate or hold that, if the highway easement was subsequent or subordinate to the easement for the ditch, the municipality would not have the authority, in the exercise of its police power, to regulate its use; the burden of any expense in a change thereof to be borne by the owners of the ditch easement. We determine nothing on that point, as it is not involved, because here the easement for the highway is superior to the ditch easement, and there can be no question of the power of the city, under such circumstances, to regulate its use, and that any change in the manner thereof must be made at the expense and charge of the owners.

There is nothing further requiring consideration.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

In re HUSTON'S ESTATE. (Sac. 1,992.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 24, 1912.

Rehearing Denied July 22, 1912.)

1. WILLS (§ 55*)—TESTATOR'S MENTAL CAPACITY—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In a will contest, evidence held to sustain a finding that testatrix was mentally incompetent when she executed the document.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 137-158, 161; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

2. WILLS (§ 50*)—TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY—MENTAL CONDITION.

One has sufficient mental capacity to make a will if he is able to understand the nature and situation of his property and his relations to his relatives and those around him, with clear remembrance as to those persons in whom and those things in which he has been mostly interested, and is capable of understanding what he is doing.

3. WILLS (§ 360*)—REVIEW—OBJECTIONS NOT MADE BELOW.

On appeal in a will contest, objection to testimony of a physician as to testatrix's sanity on the ground that the testimony was incompetent as a privileged transaction within Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 4, will not be considered where the only objection at the trial was based on a claim that witness had not shown himself qualified to testify and that a question asked him was double.

4. EVIDENCE (§ 537*)—EXPERT OPINIONS—MENTAL CONDITION.

In a will contest, a physician was properly permitted to give an opinion as to whether testatrix was mentally sound during a period of his observations where he had qualified prima facie as an expert.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2345; Dec. Dig. § 537.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 84*) — EVIDENCE—OBJECTIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

On an issue of testatrix's mental capacity, testimony of a nurse, who attended testatrix while she was in the hospital a few weeks after the will was executed, as to the condition of testatrix's mind during "that time" was properly admitted as against objection to testimony of testatrix's mental condition "at the time of the execution of the will."

6. INSANE PERSONS (§ 2*)—EVIDENCE OF INCOMPETENCY.

To show the condition of one's mind at a given time as to sanity, evidence tending to show such condition shortly before and shortly after the time is admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insane Persons, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-10; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 96*)—MOTION TO STRIKE TESTIMONY—SUFFICIENCY.

Motion to strike the entire testimony of a witness is properly overruled if it is partly admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 248; Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

8. EVIDENCE (§ 474*)—EXPERT TESTIMONY—QUALIFICATIONS OF WITNESS—SUFFICIENCY OF SHOWING.

That witness had known testatrix all his life and had met her "off and on, maybe once a month and maybe oftener," and that he observed her appearance, conduct, and conversation, was a sufficient prima facie showing of intimate acquaintanceship to qualify him to testify as to her condition.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Proceedings for the probate of the will of Nancy Huston, deceased. From an order denying probate, and from an order denying a new trial, the executor and another appeal. Affirmed.

L. G. Harrier and T. T. C. Gregory, for appellants. Theodore A. Bell and Frank R. Devlin, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by the surviving executor named in the document offered for probate as the last will of deceased, and by Maggie Clark, a legatee named in said document, from an order denying probate of said document as the last will of deceased, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Deceased died in the latter part of the year 1909, leaving an estate valued at about $6,000. On December 1, 1905, when 86 years of age, she had executed the document offered for probate as her last will. By this document, after providing for burial and payment of her debts, she gave to the contestant, Anne Murray, her only child, $25 "and no more. Her conduct and actions toward my husband and myself having been such in the past that I do not wish to make any further bequest to her." She then gave to her niece, Maggie Clark $200 "as a small return for the services rendered to my husband and myself while we were in trouble," and to the trustees of the First Presbyterian Church of Vallejo $500 for the use of the congregation. She then gave all the rest and residue of her estate one half to said Maggie Clark and the other half to the trustees of the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America, to be distributed in equal amounts among seven boards of said church. She appointed Rev. Theodore F. Burnham and Philip Steffan executors without bonds. When the document was offered for probate, it was contested by the daughter, Anne Murray, on the ground, among others, that the deceased at the time of its execution was not of sound and disposing mind and memory, and not competent to execute a last will and testament. The verdict of the jury was in favor of contestant on this ground of contest, and judgment was thereupon given denying the application for the admission of the document to probate.

[1] 1. It is very earnestly urged that the evidence is not legally sufficient to support the conclusion of mental incompetency of the deceased at the date of the execution of the alleged will. A full consideration of the evidence has satisfied us that this is not one of the cases in which it fairly may be said that there is only "some slight pretense of evidence" to support the verdict, or that "the jury were evidently actuated by motives which they had no right to consider." There was substantial evidence in support of the conclusion reached, and it is our opinion that the most that can be said in appellants' favor on this point is, as was said in the case from which we have already quoted, "the verdict might with propriety have been the other way; but we cannot say that it was entirely outside the legitimate province of the jury." Estate of Tibbetts, 137 Cal. 123, 69 Pac. 978.

We cannot agree at all with learned counsel for appellants that respondent is compelled to rely solely on a showing of insane delusions on the part of deceased to sustain the verdict. The ground of contest was want of competency of the deceased to make a will.

[2] The essentials to a sound and disposing mind and memory are well stated in Estate of Motz, 136 Cal. 558, 562, 69 Pac. 294, 295, cited by appellants, as follows: "The soundness of mind required for making a will has relation to the act of the testator in making final disposition of his property as he desires. Although feeble in health, suffering under disease, aged, and infirm, the testator, if of sound mind with reference to the disposition of his property, may make a will. If he is able to understand and carry in mind the nature and situation of his property and his relations to his relatives and those around him, with clear remembrance as to those in whom and those things in which he has been mostly interested, capable of understanding the act he is doing, and the relation in which he stands to the objects of his bounty, free from any delusion, the effect of disease, which might lead him to dispose of his property otherwise than he would if he knew and understood what he was doing, he has the capacity to make his will. Whitney v. Twombly, 136 Mass. 145."

The law in this behalf was correctly stated to the jury in the following instructions; the first being given at the request of the appellants, and the second being given at the request of the contestant: "1. The law is that to be of sound and disposing mind and memory, so as to be capable of making a valid and binding will, it is sufficient if the testatrix has an understanding of the nature of the business in which she is engaged—a recollection of the property she means to dispose of—of the persons who are the objects of her bounty and the manner in which it is to be distributed among them." "3. If you believe, from a preponderance of the evidence in this case, that, at the time of the execution of the will herein, Nancy Huston was not able to understand and carry in mind the nature and situation of her property, and her relations to her relatives and those around her, with clear remembrance, as to those in whom and those things in which she had been mostly interested, and not capable of understanding the act she was doing and the relation in which she stood to the objects of her bounty, then I instruct you that your verdict must be for the contestant herein."

There was evidence tending to show that deceased commenced to fail quite rapidly, both physically and mentally, in the summer of 1905; that she thought a nurse at the St. Helena Sanitorium, where she and her husband were staying, had knocked her down and blackened her side, and had put her in a tub and tried to suffocate her; that she thought people were trying to poison her; that she was distrustful of her neighbors, and did not want any of them to come near her place; that she took no interest in things and was melancholy; that these conditions continued until the last of October, when Mrs. Murray left her and her husband at the ranch. When Mrs. Murray left, she employed a man to go to the ranch and look out for the old people, but they refused to allow him to stay, and deceased thereafter insisted to several people that Mrs. Murray had sent this man out to kill them. Shortly after Mrs. Murray left, deceased and her husband went to the house of the Clarks to live, and remained there until after the will was executed. Several witnesses, who had known the deceased for many years, gave it as their opinion that her mind was to some extent impaired during the year 1905. On December 29, 1905, she was taken seriously ill and was in Dr. Hogan's hospital at Vallejo from that date until February 22, 1906. Both Dr. Hogan and Miss Huntington, a nurse, were of the opinion that she was of unsound mind during the whole of this period. The testimony as to the making of the will was very meager; the lawyer who prepared it, Mr. Harvey, who was one of the subscribing witnesses, the other subscribing witness and Mr. Burnham, who was present, all having died before the trial. The only other person present was Mr. Steffan, who was appointed one of the executors. He was present in the lawyer's office the day before, and testified that deceased said, when Mr. Harvey asked her how she wanted the will drawn, that she would like to have a part of the money go to the church, and if there was any left, a part of it to Mr. Clark, and some "to the boy in San Jose," and that, when asked about "Annie" (Mrs. Murray), she said, "I don't feel like it, she got enough. She got all the cash money on the ranch and everything about eaten up, and she is going to have enough. I am willing to give her $25." As a matter of fact, Mrs. Murray had received nothing to speak of from the ranch. The will as finally drawn and signed made no provision for anybody in San Jose. In addition to this, there was evidence tending to show an antagonism to and distrust of the daughter entirely unnatural and unwarranted by anything the daughter had done, and accountable for only on the theory of impaired mental power. There is in all this enough, in our opinion, to legally sustain the conclusion of the jury and the trial judge that the deceased did not measure up to the standard in the matter of capacity to make a last will. It is true that there was considerable evidence tending to rationally explain the attitude of the mother toward her daughter in a manner entirely consistent with absolute soundness of mind, and tending to show that deceased was fully competent on December 1, 1905, to make a will, but to our minds all this does no more than create a conflict of evidence, upon which the decision of the jury and the judge of the trial court is conclusive.

[3, 4] 2. It is claimed that the trial court erred in allowing Dr. Hogan to give his opinion as to the sanity of deceased while she was in his hospital at Vallejo from December 29, 1905, to February 22, 1906; it being urged that such testimony was incompetent in view of subdivision 4 of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that "a licensed physician or surgeon cannot, without the consent of his patient, be examined in a civil action as to any information acquired in attending the patient, which was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient."

We are satisfied that it must be held that this objection is not available to appellants. When the witness was called, he first testified as to his qualifications and experience as a physician and surgeon, and that he knew deceased during the month of December, 1905. He was then asked under what conditions he knew her, and appellants objected to the question on the ground stated above. This objection was not good, for the question did not call for any testimony prohibited by subdivision 4 of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure. However, the question was not pressed. A new question was framed, and the witness was then allowed to testify, without objection, that he saw deceased daily and many times a day between December 29, 1905, and February 22, 1906. He was then asked: "From your observations of her, what, in your opinion, was her mental condition, was it sound or unsound during that period?" Up to this point it had not been made to appear that deceased was a patient of Dr. Hogan. Objection was interposed to this question solely on these grounds, viz.: "It is double joined, two questions in one. First, the doctor, if he testifies to mental unsoundness, must testify, if he know, that he knows her mental condition. In the second place * * * the doctor is not qualified. It does not appear from the testimony of the witness that he is qualified to pass upon the question of mental soundness; that he is not qualified to that extent. Furthermore, that it does not appear that he had, at that time, a sufficient opportunity of observation to determine whether or not the patient was of sound or unsound mind." Appellants asked no opportunity to examine the doctor further as to his qualifications as an expert, and, as will be seen from what we have said, did not object to the testimony on the ground that the same was incompetent under subdivision 4 of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The objection made was not good. There had been a sufficient prima facie showing of the qualifications of the doctor as an expert. See Wheelock v. Godfrey, 100 Cal. 578, 589, 35 Pac. 317; Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 227, 248, 86 Pac. 695, 9 Ann. Cas. 795. Unquestionably there had been a sufficient prima facie showing of opportunity for observation. The objection was overruled. Even then the attorneys for contestant suggested to the attorneys for appellants that they were at liberty to ask the witness "any preliminary question to determine whether or not, as a physician, he may have got information that he used in declaring his opinion," but one of the attorneys for appellants said, "We are properly advised and satisfied with the situation." Dr. Hogan then answered the question, saying: "I took observations from her, and from my observations from December 29th to February 22d I thought she was of unsound mind." Appellants immediately moved "to strike out the answer on the same grounds as stated in the objection." The motion was denied. This was the only motion to strike out such answer that was made at any time. It was not until afterwards, and particularly during the cross-examination, that evidence was elicited showing that deceased was a patient of Dr. Hogan between the dates mentioned.

There is no ground for holding that the trial court erred in any of the rulings we have set forth. So far as the point urged in the briefs is concerned, the evidence was received without objection, and no motion was made to strike out such evidence after the facts were elicited upon which appellants base their claim that it was incompetent under subdivision 4 of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A judgment cannot be reversed because of the admission of evidence incompetent under such a statute, where objection is not made to its admission on that ground in the trial court. See Wheelock v. Godfrey, 100 Cal. 588, 35 Pac. 317. There was no such objection interposed to the evidence elicited, either at the time it was elicited or thereafter when all of the facts tending to show the relation of physician and patient had been shown. The case of Green v. Southern Pacific Co., 122 Cal. 565, 55 Pac. 577, is not in point. There the evidence complained of was expressly objected to, and an exception had been reserved to the ruling of the court. It was sought to overcome this by showing that similar testimony was subsequently received from other witnesses without objection, and it was simply held that, the party having once formally taken exception to a certain line or character of evidence, he was not required to keep on objecting, and that his silence would not debar him from having the exception that he had taken to that line of evidence reviewed. Here there was never any ruling on the point made by appellants, and of course no exception. When the objection on this ground was made, it was not good, but, as we have shown, the question was withdrawn and a new question framed.

[5, 6] 3. The objection to the questions asked the nurse, who was in constant attendance upon deceased while she was in the hospital, as to her condition of mind during that time was as follows: "We object to the witness as not qualified to testify to the soundness or unsoundness of mind of Nancy Huston at the time of the execution of the will, not having any knowledge of the testatrix at that time. The knowledge of the witness appears to have been only of the time when she was suffering from an acute disease up in the hospital. Therefore it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, not an intimate acquaintance, and not a sufficient observation for the formation or expression of an expert witness." This objection was properly overruled. The witness was not asked as to her opinion as to the condition of the mind of the deceased at the time of the execution of the will. The question was directed to a period of time a few weeks after the day the will was executed. It is of course well settled that, to show the condition of one's mind at a given time as respects sanity or insanity, evidence tending to show such condition both shortly before and shortly after the time is admissible. A sufficient showing was made in regard to this witness to warrant the trial court in holding that she was entitled to give her opinion as an intimate acquaintance of deceased. Her testimony, already given, contained a statement of certain reasons for her conclusion. During a large portion of the period when the witness was on such intimate terms with deceased, the latter had passed the acute stage of her sickness. The arguments of learned counsel for appellants in regard to this evidence go rather to the question of the weight to be accorded it than to the question of its admissibility.

[7] 4. The motion to strike out the testimony of Mr. Thoreson upon the ground that he was not an intimate acquaintance was properly denied. We do not see how it could be held otherwise than that he was an intimate acquaintance, in view of his testimony as to the extent and nature of his acquaintance with deceased. This witness testified very fully as to his reasons for his conclusion, and the weight to be given that conclusion, in view of the reasons given therefor by the witness, was properly a question for the jury. In no event would it have been proper to grant the motion to strike out, even if the opinion should not have been allowed, for the motion was expressly directed "to the entire testimony of the witness," and there is no pretense that any of such testimony was objectionable other than the conclusion of the witness as to the unsoundness of the mind of the deceased.

[8] 5. In the closing brief of appellants it is urged that the testimony of Robert H. Brown, as to the condition of mind of deceased, should have been stricken out. The record shows no motion to strike out such evidence. The only objection to his evidence was one made after he had testified substantially that in his opinion she was of unsound mind, and the objection was simply "that the witness has not shown sufficient personal acquaintance to qualify him to testify." He had testified that he had known deceased all his life, that he met her "off and on, maybe once a month, and maybe oftener," and that "he observed her appearance, her conduct and talk, and her language, and her conversation." This certainly was a sufficient prima facie showing to warrant a conclusion that the witness was an intimate acquaintance.

[9] We agree entirely with learned counsel for appellants in their claim that the mere observer, who is not an expert or an intimate acquaintance, may not give his opinion as to the mental sanity of a person, except where he is a subscribing witness to a writing, the validity of which is in dispute, where he may give his opinion respecting the mental sanity of the signer. Subdivision 10, § 1870, Code Civ. Proc. The giving of such an opinion is a very different thing from testimony as to the appearance of a person at a given time, which testimony may be given by any observer. See People v. Manoogian, 141 Cal. 592, 75 Pac. 177. One or two remarks of the trial court made in ruling on the admission of evidence of alleged intimate acquaintances tend to indicate that there was a misapprehension in the mind of the learned judge of the trial court as to this, but there was nothing in the language used to indicate that the court was not satisfied that each of these witnesses was an intimate acquaintance, and we cannot hold as to any of the instances that the admission of the evidence was erroneous.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

HENSHAW, J. The undisputed facts shown by the petitioner are that on the 24th day of April, 1911, he was adjudged guilty and sentenced by the police court of the city of Oakland to six months in the city prison of the city of Oakland; that the execution of his sentence was stayed by order of the court withholding the issuance of the commitment. Petitioner was allowed his liberty. He enjoyed his liberty until the 13th day of December, 1911, when he was again arrested and charged with drunkenness, and a commitment was issued upon the judgment pronounced upon April 24, 1911, by virtue of which commitment petitioner has been and is restrained of his liberty in the city prison of the city of Oakland. Upon these facts he contends that his imprisonment is in violation of section 1203 of the Penal Code of the state of California as amended in 1911.

It is conceded that section 1203 of the Penal Code in its present form, as amended in 1911, was in full force at the time judgment was pronounced against petitioner and the commitment upon such judgment withheld. The withholding of the commitment is the equivalent of suspending the execution of the sentence. We need not be at pains here to discuss the question of the inherent power of a court in a criminal case so to withhold the pronouncement of judgment or to suspend judgment when pronounced. This has been satisfactorily done in Re Collins, 8 Cal. App. 367, 97 Pac. 188. By section 1203 of the Penal Code (the probation act) the Legislature has prescribed the form and method by which these powers may be exercised.

[1] It will be held that courts, in exercising their powers so to withhold sentence or to suspend execution of sentence, do so in conformity with these legislative provisions, and it will not be held that, by reason of any informality or irregularity of the order so doing, a defendant should be made to suffer. He has no control over the form of the order which the court issues, and if, during the probationary period, he has himself lived up to the requirements of the law, it would be manifestly unjust that he should be made to suffer because of the court's error in any given particular.

[2] In the case at bar it appears that the order of the court suspending the execution of the sentence was made while the probation law in its present form was in force. So, treating the court's order as one permitted by and within the purview of section 1203, petitioner shows that his rearrest and the effort to enforce this early judgment against him were made after "the maximum possible term of his sentence" had expired. But by the provisions of the probation law, when a defendant has fulfilled the conditions of his probation for the entire period thereof, which cannot exceed the maximum possible term of such sentence, the power of the court to enforce its original judgment is at an end. Pen. Code, § 1203, subd. 5.

It follows, therefore, that the petitioner is entitled to his discharge, and it is so ordered accordingly.

HOMESTEAD (§ 72*)—DECLARATION—EFFECT.

Halsey W. Allen, for appellant. Leonard & Surr, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Defendants Edward and Louella Walden were husband and wife, and on May 15, 1907, were the owners as joint tenants of lots 3, 4, and 5, block L, Lugonia Park, city of Redlands, together with all water appurtenant to said property, and together with 4 shares of the capital stock of the Lugonia Park Water Company, and also 2½ shares of the capital stock of the East-berne Water Company. On August 17, 1907, the defendant Edward Walden executed and delivered to plaintiff a grant deed purporting to convey to plaintiff all his interest in the property above described. Thereafter, plaintiff, alleging himself, by virtue of this deed, to be the owner of an undivided one-half interest in and to all of the said property, brought this suit to have the same partitioned. In her answer defendant Louella Walden denied the execution of the deed to plaintiff, and as an affirmative defense alleged that prior to the execution of the deed to plaintiff, to wit, on May 15, 1907, she executed and caused to be recorded a declaration of homestead upon "lots No. 3 and 4 of block L, according to plat of Lugonia Park, * * * together with the water right appurtenant thereto, consisting of 4 shares of the capital stock of the Lugonia Park Water Company, a corporation." At the trial, and in response to this issue so tendered, the court found that, as alleged, defendant Louella Walden did execute and record her "declaration of homestead upon lots 3 and 4 of block L of the property mentioned and described in the complaint, together with the water right, consisting of 4 shares of the capital stock of the Lugonia Park Water Company," but further found she was not at the time in the exclusive occupation or possession of said property upon which she attempted to impress such homestead, and therefore the declaration of homestead was without force or effect. As a conclusion of law the court held that plaintiff and Louella Walden were each the owner of an undivided one-half interest in all the property described in the deed from Edward Walden to plaintiff.

An interlocutory decree followed, from which defendant Louella Walden appealed. Swan v. Walden, 156 Cal. 195, 103 Pac. 931, 134 Am. St. Rep. 118, 20 Ann. Cas. 194. As shown by that appeal, appellant contended, first, that the estate held by herself and her husband in the property in controversy was a tenancy by the entirety, hence the husband was without power to convey any interest therein, and the deed to plaintiff was therefore null and void as a conveyance of any property; second, that at all events the deed was ineffectual as a conveyance of the property upon which the homestead had been impressed. The Supreme Court reversed the interlocutory decree from which said appeal was prosecuted, and in effect held that the conveyance made by Edward Walden to plaintiff was a sufficient conveyance of all the property described, except that which was made the subject of the declaration of homestead so executed by Louella Walden, and in the remittitur directed the trial court to enter judgment in conformity with its opinion. Following this decision, the trial court made and entered a new interlocutory decree, whereby it was adjudged and decreed that plaintiff and defendant Louella Walden were equal owners as tenants in common of lot 5 in said block L, "together with all water appurtenant to said property, and together with 4 shares of the capital stock of the Lugonia Park Water Company, and also 2% shares of the capital stock of the Eastberne Water Company," and, in order to partition the same, directed a sale of said lot 5 in block L and the water appurtenant thereto, together with the 4 shares of the capital stock of the Lugonia Park Water Company, described in appellant's declaration of homestead as being appurtenant thereto. From this last decree Louella Walden has appealed upon the judgment roll; her contention now being that the 4 shares of the capital stock of the Lugonia Park Water Company constitute a water right appurtenant to said lots 3 and 4 as described and asserted in her declaration of homestead, and as to which the deed from her husband to plaintiff is inoperative as a transfer thereof.

The execution and recording of the declaration of homestead as alleged in the answer is deemed to be denied by plaintiff. Hence, not only the validity of the act, but every statement of claim therein made as to the property upon which the homestead was impressed, was put in issue. The declaration described the lots, "together with the water right appurtenant thereto, consisting of 4 shares of the capital stock of the Lugonia Park Water Company, a corporation." "A thing is deemed to be * * * appurtenant to land when it is by right used with the land for its benefit. * * *" Section 662, Civ. Code. The effect of the finding of the court that appellant had declared a homestead upon the lots, "together with the water right, consisting of 4 shares of the capital stock of the Lugonia Park Water Company, a corporation," is to sustain the alleged claim made by her that the right to the use of the water represented by such stock was appurtenant to said lots. Whether made so by describing the land in the certificates of stock and complying with the provisions of section 324, Civil Code, or otherwise, is immaterial. Since we construe the finding as supporting the statement that the water and the use thereof represented by this stock was appurtenant to the land, it must follow that the deed from Edward Walden to plaintiff was not only inoperative as to the lots described in the declaration of homestead, but likewise inoperative and ineffectual as a conveyance of the shares of stock, or water represented thereby.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the trial court directed to enter a new interlocutory decree, whereby, not only lots 3 and 4 in said block L, but the 4 shares of the capital stock of the Lugonia Park Water Company and the water represented thereby and appurtenant thereto, be adjudged to be impressed with a valid homestead executed by said Louella Walden, and that as to said property the deed made by Edward Walden to plaintiff is inoperative and void.

Action by Ellen R. Upton against the Woman's Club of Kern. From a judgment for defendant on demurrer, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Emmons & Hudson, for appellant. C. L. Clafin, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The complaint alleges that defendant was at all times mentioned therein a corporation existing under the laws of this state; that plaintiff was at all said times a member therein; that between August 19, 1910, and October 21, 1910, defendant in constructing a clubhouse upon certain lots owned by it incurred an indebtedness to the extent of $753.20; that plaintiff, "in order to relieve herself of liability for the debts of said corporation, and to save herself from damage, and for the use and benefit of said corporation, and to arrest threatened attachment suits against it by its said creditors, and to forestall the filing of liens on said club building by said creditors," paid said amount. To this complaint the court sustained a general demurrer. Plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was entered for defendant, from which plaintiff appeals upon the judgment roll.

Assuming that defendant was a corporation having no capital stock (which fact, though not clearly appearing, is conceded by counsel), plaintiff's liability as a member thereof is fixed by section 322 of the Civil Code. Under this provision, the liability for the debts of such corporation is equally distributed between all the members thereof, and plaintiff, in the absence of any contractual obligation disclosed, by the complaint, was liable for her share only of such debt. Since the statutory obligation to pay the debt of the corporation was thus limited to her share thereof, upon payment of which she would secure a release of liability, it must follow that, in the absence of any act of defendant authorizing the same, the payment of any sum in excess of her share was a purely voluntary contribution on her part and imposed upon defendant corporation no legal obligation to reimburse her for the amount so contributed. Huddleston v. Washington, 136 Cal. 519, 69 Pac. 146; Curtis v. Parks, 55 Cal. 106; McGlew v. McDade, 146 Cal. 553, 80 Pac. 695.

It follows there was no error of the court in sustaining the demurrer, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Action by C. E. Archer against Mary Agnes Lewis and others. From a judgment of nonsuit and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Tobias R. Archer, for appellant. Lynn Helm, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Action to compel specific performance of a written contract assigned to plaintiff whereby it is claimed respondent agreed to sell and convey the real estate therein described.

At the close of plaintiff's evidence, the court granted a motion made by defendant Lewis for a nonsuit and gave judgment against plaintiff, from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals.

The basis of the action is a contract dated January 19, 1909, the material parts of which follow: "For and in consideration of the sum of one dollar, I hereby authorize A. H. Gregg to enter into and execute for me and in my name a contract to sell the following property: [Description], for the sum of $3,500, upon the following terms: Cash * * *, and should said A. H. Gregg make or cause to be made such sale I will pay no commission on said sale. I will release to them any amount in excess of the price named and will deed to them, or any one named by them, said described property on complying with above stated terms. This authorization is to remain in full force and effect for ninety days from date. [Signed] Mary Agnes Lewis. A. H. Gregg." On April 8, 1909, Gregg made an indorsement upon said contract as follows: "For value received, I hereby sell and assign all my right, title and interest in and to the within contract to C. E. Archer. A. H. Gregg." And then and there delivered the same to plaintiff. It appears from the testimony adduced at the trial that prior to the assignment of the contract so made by Gregg plaintiff proposed to purchase the property from respondent, and was told by her that she could not sell it to him for the reason that she had given "an option or contract on the land" to Gregg, which was to run 90 days from January 19, 1909, and that, if he would acquire such option, she would sell him the land. Plaintiff went to Gregg and procured an assignment of the contract, agreeing to pay him therefor $500, $100 of which was paid in cash. He then notified respondent that he had, by assignment, acquired the contract from Gregg and desired to complete the purchase, made a tender to her of $3,500, the purchase price therein named, and demanded a deed therefor in accordance with the terms of the contract, which she refused to make.

Appellant contends that the contract made between respondent and defendant Gregg should be interpreted as an agreement on the part of respondent, not only authorizing Gregg to contract in her name for a sale of the land, but binding herself to sell and convey the property to Gregg himself, for the price and upon the terms specified therein. The question, therefore, is the interpretation to be placed upon the agreement. The contract must be considered as a whole so as to give effect to every part thereof. Section 1641, Civ. Code. So considered, some effect must be given to the provision whereby Lewis covenants that she will "deed to them, or any one named by them, said described property on complying with above stated terms." Gregg was the only person authorized to make the sale; hence, notwithstanding the use of the plural form of pronoun, the word "them" must have been intended to refer to Gregg to whom, or to any one named by him, she agreed to convey the property at any time within 90 days from January 19, 1909, upon the payment of the sum of $3,500. Moreover, it conclusively appears from the evidence that both Gregg and respondent herself construed the agreement as constituting an option to purchase the property given Gregg for an expressed consideration. Plaintiff testifies that she told him "she had given an option or contract on that land to A. H. Gregg," for which reason she could not sell the land unless plaintiff "procured that option"; and, further, "she told me that if I acquired that option that she would sell me the land." Gregg, by making the assignment, as well as by orally naming plaintiff as a purchaser ready and willing to consummate the deal, brought plaintiff directly within the provision whereby Lewis agreed to deed the property to "any one named by them"; that is, by Gregg. Even if the contract should be deemed ambiguous or uncertain, it should, under the provisions of section 1654, Civil Code, be interpreted most strongly against defendant Lewis. Applying this rule of interpretation, in connection with the fact that the contract was made for a valuable consideration expressed therein, and the sale, if made, was to be free of any charge for commissions, together with the declarations of Mrs. Lewis to the effect that by the terms of the instrument she had given to Gregg a ninety-day option or contract upon the land, leaves no doubt in our minds as to the intent of the parties in executing the instrument. Indeed, considering the contract as a whole, it sufficiently and clearly appears therefrom that Mrs. Lewis desired to sell the property within 90 days for $3,500, net cash; and with this end in view gave to Gregg the contract whereby she authorized him to execute in her name a contract for such sale, and, in addition thereto, agreed not only to deed the property pursuant to the terms of any contract which he might make for her, but also agreed, upon the performance of the conditions of the contract, to deed the same to him, or to any person whom he might designate as such purchaser. He not only assigned this option, but designated and named plaintiff as a purchaser ready, willing, and able to make the purchase, and who within 90 days tendered the amount and demanded a deed in consummation of the contract.

In our judgment the learned trial judge erred in granting the motion for nonsuit, and the judgment is therefore reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

Action by P. J. Layne, as public administrator, and administrator of J. H. A. Bartels, deceased, and others against Thomas J. Johnson and others. From a judgment for defendants and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

J. C. Hizar, for appellants. E. S. Torrance, for respondents.

ALLEN, P. J. This is an action to quiet title brought by the administrator of the estate of J. H. A. Bartels, deceased, and his heirs at law, against Thomas J. Johnson, city of San Diego, a municipal corporation, and A. G. Robinson. The complaint is in the usual form, and alleges the appointment of Layne as administrator of the estate of Bartels on the 10th of November, 1905, by the superior court of San Diego county. The answer does not deny the allegation in reference to the appointment and qualification of Layne as administrator, but does deny that the other plaintiffs are the heirs at law of said Bartels, deceased. Defendant Johnson at the same time filed a cross-complaint, alleging that at the time of the commencement of the action, and for many years prior thereto, he was the owner in fee of the premises described in the complaint, and for many years had been in the rightful, lawful, and peaceable possession thereof, and continued to hold the same until a few days prior to the commencement of the action, when plaintiffs unlawfully and wrongfully entered said premises and ousted said defendant. He prayed a decree that plaintiffs and cross-defendants have no title, interest, or estate in the said premises. Upon the trial of the action, the court found that at the commencement of the action, and for many years prior thereto, Johnson was and now is the owner in fee of the real property described; that for many years prior to the commencement of the action he was in the rightful, lawful, and peaceable possession of said premises; that a few days prior to the commencement of the action plaintiffs and cross-defendants unlawfully and wrongfully entered into the possession of said premises, and ousted defendant and cross-complainant therefrom; that at the time of the death of J. H. A. Bartels he was not the owner in fee nor in possession of the real property described, nor did he have any interest or estate therein; that plaintiffs other than Layne and cross-defendants were the heirs at law of Bartels; that neither they nor Layne, at the time of the commencement of the action, were the owners in fee of the said premises, nor did they have any interest therein. A decree was rendered accordingly in favor of defendant Johnson and against plaintiffs and cross-defendants. This judgment and decree was entered December 5, 1910. Notice of motion for a new trial was duly given, which motion was by the court denied, and an appeal from the judgment and from the order denying the motion for a new trial was taken by plaintiffs and appellants on February 2, 1911.

[1] It is claimed by appellants that the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision. The sufficiency of such evidence cannot be reviewed under the record before us, the appeal from the judgment having been taken more than 60 days after the rendition of the judgment. Section 939, Code Civ. Proc.

[2] The appeal from the order denying a new trial is based upon a bill of exceptions purporting to contain the evidence. There is nothing in the record specifying the particulars in which the evidence is insufficient; hence, under section 648 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the evidence cannot be reviewed on appeal from the order.

[3] The only question presented which is subject of review relates to the action of the court in excluding certain evidence. Plaintiffs upon the trial offered in evidence certain deeds tending to show the title in Bartels in 1873. Defendant and cross-complainant offered in evidence the judgment roll and files in a certain action to quiet title instituted by Amanda Johnson, his grantor, plaintiff, against Bartels and others, defendants, in 1893, from which it is made to appear that service was had upon Bartels by publication under an order therefor duly made by the superior court of San Diego county; that on the 27th day of December, 1893, the cause came on for hearing, and it was adjudged by the court that the action was one in which service of summons could be legally made by publication; that due and sufficient service of summons had been made upon defendants and each of them by publication; that defendants had failed to answer or plead to the complaint of plaintiff; that the default of defendants was accordingly entered, and, after the introduction of testimony, the court decreed the said Amanda Johnson to be the owner of the premises, and that defendants, including Bartels, had no right, title, or interest therein or thereto. Plaintiffs thereupon offered in evidence the order of the probate court of San Diego county appointing Layne administrator of the estate of Bartels, from which order it appears, and is found by the court, that Bartels died on the 1st day of December, 1882. The defendant and cross-complainant objected to the introduction of such order upon the ground of its incompetency, irrelevancy, and immateriality, and for the reason that it was an attempt to collaterally impeach the judgment of a court of general jurisdiction of this state, which objection was sustained by the court, and this action of the court in excluding from evidence such order of appointment is claimed by appellants to have been erroneous. We see no error of the court in its ruling.

[4] The facts essential to the granting of administration of Bartels' estate were his death at the time the petition for letters was filed, his intestacy, and that he left an estate to be administered in San Diego county. These matters were admitted in virtue of the admission of appointment. The exact date of his death was not essential to the jurisdiction of the probate court, and not necessary for decision upon the application for the appointment.

[5] Johnson was not a party to the probate proceedings, and, giving to the order of appointment the broadest effect possible under the law, it could only be conclusive between parties and their privies in respect of the matters directly adjudged, and these matters could only be those things necessary and essential in conferring jurisdiction and establishing the authority of the court to make the order.

[6] Aside from this, however, the judgment roll and files in the suit to quiet title introduced by defendant does not show, or at least attention has not been called to any matter which it is claimed would show, a lack of jurisdiction in the court appearing upon the face of the judgment roll. This being true, the judgment imports absolute verity, and cannot be attacked in a collateral proceeding. "The jurisdiction sufficient to sustain a record is jurisdiction over the cause, over the parties, and over the thing, when a specific thing is the subject of the judgment." Section 1917, Code Civ. Proc. A domestic judgment must be void upon its face in order to be the subject of collateral attack. Galvin v. Palmer, 134 Cal. 428, 66 Pac. 572; Emery v. Kipp, 154 Cal. 83, 97 Pac. 17, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 983, 129 Am. St. Rep. 141; Ballerino v. Superior Court, 2 Cal. App. 760, 84 Pac. 225. Whatever may be the rights of parties in an action instituted in equity to set aside a judgment, it is clear that a domestic judgment, regular upon its face, is not the subject of collateral attack.

We see no error subject of review in the record, and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

We concur: JAMES, J.; SHAW, J.

1. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 231*)—RIGHT TO LIEN—LIEN ON LAND—DESTRUCTION OF BUILDING.

The assertion of a mechanic's lien against the land on which a building is located is an incident to and grows out of the right to have a lien on the building, so that where, before the filing of a claim of lien, the building was destroyed by fire, no lien could thereafter be asserted against the land.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by L. A. Kern against the San Francisco Company and A. B. McCreery. From a judgment for plaintiff, A. B. McCreery appeals. Reversed.

H. H. McPike, for appellant. F. J. Kierce and Walter Christie, for respondent.

HALL, J. Plaintiff, as assignee of Kern Bros., recovered judgment against appellant, subjecting the land of appellant to the lien of Kern Bros. as original contractors for the construction of a building for a lessee of appellant. The appeal is from this judgment, and was taken within 30 days after the rendition and entry thereof. The building was completed and accepted on the 11th day of April, 1906. Appellant, as a special defense, pleaded that on the 18th day of April, 1906, the said building was totally destroyed by fire and earthquake. The claim of lien was filed by plaintiff's assignors on the 4th day of June, 1906. The court found that the building was destroyed by fire on the 18th day of April, 1906, "except a portion of the front of the building which still remains." Appellant attacks the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding to the effect that a portion of the front of the building was not destroyed and still remains.

The court seems to have been of the opinion that, if the building was ever completed, the lien attached upon its completion to the land necessary for its convenient use and occupation as it stood when completed, notwithstanding that it may have been subsequently destroyed before the filing of a claim of lien, for the court found "that all of said land hereinbefore described was necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the building which was erected thereon, as hereinbefore found, and which was standing thereon at the time of the completion thereof," and accordingly gave judgment for a lien against the land so found necessary for the convenient use of the building as it stood when completed. This we think to be an incorrect interpretation of the law.

[1, 2] The lien which contractors and materialmen acquire against the land upon which a building is constructed is incident to and grows out of the lien upon the building thus constructed. If no lien is ever acquired upon the building, no lien is acquired upon the land. No lien is acquired by the mere completion of the building. The completion of the building must be followed by the filing of a claim of lien. Until this is done, no lien is acquired either upon the building or the land. If the building be destroyed before the filing of the claim of lien, no lien can be acquired upon such building, and in consequence no lien can be acquired against the land. This is the view of the law taken in Humboldt Lumber Mill

Co. v. Crisp, 146 Cal. 686, 81 Pac. 30, 106 Am. St. Rep. 75, 2 Ann. Cas. 811, where the court said: "We are of opinion that, under the peculiar language of our mechanics' lien law, the lien has nothing to which it can attach if filed after the destruction of the building." It is true that in the case just cited the building was destroyed before completion; but the reasoning of the court is not based upon that incident, and the cases cited in the decision with approval from the state of Pennsylvania, where the statute is similar to ours, fully support the rule that the lien is lost, or rather is never acquired, if the building be destroyed before the filing of the claim of lien. In Presbyterian Church v. Stettler, 26 Pa. 246, the building was completed but was destroyed before the filing of the lien; and it was held that no lien was acquired upon the land. The same was true in Wigton & Brook's Appeal, 28 Pa. 161. In Coddington et al. v. Dry Dock Co., 31 N. J. Law, 477, it was held as to a dock: "It must have stood on the land when first erected, and continued to stand thereon until the lien claim was filed." In Wood & Co. v. Wilmington Conference Academy, 1 Marvel (Del.) 416, 41 Atl. 89, it was held that the lien was lost by the destruction of the building after the bringing of the action. The reasoning of the Pennsylvania cases above referred to is not only approved in Humboldt Lumber Mill Co. v. Crisp, supra, but it is there said: "There are, however, stronger reasons to be found in our statutes why the lien should not apply to the land, the building being destroyed, than are to be found in the statutes of any other state." In the case at bar, if the building was destroyed before any claim of lien was filed, no lien was ever acquired upon the land. "The incident follows the principal, and not the principal the incident." Section 3540, Civ. Code. The judgment rendered by the court in the case at bar is based upon the theory that plaintiff is entitled to a lien upon such land as was necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the building as it stood when completed, although the building was before the filing of the claim of lien destroyed. As above indicated, this is an erroneous theory of the law, and the judgment is therefore erroneous.

[3] This brings us to the consideration of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain that portion of the finding to the effect that a portion of the front of the building was not destroyed; for, if a portion of the building remains, it may be that plaintiff would have a lien for some portion of his claim against such portion and such land as may be necessary for its convenient use. The only evidence in the record upon the subject is that the building "was totally destroyed through the earthquake and fire * * * on the 18th day of April, 1906," and that "they were practically all destroyed" on the 18th day of April, 1906, by fire and earthquake. There is not a word to support the finding that a portion of the front of the building was not destroyed.

[4] The judgment must be reversed for another reason. The complaint describes a parcel of land upon which it is alleged the building was constructed. The boundaries of this one parcel of land are set forth in 12 calls of the dimensions as follows: 39 feet, 57 feet, 189 feet, 43 feet, 16 feet, 43 feet, 240 feet, 150 feet, 300 feet, 71 feet, 184 feet, 22 feet, finally closing at the point of commencement. It does not appear from the complaint that the building occupied the entire parcel, nor does it appear what portion thereof was covered or occupied by the building. It is not alleged in the complaint what, or that any, portion of the land is necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the building. There is no allegation in the complaint upon the subject. The finding on this point is therefore not within the issues, and will therefore not support the judgment. In other words, the complaint does not state a cause of action against appellant. Green v. Chandler, 54 Cal. 626; Willamette S. M. Co. v. Kremer, 94 Cal. 205, 29 Pac. 633.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 821*)—DEFECT IN STREETS—INJURIES TO TRAVELERS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

While plaintiff was driving along a city street, one of the wheels of her wagon sank into an improperly filled pipe line excavation, and she was thrown out and injured. She testified that she was obliged to cross the soft portion of the roadway in order to turn down another street, and that the place where she turned "looked like a mud puddle"; that, while she could see mud, she could not see how deep it was; that it was soft mud; and that the right wheel got across all right, but the left sank down, etc. There was nothing to give notice that the soft condition of the street continued to the bottom of the excavated part, and plaintiff had no actual knowledge of the real state of the hole or trench at the time she attempted to drive across it. Held, that she was not negligent as a matter of law.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—EVIDENCE—PREJUDICE.

Where, in an action for injuries to a traveler by her wagon sinking into an improperly filled pipe trench in a street, there was no dispute as to the location of the pipe line, and there was ample evidence to show the location in the street of the excavation made by defendant, aside from that furnished by certain maps, the admission of the maps over objection was not prejudicial.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 816*)—STREETS—DEFECTS—FILLING EXCAVATIONS—CITY ORDINANCE.

Where a complaint charged that plaintiff was injured by defendant's failure to properly refill a pipe line excavation in a street, the fact that plaintiff did not allege a city ordinance prescribing the method to be followed in replacing earth in such excavations did not prevent the admission of such ordinance to establish defendant's negligence in failing to comply with it, so as to leave the street reasonably safe.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon F. Moss, Judge.

Action by Anna Scharpf against the Union Oil Company of California. From judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, it appeals. Affirmed.

Lewis W. Andrews, Thomas O. Toland, Cedric E. Johnson, and T. F. Welch, for appellant. Gray, Barker, Bowen, Allen, Van Dyke & Jutten, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries suffered by her as the alleged result of the negligent acts of defendant. Judgment in her favor for $2,500 was entered upon the verdict of a jury. An appeal has been taken from the judgment, and also from an order denying a motion made by defendant for a new trial.

Plaintiff on the day when she suffered her alleged injuries was riding in a vehicle termed in the evidence a light delivery wagon, to which was attached one horse. She was proceeding down Boyle avenue in the city of Los Angeles, and where that avenue intersects at right angles with Seventh street she turned about the corner preparatory to traveling toward the center of the city on said Seventh street. As she made this turn the left wheel of her vehicle sank into a hole, which caused her to pitch forward violently, and fall from the vehicle. She was a large woman, and struck the ground heavily upon her shoulder, and received a severe shock and other injuries. As she fell to the ground the horse became frightened and started forward, pulling the wheels of the vehicle across her feet. Prior to the day upon which the accident to plaintiff occurred a four-inch pipe line belonging to defendant had been taken up from along Boyle avenue and across the intersection of that avenue with Seventh street, and the earth had been replaced in the excavation made in the course of that operation. The alleged negligence charged by plaintiff against the defendant consisted in defendant not having refilled said excavation properly and having left it in such a condition at the corner of Seventh street and Boyle avenue as to permit of the wheels of vehicles dropping down to a considerable depth in the earth which had become wet and soft. It was admitted by defendant that it was the owner of the pipe line which had been taken up as described, that it had caused an excavation to be made for the purpose of removing the pipe, but it alleged that the earth had been properly refilled and tamped so as to leave the roadway in a good and passable condition. There was some difference between the testimony of certain of the witnesses as to whether the hole into which the wheels of plaintiff's vehicle sank was in the line of the refilled pipe ditch, or at some other point in the street, but by this difference a question of fact was presented to be solved by the jury and this court cannot review that matter. Appellant has suggested, among other contentions which it makes upon this appeal, that the uncontradicted evidence showed such negligence on the part of the plaintiff contributing to produce her injuries as to bar recovery therefor.

[1] We do not think that as a matter of law it can be said that plaintiff was guilty of any contributory negligence. She described the condition of the street as it appeared to her at the time, and also testified that the pipe ditch was filled with mud and water. She said that she was obliged to cross this soft portion of the roadway in order to turn down Seventh street, but that the point where she turned "looked like a mud puddle." She then said: "I could see that mud. I couldn't see how deep it was. It was soft mud in it. My right wheel got across all right, but the left wheel stuck in. It must be a weak spot that didn't have enough dirt in it." There was nothing presented to plaintiff's view, so far as the testimony in the record shows, by which she should as a reasonable person have apprehended the dangerous condition of the pipe ditch. No warning had been erected to give her notice that the soft condition of the surface continued to the bottom of the excavated part of the street, and it was shown that she had no actual knowledge of the real state of the hole or trench at the time she attempted to drive across it.

[2] Certain maps prepared by the defendant and filed in the city engineer's office pursuant to the regulations of the city of Los Angeles, showing the location of the pipe lines of defendant, particularly that laid along Boyle avenue, were offered in evidence and admitted under objection. It was alleged that, as these maps were filed more than a year prior to the date of the accident, they were not competent evidence to establish the location of the pipe line which had been removed from Boyle avenue. Whatever force there may have been to the objection seems to be rendered immaterial when the fact is considered that by the whole testimony it does not appear that any dispute was made at all as to the location of that pipe line, and there was ample evidence tending to establish the location in the street of the excavation made by defendant, aside from any furnished by the maps.

[3] An ordinance of the city of Los Angeles, which prescribed the method to be followed in replacing earth in excavations made upon the public streets, was also admitted over the objection of defendant. It is claimed that there was no warrant for the admission of this evidence, because nowhere in the complaint was it charged that defendant had failed to observe the requirements of such ordinance. It was not necessary that plaintiff should have set forth the existence of the ordinance and the noncompliance of defendant with it. The ultimate fact was sufficiently charged in the complaint that defendant had refilled this excavation in a negligent manner and so left it, whereby plaintiff was caused to be injured. The introduction of the ordinance merely furnished evidence tending to establish the negligent acts of defendant in that regard. In other words, the plaintiff did not rely upon the breach of duty imposed by the ordinance as furnishing her ground for recovery, but relied upon the charge made in her complaint that she suffered her injuries through the negligence of defendant, and the fact that defendant had failed to comply with an ordinance of the city prescribing the method to be observed in refilling excavations so as to leave them reasonably safe was evidence tending to establish the main fact only.

We have carefully examined the other exceptions taken by defendant to rulings of the court made during the course of the trial, of which there are a number, but do not consider that they possess enough merit to warrant extended discussion.

[4] The point was made that plaintiff should not have been permitted to describe in detail her sufferings entailed as a result of the accident. In order that the jury might properly consider the extent of plaintiff's injuries and the damages to be awarded to her, they were entitled to know the amount of pain and suffering which she had undergone, and her testimony on that point was all within the limits of proper proof. The evidence did not show that her sufferings or her injuries had been increased or made greater by improper treatment. As to several exceptions taken to the refusal of the court to permit witnesses to testify in answer to certain questions asked by defendant, without here reciting the questions and objections, it is sufficient to say that in all of the instances where the admission of the precise testimony called for and ruled out might be considered properly as a debatable subject, the record of the testimony given shows, in other portions of it, that the matters so sought to be brought out were fully covered in substantial effect. We believe that the instructions to the jury stated fully and fairly the law as applicable to the case.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by J. P. Bernardo and another against Frederick Anton Soderman. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Clinton G. Dodge, for appellants. Austin Lewis (R. M. Royce, of counsel), for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment in an action wherein the plaintiffs sought to recover the sum of $835.50, claimed and admitted to have been paid to the defendant by the plaintiffs as the purchasers of certain real property pursuant to the terms of an installment contract. The case was tried by the lower court and submitted for decision upon an agreed statement of facts, which, by stipulation of the parties, constitute the trial court's findings of fact.

It was also stipulated in the court below by the parties to the action that judgment might be rendered, in accordance with the law, upon the agreed statement and findings of fact as if a trial upon the issues purporting to have been raised by the pleadings had been had in the usual and ordinary way. Whereupon judgment was rendered and entered that plaintiffs take nothing by their action, and that defendant have and recover his costs from the plaintiffs. By the terms of the contract in controversy, it was mutually agreed that the defendant would sell to the plaintiffs, and that plaintiffs would purchase from the defendant, certain real property situated in the county of Alameda for the sum of $2,400. The contract recited that time was of the essence of the contract, and that, upon the failure of the plaintiffs to comply with its terms, the defendant would be released from all obligation to convey, and be entitled to a forfeiture of all sums of money paid under the contract. At the time of the execution of the contract $700 was paid on account of the purchase price. The balance of $1,700 was agreed to be paid in monthly installments of at least $20 per month on or before the 14th day of each and every month, commencing with October 14, 1907, and continuing until the full amount of the purchase price and interest was paid. Plaintiffs' cause of action was based primarily upon the allegations that, pursuant to the terms of the contract, they had paid the defendant in the aggregate the sum of $835; that on the 11th day of June, 1908, the contract was fully rescinded by mutual consent; that, notwithstanding such rescission, the defendant had failed and refused to return the several sums of money theretofore paid to him on account of the contract. The gist of the defendant's answer consists of a denial that the contract was rescinded by mutual consent or otherwise, on the 11th day of June, 1908, followed by an averment that on the 20th day of May, 1908, the defendant elected to, and did, rescind the contract because of the plaintiffs' default in the payment of the installments then due, and that written notice of such rescission was forthwith served upon the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs interposed a demurrer to the defendant's answer, upon the ground that the facts stated therein did not constitute a defense, and prayed that they be given judgment upon the pleadings. The demurrer was overruled; and the plaintiffs now insist, as they did in the lower court, that, as a matter of law, they were entitled to judgment, not only upon the facts pleaded, but also upon the agreed statement of facts upon which the case was submitted and decided.

[1] We confess our inability to comprehend the theory of the defendant's pleaded defense to the action. It has been repeatedly held in this state that where the vendor, in a contract for the sale of land, elects to rescind, and, with the consent of the vendee, does actually rescind because of the vendee's default in the prescribed payments, and the vendor does not seek to recoup any actual damage for the breach from the amount of the purchase money previously paid, the vendee may recover from the vendor all of the money paid under the contract. In short, it is the law that, upon the vendee's breach followed by a mutual agreement of abandonment and rescission, the vendee is entitled to a repayment of his money. Drew v. Pedlar, 87 Cal. 443, 25 Pac. 749, 22 Am. St. Rep. 257; Shively v. Semi-Tropic L. and W. Co., 99 Cal. 259, 33 Pac. 848; Merrill v. Merrill, 103 Cal. 287, 35 Pac. 768, 37 Pac. 392; Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17; Heilig v. Parlin, 134 Cal. 99, 66 Pac. 186. If the contract in the case at bar was in fact rescinded by the mutual agreement of the parties, as the pleadings in the case seem to indicate, the plaintiffs, under the authorities cited, were entitled to judgment upon the pleadings, and the exact date of the rescission was of little or no importance in determining the relative resulting rights of the parties. However that may be, the facts set out in the agreed statement upon which the judgment is founded are but an amplification of the facts set out in the pleadings, and completely and conclusively show that the contract was fully rescinded by mutual consent of the parties, and that after written notice of such rescission by the defendant, and written acceptance thereof by the plaintiffs, the defendant assumed control and possession of the property which formed the subject-matter of the contract.

[2] The remedies which a vendor, in a contract for the sale of land, may resort to in the event of the vendee's breach of the covenant to pay, are specified and clearly defined in the case of Glock v. Howard, etc., Co., supra, where it is said that the vendor in such a case "may (1) stand upon the terms of his contract and sue for its breach under section 3307 of the Civil Code; (2) still resting upon the contract, he may remain inactive, yet retain to his own use the moneys paid by the vendee; (3) going into equity, still upon his contract, he may seek specific performance; or finally, if his generosity prompts him so to do, he may agree with his vendee for a mutual abandonment and rescission, in which last case, and in which last case alone, the vendee in default would be entitled to a repayment of his money."

Upon the admitted facts of this case the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment as prayed for. No other judgment being possible under the law and the facts, it is ordered that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in the sum sued for.

LA DUE v. FORBES, Justice of the Peace.
(Civ. 1,129.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District,
California. May 20, 1912.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 44*)—JURISDICTION—AMOUNT INVOLVED.

Where the parties to two actions in justice court between the same parties stipulated that they might be consolidated and tried together, and the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff in each case for less than $300, the fact that in their verdict they also specified the aggregate of the two sums, which was more than $300, did not render the justice's judgment thereon void as being in excess of his jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 157-172; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 194*)—REVIEW OF JUDGMENT BY CERTIORARI—ADEQUATE REMEDY BY APPEAL.

A judgment of a justice of the peace is not reviewable by certiorari merely because in excess of his jurisdiction; the aggrieved party having a plain and adequate remedy by appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Certiorari by Stanley S. La Due against Frank S. Forbes, Justice of the Peace for Los Angeles Township, Los Angeles County. From an order dismissing the writ, the petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Hugh J. Crawford, for appellant. F. E. Davis, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff, as petitioner, filed in the superior court his application for a writ of certiorari, the purpose of which was to have reviewed certain proceedings had and taken in the justice's court of Los Angeles township in two certain cases wherein Will H. Grosseup was plaintiff and Stanley S. La Due, the petitioner, was defendant.

[1] In one of said cases, numbered upon the justice's docket at 14,003, the amount of the demand was $212.50; in the other, the number of which upon the justice's docket was 14,004, the amount of the demand was $175. At the trial it was in open court stipulated by the parties "that the two actions might be consolidated for the purpose of trial and be tried together and that the evidence and arguments of the one case might be considered as the evidence and arguments in the other case, and that the cases might be submitted to the jury for decision at one and the same time upon the same evidence and same arguments; that this stipulation was adhered to by both parties and their respective attorneys throughout the entire trial, and the said two cases were both submitted to the said jury for determination at the same time." The jury called to try the cases brought in a verdict as follows:

[Title of Court and Cause.] Case No. 14,003.
Case No. 14,004.

We, the Jury in the above entitled case, find for the plaintiff in the sum of $37.50 dollars.

14004—175.00, Other case.

Foreman,

E. H. McAninch.

Upon this verdict the justice entered upon his docket a judgment in case No. 14,003 for $212.50 and costs, and in case No. 14,004 gave judgment for the sum of $175 and costs. At the hearing upon the application for the writ the same was dismissed, and petitioner appeals from the order dismissing the same.

Appellant contends that the verdict of the jury was in excess of the jurisdiction of the justice's court, and therefor null and void and ineffectual as a basis for the judgments rendered. The verdict appears to have been rendered pursuant to the stipulation, and we are unable to perceive any uncertainty therein. It clearly appears therefrom that in the one case the jury by its verdict found the sum of $212.50 to be due, and that in the other it found the sum of $175 to be due. The fact that it also specified the aggregate of these two sums is no ground for the contention that the verdict is uncertain, or that it purported to specify an amount in excess of that over which the court had jurisdiction. The verdict does not purport to be for $387.50 in either case, but particularly specifies the sum due in each case, the total of which amounts to $387.50.

[2] However this may be, and even though it be conceded that the acts of the court were in excess of its jurisdiction, nevertheless petitioner had an adequate remedy on appeal to the superior court. Want of jurisdiction alone will not justify the issuance of the writ of review, but it must further appear that there is no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. Section 1068, Code Civ. Proc.; Bennett v. Wallace, 43 Cal. 25; Valentine v. Police Court, 141 Cal. 617, 75 Pac. 336.

The order from which petitioner appeals is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

Petition by L. C. Carlin to have his interest in community property determined. From a judgment determining the petitioner's interest, contestant appeals. Affirmed.

H. A. Massey and Fred Fette, for appellant. Julius Lyons, for respondent.

SHAW, J. On February 24, 1912, an opinion was filed herein reversing the judgment and order of the trial court. Thereafter an order was made granting a rehearing.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The proceeding was had and taken pursuant to the provisions of section 1723 of the Code of Civil Procedure to determine the interest of L. C. Carlin as surviving husband of Aurora Carlin, deceased, in whom the legal title was vested, in a certain tract of land alleged by him to have been the community property of himself and his deceased wife. The claim was contested by a sister of Aurora Carlin (she having neither father, mother nor child surviving), who contended the property was the separate estate of deceased, in and to which the contestant and her brother and sister were entitled to a one-half interest. The court found that the land was the community estate of petitioner and Aurora Carlin, and by its decree adjudged the entire property vested in L. C. Carlin, the surviving husband of deceased. From this decree, and an order denying contestant's motion for a new trial, she appeals, claiming the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding of the court.

[1] The land was deeded to the wife, Aurora Carlin, by a third person, and the consideration therefor paid from the community funds of husband and wife. Since either spouse may hold the legal title to community property, it follows that the land so acquired during coverture with community funds was, unless made the subject of a gift from L. C. Carlin to his wife, the community estate of the marital relation.

[2] As to whether or not it was a gift was a question of fact to be determined by the trial court upon the evidence adduced at the trial, and its conclusion, unless manifestly without sufficient support, should not be disturbed by an appellate court.

[3] "Whenever any property is conveyed to a married woman by an instrument in writing, the presumption is that the title is thereby vested in her as her separate property." Section 164, Civ. Code. "But this is a mere rule of evidence fixing the onus probandi in cases where the question of ownership is in litigation." Jackson v. Torrence, 83 Cal. 521, 23 Pac. 695. "Under such circumstances (as here disclosed), the wife is not required to prove that it was a gift, but it devolves upon the husband to overcome the presumption by showing that it was not a gift." Killian v. Killian, 10 Cal. App. 316, 101 Pac. 807; Alferitz v. Arrivillaga, 143 Cal. 646, 77 Pac. 657. "Where the controversy is between the husband and the legal representative of the (deceased) wife, the presumption may be controverted by other evidence, direct or indirect, and it is only where it is not so controverted that the court or jury is bound to find according to the presumption." Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 104 Pac. 308.

[4] The question, therefore, presented is whether the act of L. C. Carlin in having the property deeded to his wife was accompanied by an intent to give it to her, for "to constitute a valid gift the delivery must be made with the intention of making a gift and passing title; a mere delivery of property without such intent passes no title." 14 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 1020.

[5] After showing that L. C. Carlin paid for the property out of community funds, he was asked "how the deed came to be made to" his wife, and in reply said: "I had it made out to her in order to secure a home for herself and myself. I did not intend to make it a gift to her. * * * My intention, why I had this made out to her, as I have stated, was simply in order that we were to have a home together, and if I should die, why she would not be troubled by any of my heirs. * * * I didn't want her to have any trouble about the matter. * * * I wanted her to have the property after I was gone." Another witness testified that Mrs. Carlin stated in her presence "we [referring to herself and husband] are going to make improvements on our ranch," and that she frequently referred to the place as "our ranch," "our property," etc.

This is substantially all the evidence, and, while it is meager, the fact that Carlin placed the title in his wife's name, believing that by so doing he was not only providing a home for his wife, but likewise providing a home for himself, is inconsistent with an intent on his part to strip himself of all interest in or right to the property. Moreover, as in the case of Fanning v. Green, supra, he testified positively that in having the property deeded to his wife it was not his intention to give it to her. In the absence of evidence of the existence of any circumstances inconsistent with his testimony, received without objection and conceded to be competent, we are constrained to hold the conclusion of the trial court should not be disturbed.

[6] The policy of permitting the presumption arising from a conveyance of real estate purchased with community funds to a married woman to be overthrown after the wife's death by evidence of an undisclosed intent on the part of the husband that it was not the subject of a gift may well be questioned. It is the province of the Legislature, however, and not the courts, to determine questions of policy.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by Addie F. Morison against Fred G. Weik and another. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles H. Mattingly, for appellant. Louis Luckel and Hahn & Hahn, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Action to have a certain deed, which purported to have been made by plaintiff to defendant Anna Ilmer Weik, canceled and annulled upon the ground that the signature thereto had been forged by defendants. The court upon ample evidence found that the instrument had been duly signed and executed by plaintiff, and accordingly gave judgment for defendants, from which, and an order denying her motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

[1, 2] The sole alleged error upon which appellant bases her claim for reversal is that the court, over plaintiff's objection, permitted the introduction of evidence on behalf of defendants tending to show that plaintiff signed and executed the deed, which defendants were, by reason of the loss thereof, unable to produce in court. Plaintiff testified that she did not sign the deed, and now on appeal contends that defendants should not have been permitted to prove the contrary, since they did not produce the deed, nor offer sufficient proof of its loss. The question at issue, however, was not the contents of the instrument, which, it was conceded by the complaint, purported to be a conveyance of the property described therein, but whether the name of plaintiff attached thereto was in fact her genuine signature. While the production of the alleged forged signature would have afforded opportunity for its inspection and comparison with admitted genuine signatures of plaintiff, thus aiding in the determination of the question at issue, the want of such production constituted no ground for the exclusion of evidence touching the fact in controversy, upon the ground that it was secondary in character, and hence not admissible until the loss of the deed was shown. Moreover, conceding that the testimony offered, and to the introduction of which plaintiff objected, was competent only upon proof of the loss of the instrument, we think the evidence clearly and sufficiently established such fact. The evidence shows that, subsequent to the bringing of the suit accusing defendants of the forgery, one of them, Fred G. Weik, had the deed in his possession, and, accompanied by his attorney, went to the office of plaintiff's attorney, to whom he exhibited the deed and tendered it to him for inspection. Upon the latter refusing to accept it, or look at it, the same was returned to the office of his attorney. Thereafter defendant obtained it to show to some of his friends, and again returned it to the office of his attorney. It appears that both said defendant and his attorney made diligent search and effort, but without success, to find the deed. The fact that the deed was tendered to plaintiff's attorney for inspection negatives any suspicion that might otherwise arise from withholding it.

[3] Without entering upon a full discussion of the evidence, suffice it to say that it was sufficient to satisfy the mind of the court that the instrument was unintentionally mislaid or lost, and that after a diligent search made therefor it could not be found. Such preliminary proof is left to the discretion of the trial judge, and, unless manifestly insufficient to warrant the introduction of secondary evidence, his ruling will not be disturbed on appeal. Kenniff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 35, 73 Pac. 803.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Action by B. R. Smith against the Riverside Groves & Water Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying relief from defendant's default in seasonably filing a bill of exceptions defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Myron W. Tilden and Watkins & Blodget, for appellant. Collier, Carnahan & Craig, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. Judgment was duly given and made in plaintiff's favor and against defendant on March 3, 1910, and on the same day notice thereof given. Notice of appeal from such judgment was served and filed on March 14, 1910. On April 14th following defendant served on plaintiff's attorneys what purported to be a bill of exceptions, service of which was acknowledged, "reserving all objections to the same that might be made because the same was not served within the time allowed by law or the order of court." On April 19th, recognizing its default in serving such bill within proper time, defendant made application to the court for relief from said default under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. The parties upon the date of such hearing stipulated in open court that plaintiff should have 10 days after service of the notice of the ruling upon such application within which to serve amendments to defendant's proposed bill of exceptions. Thereafter, on May 4th, the court by its order relieved defendant on account of its default, and granted defendant five days from and after May 4th within which to serve said proposed bill of exceptions, and plaintiff was given 10 days from date of service within which to propose amendments. Defendant served no proposed bill within the time specified in the order, relying upon the service of the bill originally served out of time and the stipulation with reference to amendments thereto, and again suffered default. Thereafter, being advised by the court that the order was intended to supersede or take precedence over any stipulation with reference to the time for filing amendments, defendant again made application for relief from such default, and this the court, on June 4, 1910, denied. On August 4th following notice of appeal from such order denying relief was filed. This ruling of the court is sought to be reviewed upon a bill of exceptions disclosing the facts above stated.

It is insisted by respondent that the court cannot consider the bill of exceptions last mentioned, because the appeal was not taken within 60 days after entry of judgment and service of notice thereof. Subdivision 3, § 939, Code Civ. Proc. A motion to dismiss the appeal upon this and other grounds was denied by the Supreme Court without prejudice, and the motion has not been renewed since the transfer of the case to this court. We are of opinion, however, that the judgment and order should be affirmed. Admittedly no proposed bill entitled to consideration had been served at the date of the stipulation. The very motion for relief in the first instance affirmatively shows that there was no attempt to vivify the previously served proposed bill; but, on the contrary, defendant was seeking an order through which it could serve and file a new bill of exceptions, which might or might not contain the matters and things set forth in the other bill. The first proposed bill not being filed in time, no amendments were required or warranted. Appellant saw fit to ignore the plain order of the court made at its instance, relying upon the proposition that the court did not mean what it said by the order. Defendant had applied to the court for an order and when such order was made it was its duty to observe it. No mistake appears, and neither is excusable neglect shown; simply an assumption by appellant that the court in making the order had overlooked the stipulation. This was not such conduct as should be exercised by a prudent man in a matter of material concern to him. The rule is well settled that the discretionary power of the court in proceedings of this character will not be disturbed unless a clear abuse of discretion is made to appear. "It is only in exceptional cases that orders of that kind will be reversed." Shearman v. Jorgensen, 106 Cal. 483, 39 Pac. 863. While the correctness of the ruling may be doubted, nevertheless, an appellate court will not substitute its own opinion, and thereby divest the trial court of that discretionary power reposed in it. We do not feel able to say that a clear abuse of discretion is made to appear, and, under the established rule, the order and judgment of the superior court should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Frank Green was prosecuted for willfully omitting to furnish necessary food, shelter, and medical attendance for his child, and he appeals. Reversed.

Lafayette Gill, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant herein was prosecuted under the provisions of section 270, Penal Code, which declare it to be an offense for a parent to willfully omit to furnish necessary food, clothing, shelter, or medical attendance for his child. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and defendant, having been sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of one year, has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The evidence taken at the trial showed without dispute or conflict that defendant had never been married to, nor had he lived with the mother of the child whom he was alleged to have failed to furnish with the necessities of life, and no contention is made upon this appeal that the child was other than illegitimate. The mother testified that she had held illicit relation with defendant, as well as with one other man, not her husband, prior to the birth of the child. Section 270 of the Penal Code seems to have been enacted with the purpose of furnishing a complement to those sections of the Civil Code which determine the obligations of parents to support and maintain their children. By the sections of the Civil Code it is determined what those obligations are, and by the section referred to of the Penal Code it is made a felony for a parent to fail to discharge his duties in those respects. Section 196 of the Civil Code provides as follows: "The parent entitled to the custody of a child must give him support and education suitable to his circumstances. If the support and education which the father of a legitimate child is able to give are inadequate, the mother must assist him to the extent of her ability." By section 200 of the same Code it is then provided: "The mother of an illegitimate unmarried minor is entitled to its custody, services, and earnings." It therefore appears that, as the mother of an illegitimate unmarried minor is entitled to its custody, services, and earnings, she then has the whole burden of providing it with support, and no duty in that regard rests upon the father.

This being the state of the law, it must follow logically that the father of an illegitimate child is not subject to prosecution under section 270 of the Penal Code for a failure to support the minor. It was not shown that the defendant ever acknowledged the paternity of the child, or that he ever received it into his home, or performed any act tending to show an intent to adopt it as his own. It has been held that, where a statute required the assent of the parent, if living, to the adoption of a child, the word "parent," as there used, was intended to designate only the lawful mother or father, and not the father of an illegitimate minor. In re Gibson, 154 Mass. 381, 28 N. E. 297. The Massachusetts court in that case said: "There is no reason why the Legislature should confer upon the father the right to notice in such cases. He has no right to the custody of the child, or to the use or control of its estate." We are of opinion that the conviction of the defendant under the facts shown in evidence was improper and cannot be sustained.

The judgment and order are reversed.

2. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 97*)—BONDS—RESOLUTION OF BOARD OF EDUCATION—VALIDITY.

Under St. 1909, p. 528, authorizing the board of education of any school district to call an election on the question of the issuance of bonds to purchase school lots, build or repair schoolhouses, and supply the necessary furniture, and to liquidate indebtedness for such purposes, a resolution of a board of education submitting the question of the issuance of bonds to raise money to purchase school lots, to build a schoolhouse, and supply the same with furniture and necessary apparatus, "and afford better facilities for educating the school children within" the district, defines a legal purpose for the issuance of the proposed bonds, and the quoted phrase is but indicative of the object of the preceding expressed purposes, and bonds issued pursuant to an election are valid.

Mandamus by the Santa Ana School District of Orange County, Cal., and another, against T. B. Talbert, Chairman of the Board of Supervisors of the County of Orange, to compel defendant to sign bonds issued by the school district. Writ granted.

Williams & Rutan and W. F. Heathman, for petitioners. L. A. West, Dist. Atty., and A. E. Koepsel, Deputy Dist. Atty., for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. The verified petition of the parties beneficially interested alleges that the Santa Ana school district and the boundaries and territory comprising said school district are the same as that of the city of Santa Ana, a municipal corporation of the fifth class; that on the 14th day of November, 1911, the board of education of the city of Santa Ana at a regular meeting of said board, by unanimous vote, resolved to call a special election of the qualified voters of said school district for the purpose of submitting to said voters the question whether or not $25,000 in bonds of said school district should be issued and sold "to raise money for the purpose of purchasing school lots and for building one more schoolhouse and supplying the same with furniture, necessary apparatus, and for improving the grounds of said schoolhouse within said district, and afford better facilities for educating the school children within said school district"; that said special election was duly held under proper and legal notice; that due and proper canvass and return of the votes cast at said election was made; that more than two-thirds of the votes cast were in favor of issuing the said bonds, all of which was entered upon the minutes of said board of education, and the same were duly certified to the board of supervisors of Orange county, together with all proceedings had in the premises; that on the 9th day of January, 1912, said board authorized and directed the issuance and sale of said bonds of said school district, due notice thereof being given, sealed bids received, opened, and the said bonds were awarded to said Statss Company, a corporation; that on the same day the board entered upon its minutes the form of said bonds and of the interest coupons attached thereto, fixing the time when the whole or any part of the principal of said bonds would be payable, which time was not more than 40 years from the date thereof; that in the form prescribed it was required that the chairman of said board of supervisors should sign each and every one of said bonds; that the total amount of said bonds so issued does not exceed 5 per cent. of the taxable property of the district as shown by the last equalized assessment book of the county; that said bonds were prepared and presented to the said defendant, chairman of said board, for signature, and he refused, and still refuses, to attach his signature thereto as chairman of the board of supervisors. Petitioners therefore ask for a writ of mandate commanding the said chairman of the board of supervisors to so attach his signature, and their petition presents reasons sufficient to warrant the issuance of the writ by this court in the first instance.

[1] The action of the chairman of the board of supervisors in refusing to sign and the resistance to the issuance of this writ are based solely upon the ground that the phrase, "and afford better facilities for educating the school children within said school district," is within itself an expressed purpose, in addition to the other purposes mentioned, and one not recognized by statute as a purpose for which bonds may be issued. The authority of a board of education and a school district in a city of the fifth class to call an election for the issuance of bonds is given by the act approved March 20, 1909. St. 1909, p. 528. This act, being a complete revision of the subject to which earlier statutes related, is manifestly intended as a substitute for the former legislation, and such prior acts in relation to the subject must be considered as repealed. State v. Conkling, 19 Cal. 501; Mack v. Jastro, 126 Cal. 130, 58 Pac. 372.

[2] Section 1 of the act above mentioned provides: "The board of education of any school district in a city of the fifth class * * * may, when in their judgment it is advisable, * * * call an election and submit to the electors of the district whether the bonds of such district shall be issued and sold for the purpose of raising money to purchase school lots, and for building or purchasing or repairing one or more schoolhouses, and supplying the same with furniture, necessary apparatus, and improving the grounds, and for liquidating any indebtedness already incurred for such purposes." If, as contended by respondent, the bonds are issued and sold to raise money for purposes not contemplated by the statute, the invalidity of the bonds is conceded. The sole question, then, for determination upon the application for this writ, is whether or not the words, "and afford better facilities for educating the school children within said school district," are in themselves an expression of a purpose. We are of opinion that such language cannot be held to amount to the declaration of a purpose. Had the resolution of the board of education contained only this clause as the purpose for which the bonds were proposed to be issued, there should be no controversy as to the insufficiency of the resolution to declare a purpose. If, then, no purpose would be declared because of its indefinite character, no purpose is expressed merely because it is added to the other expressed purposes. If the word "and" had been omitted, we take it that there would be no controversy in relation to this matter; that the remainder of the phrase would be accepted as a conclusion of the board with reference to the effect and object of the purposes thereinbefore specifically expressed. The language of the resolution defined clearly certain purposes which, under the statute, were sufficient to authorize the calling of an election. The act of 1909 does not require that the purposes shall be designated in the notice of election, but does require that they be expressed in the resolution directing the call for such an election. Some significance may be attached to the omission of the word "to" in the clause mentioned as indicating the effect which should be given the expression. We think, correctly speaking, that the clause should be read, "and affording better facilities," etc., as indicative of the object of the preceding expressed purposes. To our minds, this objectionable clause was but an expression of opinion by the board that the building of the schoolhouses, etc., would thereby afford better facilities. While such expression was unnecessary, and added nothing to the resolution, we do not feel willing to conclude that its effect was to add an additional purpose to those properly expressed purposes preceding it.

Writ granted.

SANTA ANA HIGH SCHOOL DIST. OF ORANGE COUNTY et al. v. TALBERT.
(Civ. 1,157.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District,
California. May 17, 1912.)

Mandamus by the Santa Ana High School District of Orange County, Cal., and another, against T. B. Talbert, Chairman of the Board of Supervisors of the County of Orange. Writ granted.

Williams & Rutan and W. F. Heathman, for petitioners. L. A. West, Dist. Atty., and A. E. Koepsel, Deputy Dist. Atty., for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. The facts and questions presented in this application for writ of mandate are identical with those stated in our opinion in the case of Santa Ana School District of Orange County, Cal., et al. v. T. B. Talbert, Chairman, etc. (Civil No. 1,156) 124 Pac. 872, this day filed, with one exception, namely, that the objectionable clause is not preceded by the word "and." In other words, after the legitimate and particular purposes are specified, there is appended thereto the statement "to afford better facilities," etc. This to our minds is a clear expression of a conclusion, as distinguished from the statement of a purpose, and its insertion in the resolution of the board does not render invalid the bonds sought to be issued in such proceeding.

Writ granted.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 20, 1912.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 3*)—ELECTIONS
—NUMBER OF CANDIDATES.

If a township is entitled to elect two justices of the peace and if the electors vote for that number, two should be declared elected, even if the proclamation called for the election of but one, since the electors have a right to take notice of the law, which entitles them to select two officers.

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 3*)—ELECTIONS
—NUMBER OF CANDIDATES.

Though a township was entitled to elect two justices of the peace, one of two candidates who received the second highest number of votes is not entitled to be declared elected, where the contest was held for one office only.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; M. T. Dooling, Judge.

Petition by William H. Almon for writ of mandate against P. H. McEvoy and others, as the Board of Supervisors, etc. Judgment dismissing the petition, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

J. L. & P. B. Nagle, for appellant. Franklin Swart, Dist. Atty., for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment dismissing a petition for a writ of mandate to compel respondents as members of the board of supervisors, to issue a certificate of election to the petitioner, who claims that he was elected to the office of justice of the peace of township No. 1 of San Mateo county.

The petition alleges facts which show that township No. 1 of San Mateo county was, prior to the amendment of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 12) to section 4014 of the Political Code, entitled to two justices of the peace. It also states that at an election held in November, 1910, the petitioner was a candidate for that office, and received next to the highest vote therefor. It further sets forth that respondents, contrary to the rights of the petitioner, refused to declare him elected. Consequently he prays for a writ of mandate to compel them to do so. To this petition respondents demurred, and the trial court sustained the demurrer, and judgment was entered dismissing the petition and awarding respondents their costs. The appeal is from such judgment.

[1] If the electors of township No. 1 had voted for two justices of the peace at the election in November, 1910, doubtless two should have been declared elected, even if the proclamation of the board of supervisors called for the election of but one. In such a case, say the authorities, the statute gives notice of the time and place of election, and the officers to be elected, and the voters have a right to take notice of the law and deposit their ballots at the time and place prescribed, notwithstanding that the officer, whose duty it was to give the notice of the election, fails in that duty. People v. Brenham, 3 Cal. 487; Sanchez v. Fordyce, 141 Cal. 430,

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

75 Pac. 56; Cooley on Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) 759.

[2] Here it not only appears that the election was held for the purpose of electing only one justice of the peace, but also that only one in fact was voted for. Apparently the election for the office of justice of the peace in said township was a contest between the petitioner and another candidate for but one place, under which circumstance, of course, it cannot be held that the petitioner, having received a less number of votes than his opponent, is entitled to the relief demanded. Gray v. Mullins, 15 Cal. App. 118, 113 Pac. 694; People, etc., v. Board of Canvassers of Kent Co., 11 Mich. 111. While what was said in the first of these cases in line with the position here adopted was unnecessary for a decision therein, still we think it was sound, and we now approve it. In the other case, under a law authorizing the election of two commissioners, an election was held and conducted in all respects as if only one was to be chosen, and each elector voted for but one of two opposing candidates. In that case it was held that only the one receiving the highest number of votes was elected, and that, as to the other office of commissioner there was a failure to choose; the court observing: "The ballots show that in no single instance did any person vote for more than one candidate. This being the case, it would be absurd to assume that an election was held to fill more than one office."

The judgment is affirmed.

NEWHALL et al. v. JOSEPH LEVY BAG CO.
(Civ. 945.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 7, 1912. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 5, 1912.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 425*)—ACTS OF OFFICERS—PURCHASE OF GOODS—AUTHORITY—ESTOPPEL TO DENY.

Defendant corporation, engaged in buying and selling bags, having contracted to purchase 1,000 bales of bags from plaintiffs to be delivered in June or July, 1908, at buyer's option, the validity of which was not denied, and being unable to complete the purchase, a settlement was made after plaintiffs had procured the bags ready for delivery, by defendant paying some cash, giving a note, and making a new contract to take a similar quantity on like terms, delivery in June or July, 1909. The settlement was agreed to by defendant's president and secretary and one other director, and defendant paid the money, executed the note, and later paid the same. With the knowledge and consent of these same directors, the secretary executed the new contract which plaintiff accepted in part settlement of its claim, purchased the bags in a foreign market, and had them on hand ready for delivery when defendant repudiated the contract. Held, that defendant was estopped to deny that the new contract was made by the secretary with authority, and that defendant was bound in its corporate capacity.

Where, with full knowledge of all the facts involved, a principal reaps the fruits of the unauthorized acts of his agent and for some time yields acquiescence to its provisions, he will be deemed to have ratified it, and will be estopped, as against one who has fully performed the contract on his part, to repudiate it to the injury of the other.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by E. W. Newhall and others, doing business under the name of H. M. Newhall & Company, against Joseph Levy Bag Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Thos. H. Breeze, Gordan Hall, and Albert Fink, for appellants. Otto Irving Wise, for respondent

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiffs allege in their complaint: That on August 3, 1908, defendant "made, executed, and entered into a certain contract in writing with said plaintiffs, which said contract was in words and figures as follows: 'August 3/08. Bag Contract. For and in consideration of one dollar in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, we hereby purchase from H. M. Newhall & Co. one thousand (1,000) bales (each bale 1,000 bags) 36x22-12 oz. Standard Calcutta grain bags: To be delivered in good order and condition at San Francisco, California, ex steamer and/or ship and/or warehouse at seller's option. Time of delivery buyer's option during June-July, 1909. (Bags to be importation of 1908-1909.) Price 7½ c net each bag, duty paid. Payable at San Francisco, California, as delivered, in U. S. gold coin. This sale is based on the present customs tariff, viz.: Seven-eighths of one cent per pound and fifteen per centum ad valorem. Any change to be for account of the purchaser. Joseph Levy Bag Co., Buyers. Sam J. Oppenheim, Secretary.'" That plaintiff thereafter purchased the bags called for in said contract, "and held the same subject to defendant's order during the months of June and July, 1909." That at no time during said months or at any time did defendant request delivery of said bags, or any of them. That on July 31, 1909, plaintiffs tendered to defendant said bags, and defendant "then and there wholly refused said tender and refused to accept delivery of said bags or any of them, and wholly refused to pay the price in and by said contract reserved for said bags, or any price whatsoever." That thereafter, to wit, on August 3, 1909, plaintiff sold said bags for the best obtainable price, to wit, 5¼ cents per bag, and on said day "made demand on defendant for the payment of the difference between the contract price for the purchase of said bags and the selling price thereof, to wit, the sum of $18,750." That defendant refused and still refuses to pay said sum, and the same and the whole thereof is unpaid. Judgment is prayed for said sum with interest from August 1, 1909. A general and special demurrer was overruled, and defendant answered, specifically denying the averments of the complaint. At the close of plaintiffs' evidence they were denied leave to file an amended complaint, and defendant's motion for a nonsuit was granted, and judgment was entered for defendant. Plaintiffs moved for a new trial, which was denied. The appeal is from the judgment and order on bill of exceptions.

It is somewhat difficult to extract from the record the precise state of the evidence on which the nonsuit was granted. Plaintiffs opened the case by calling witness Mills, a bag broker who had business relations with defendant, and offering to prove by him a contract, entered into by defendant, August 12, 1907, with plaintiffs, which is in all respects the same as the contract sued upon except that it called for the delivery of the bags "during June-July, 1908," and was signed by the secretary and president of the corporation and attested by its seal and is marked "Exhibit I"; whereas the contract set out in the complaint called for delivery of the bags "during June-July, 1909," and was signed "Joseph Levy Bag Co., Buyers. Sam J. Oppenheim, Secretary." It was conceded that this latter contract was required, by the statute of frauds, to be in writing. The following statement by one of plaintiffs' attorneys will give a key to the controversy and will contribute to a better understanding of the rulings on the evidence and of the final order of nonsuit: Mr. Breeze: I assume the defense will be failure of authority to execute the contract set forth in the complaint. If your honor please, the making of this contract is denied. We propose to show that they received benefits under this contract. We propose to show they acquiesced in the making of this contract by the secretary. In the year 1907 the Joseph Levy Bag Company and the firm of H. M. Newhall & Co. entered into a contract for the purchase of bags for June and July delivery in the year 1908, at the rate of 7½ cents per bag; the contract being for 1,000 bales. That original contract was signed Joseph Levy Bag Company, by Charles Levy as president, and Samuel J. Oppenheim as secretary, and was under the corporate seal. In June and July of the following year the price of bags had fallen, and the Joseph Levy Bag Company was unable to accept under that contract. They went to Newhall & Co. and entered into an agreement whereby they agreed to pay $5,000 and give their promissory note for $2,000; it being understood that Newhall & Co. would waive their claim for damages for breach of that contract at that time— The Court: That has not the least bit of bearing on this writing before me (contract sued on). Mr. Breeze: I desire to show the authority to enter into this contract. These people have received the benefit of it. The Court: What have they received—the sacks? Mr. Breeze: They received a remission of the damages accrued by reason of breach of the former contract. I presume I may show authority by proving ostensible agency, by proving ratification, by proving acquiescence, and by proving estoppel in pais; that they received a valuable consideration for entering into this contract which they have retained. My proposition is that this contract was part of a prior transaction. It was given in consideration of the rescission of an old contract upon which they had sustained damages for something like $18,000. They settled that contract, that controversy—by paying $5,000 in cash and giving their promissory note, and also the contract was renewed for the following year at the same price. The Court: That does not help me a bit. We want to get at this man's authority to sign this contract" (the contract sued on).

Thereupon Edwin A. Newhall, one of the plaintiffs, was called as a witness on their behalf. He testified that his firm had business dealings with defendant in August, 1908, and, when asked "the nature of that transaction," defendant objected on the ground that "those transactions were merged in the written contract, and the written contract is the best evidence." The objection was sustained. His attention was called to the contract of August 3, 1908, set out in the complaint, and he testified to the signature of Oppenheim. This contract was offered in evidence and is designated as "Exhibit II," the court remarking: "It is not admitted just now. We pass on." The witness stated that he had negotiations with Joseph Levy Bag Company prior to the receipt of this contract, but he was not permitted to state anything relating to such negotiations, nor was he permitted to state that plaintiffs took steps to enable them to deliver the bags. Counsel suggested that he could not put in his entire case at once. "The Court: I realize the proposition that you have just stated, but I think in this case I will call for proof of this contract first. Mr. Breeze: I will have to prove that contract by acquiescence and estoppel. The Court: Go ahead and prove it by acquiescence and estoppel, but I can't see how you can prove it in such a way." The witness was permitted to testify that he had conversations with some of the officers and directors of the bag company in regard to this contract at which at least three of the five directors, including the president and secretary, were present, and also some other members of plaintiff company; but he was not permitted to testify to anything that occurred at those meetings. In reply to counsel that he proposed by the witness "to show an acquiescence in this contract," that the directors of the corporation knew of the contract "and did not deny execution of it until the following year when the bag market took a drop," the court said: "I do not understand that that makes any difference to me." Counsel then stated to the court more fully his view of the matter as follows: "Mr. Breeze: They are estopped from denying authority unless they put us in the position which we were in at the time the breach of the original contract occurred. In June, 1908, they were in default in the fulfillment of the contract which matured on that date. They arranged with Newhall & Co. to remit damages, and the damages were remitted under an agreement by which we were paid a certain sum in lieu of the carrying charges on those bags during the year. They were to give a new contract which was in effect an extension of the old contract for a year more. They received a benefit or a valuable consideration for entering into this contract, namely, the remission of those damages. There was a valuable consideration paid by Newhall & Co. for the execution of this contract. The Court: You have not asked any questions to show that, Mr. Breeze. Mr. Breeze: I did, I propose to show it by this witness. The Court: Go on and question him about it." Counsel then proceeded to put questions to the witness in various forms in his effort to show the history of the transaction as he claimed it to be; the circumstances surrounding the parties; that plaintiffs' dealings with Oppenheim were with him as secretary of defendant corporation; what representations he made when he brought the contract to plaintiffs; the consideration for its execution; that plaintiffs' negotiations had been with at least three of the directors assuming to act for the defendant; that the president and secretary of the defendant corporation were present at the delivery of the contract—but the court sustained objection to all such questions. Notwithstanding these and subsequent rulings, most of the essential facts in the transaction came out without objection, as is hereinafter shown.

It appeared that defendant was engaged in the business of "buying and selling bags, burlap, and twine," and it was admitted that Oppenheim was a director and secretary of the corporation. It was also admitted that Elias, Charles, and William Levy were directors of the corporation "and participated with him (Oppenheim) in the conduct of the affairs of the corporation." Plaintiffs offered to prove that these four persons owned an equal number of shares in the corporation, "the fifth director holding only one share of qualifying stock, so that it was in effect a copartnership conducted in the form of a corporation for convenience"; but all such evidence was denied.

When on the witness stand, Oppenheim was asked whether the Levys above named knew that he was "going to take this contract up and deliver it to plaintiffs"; also, "what knowledge, if any, your associates, Messrs. Levy that I have named, had of the contract which you say you delivered on the 3d of August, 1908"; also, whether or not he was directed by his associates to deliver the contract; also, whether he or his associates, after the delivery of this contract, disaffirmed "the same or in any way notified the plaintiffs that it was unauthorized and not a corporate act." Objections to these questions as irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, and not within the issues, were sustained.

The deposition of William L. Martin was admitted in evidence and, except as noted, without objection. He testified as follows: "I reside in San Francisco. I am manager of the bag department of H. M. Newhall & Co. I have been engaged in that occupation 21 years. I was manager of that department during the years 1907-1909. I know the defendant, Joseph Levy Bag Company. I know Mr. Charles Levy. He is president of the defendant corporation. I know Samuel J. Oppenheim. He is the secretary of the defendant corporation. I have met one of the other directors. I am not sure whether he is named Elias or William. It is either one or the other. I recognize a paper which is shown me marked 'Copy Bag Contract' under date of August 12, 1907. It purports to be a contract for the sale of 1,000 bags, Calcutta grain bags, to Joseph Levy Bag Company. I have seen the original of the paper of which this purports to be a copy. (The paper identified by witness is a copy of plaintiffs' Exhibit I.) I saw it on file in our office. It was returned to the Joseph Levy Bag Company. This is a correct copy of the original except that the original had Charles Levy's signature as president and Samuel J. Oppenheim's as secretary. The corporate seal was attached to it. I know it to be a correct copy of the original. I have made personal comparison of it with the original." The contract of August 12, 1907, was offered in evidence, the court reserving its ruling, after objection. "The witness (continuing): On or about the end of July, 1908, I had a conversation with Mr. Charles Levy, Mr. Oppenheim, and either Elias or William Levy in regard to business transactions between the firm of H. M. Newhall & Co. and Joseph Levy Bag Company. The conversation was about the delivery of the bags and the Joseph Levy Bag Company taking them up and paying for them. They said they were short of funds and could not pay for the bags and were willing to continue the contract for another year. Q. That is, the Joseph Levy Bag Company? A. Yes, sir. After a great deal of discussion we decided to renew the contract for another year provided they paid carrying over charges. Q. Did they make such payment? A. They did. They paid in all $7,000, of which $2,000 was in shape of a promissory note and $5,000 in cash. While these negotiations were pending, we had four conversations at least, probably more. The terms of the proposed agreement were discussed in the presence of all three gentlemen I have mentioned. As a result of these negotiations, we entered into a further contract for the sale of bags. I recognize a typewritten document shown me on the letter heading of H. M. Newhall & Co. dated August 3, 1908, marked 'Bag Contract.' It is a copy of the contract which was signed August 3, 1908. (The paper identified by witness is a copy of plaintiffs' Exhibit II.) This is the contract to which I have referred in my previous testimony as being entered into as a result of these negotiations. The original I suppose is in our office. I have made search for it but so far have been unable to find it." The contract of August 3, 1908, was then offered in evidence and after objection, the court reserved its ruling. "The witness (continuing): After this contract was signed by Oppenheim on behalf of Joseph Levy Bag Company, no notice whatever was received from the Joseph Levy Bag Company or any officer or agent thereof, that Mr. Oppenheim had no authority to enter into the contract on behalf of Joseph Levy Bag Company." Witness was asked whether plaintiffs procured the sacks necessary to fill the contract; what plaintiffs did in reference to the contract after its date; whether plaintiffs had bags on hand to fill the contract during July and August; whether plaintiffs communicated with defendant in regard to the contract during July and August, 1908. To all these questions objection was sustained. Also, a letter written by plaintiffs and sent to defendant on July 27, 1909, informing defendant that plaintiffs were prepared to deliver the 1,000 bales of bags mentioned in the contract of August 3, 1908; and the reply of defendant, of July 29, 1909, denying the execution of the contract; also, letter of plaintiffs informing defendant that they would at once proceed to dispose of the bags and would hold defendant responsible for any loss under the contract; also, letter of August 2, 1909, advising defendant that the best bid received for the bags was 5¼ cents and that they proposed to close out the transaction on that basis, holding defendant for the difference. All these letters were objected to and the objections sustained; as, also, all subsequent questions to show what plaintiffs did with the bags; the prevailing demand and price, and like matters. "The witness (continuing): At the termination of the year following the making of the contract of 1907, Charles Levy said that Joseph Levy Bag Company had not money to take up the bags. We agreed to cancel the first contract upon certain conditions. We determined the amount that should be paid for the cancellation of that contract by ascertaining the approximate carrying charges including interest, fire insurance, and warehouse charges, for the term of one year following. The cancellation of the contract of 1907 was made dependent upon the entering into of a new contract—the contract of August 3, 1908. We had no intimation that the Levy Company disclaimed the authority of Mr. Oppenheim to enter into, or disclaimed the making of, that contract, prior to receipt of the letter from Mr. Wise." This letter was written July 29, 1909.

Witness Newhall was recalled and testified that the meeting to which he had testified occurred before the contract of August 3, 1908, was entered into. Continuing, he testified: "In August, 1908, we had negotiations with Charles Levy, Elias Levy, and Mr. Oppenheim with reference to the sale of 1,000 bales of bags for future delivery. These negotiations began during the latter part of July, 1908, and occurred in my office. There was present during these negotiations Charles Levy, Mr. Oppenheim, and Elias Levy, Mr. Martin, and my brother George A. Newhall. We had three interviews. One a few days before this. Q. By Mr. Wise: The conversation about which you are now being interrogated resulted in the execution of this paper of August 3, 1908, which was shown to you yesterday? A. Yes. * * * The witness thereupon was shown plaintiffs' Exhibit I. Q. State whether or not you entered into that contract set forth on that paper of the 12th of August, 1907, with the defendant corporation. A. We did. The Court: Q. On August 3, 1908, did your firm have any claim against the Joseph Levy Bag Company for want of compliance with that contract? A. Yes. Q. What was the amount that you claimed as damages for noncompliance? A. The damages were about $12,000." Continuing, he testified: "Q. State whether or not on or about the 3d of August, 1908, or just prior thereto, you waived any claim or demand which you had against the defendant at that time in consideration of its doing certain things, and what, if any, acts it was to perform in consideration of that waiver. A. We made them three offers. We wrote three offers to waive the rights. I can't find them. They were delivered to Mr. Charles Levy. I have not a copy of that letter or instrument. It was just a memorandum. Either Mr. Martin or myself delivered it to Mr. Charles Levy. We were both in the office at the time he was there. It was handed to Mr. Charles Levy in my presence. Mr. Martin wrote out the memorandum. I read it after it was written. I saw it delivered to Mr. Charles Levy. I am able to state its contents. There were three options to close this old contract. One of the options was that they should pay up for the bags and make delivery. The other was that they should pay $7,000 carrying charges and take a new contract at the same price as the contract of 1907. The third option was that they should take a new contract at the ruling price of the market at that date and pay us the difference in cash. This memorandum was delivered to Mr. Levy at the second interview. The third interview was held about the 1st of August. Q. State what transpired at the third interview about the first of August. (Objection sustained.) Q. State what, if anything, the defendant did with reference to availing itself of any of these three options. A. They accepted the second option, that they would pay— The Court: What did he say? You say they accepted—who was talking to you, and what was stated? A. Charles Levy. Mr. Fink: Q. In the presence of whom, if anybody? A. The presence of Mr. Oppenheim, my brother, and Mr. William Martin. I think Mr. Elias Levy was there. They accepted the second option. Mr. Charles Levy stated that they would accept the second option. That is, we were asking $7,000. They stated that they could not pay but $5,000, but they would give a note for $2,000, and we told him we would accept it if they would put an indorser on the note, and on the 3d of August they brought a check for $5,000 to us and also a note signed by Levy Bag Company and indorsed by Herman Levy. We accepted that on the 3d of August and then issued the new contract at the same price as the 1907 contract. On August 3d they came to the office and brought a check on the London, Paris, and American bank, and the note signed and indorsed by Mr. Herman Levy, and at that time we gave them the new contract at the same price as the old one. We turned over the document of August 12, 1907, tearing it out of our book. Q. Now, I will ask you to state whether or not in your interview with Mr. Charles Levy, Mr. Elias Levy, and Mr. Oppenheim about the 1st of August, 1908, anything was said by them about sending around this new contract and the character of it. A. Mr. Charles Levy accepted the second option and said that he would fix it up in a day or so. At the same time he said that they ought not to pay more than $5,000. We stood on $7,000 and said we could not let them have it for less than $7,000. On the 3d of August they said then that they would send it around in a day or two. They sent the check over with the note." The witness was asked whether or not plaintiffs would have surrendered the contract, Exhibit I, to defendant, "except in exchange for the check, note, and contract of August 3, 1908"; what, if anything, plaintiffs caused to be done to put themselves in a position to deliver the bags under this second contract, but objection was sustained, and the witness was not permitted to answer. "The Court: If there is anything in this case at all, it is on a count altogether different from the one that you have got in the complaint. I don't know whether an amendment could be prepared that is proper or not. You had better try and prepare an amended pleading. The Witness (continuing): We had the bags on hand from the old contract. I think we had them for a whole year. It was at our expense for the reason that we had to pay storage and insurance and interest. Q. State whether or not you would have so acted except for the contract delivered to you on the 3d of August, by Oppenheim. (Objection sustained.) Q. Now state whether or not in July and August, 1909, these bags were accepted by the defendant. A. They were not accepted by the defendant; we sold them. We put them in the hands of a bag broker. The market price of bags in that quantity at that time was less than 5¼ cents, about 5⅓, and the broker was not able to sell them at that price. We finally bought them in ourselves at 5¼ cents. We credited the defendant with that amount. We made demand upon the defendant for the difference between the market price of the bags and the contract price. The defendant did not pay us. In the latter part of July we took warehouse delivery orders for 1,000 bales and presented them to Mr. Charles Levy and Mr. Oppenheim. That was about the end of July. I think it was about the 27th or 29th. We wrote to them a letter, and then we got an answer to that letter from Mr. Wise, and as soon as we got that letter we presented the warehouse delivery orders for 1,000 bales with a bill for the total amount. The defendant would not accept them. We had a talk with Mr. Levy on the subject. Q. What did he say? A. He said nothing. It is in the hands of Mr. Wise, and we cannot do anything. We had the bags at that time ready to deliver. We had them ready to deliver up to the 31st day of July, 1910. Mr. Wise: I am willing to admit that plaintiffs will testify to the possession of 1,000 bales and the warehouse receipts; that he will testify that they are in his possession; that he had the property and warehouse receipts in San Francisco as testified to by him. Mr. Breeze: And will you also admit that we made tender of the warehouse receipts? Mr. Wise: I will admit that Mr. Newhall will testify that the tender was made on the day just referred to."

Witness Mills, recalled, testified: "I am acquainted with Elias Levy, William Levy, Charles Levy, and Mr. Oppenheim. I was present at an interview at which there was present Mr. Charles Levy, Mr. Oppenheim, E. W. Newhall, Mr. Martin, myself, and I think Mr. George Newhall was at his desk, in the latter part of July, 1908, when the contract of 1907 was about to mature. I was the broker in that transaction. Charles Levy and Mr. Oppenheim pleaded that they could not take up the contract. That they did not have the money and could not pay up. They left after stating that. I was present at another interview between them and Mr. Newhall some days after that. There was some talk of the same kind. Mr. Elias Levy was there also. They pleaded their inability again to pay the amount that H. M. Newhall & Co. demanded and wanted to cancel the old contract. I had conversations with Mr. Charles Levy and Mr. Oppenheim down in their office with reference to the third option which had been given them by Mr. Newhall. Mr. Elias Levy may have been present. I talked more than once with them. I don't think Mr. William Levy was present. Q. What was said by them about these options? (Objection sustained.) Q. I will ask you to state whether or not finally in your presence they decided to accept one of these options? (Objections sustained.) Q. State what, if anything, they did with reference to accepting one of these options? A. They told me they could pay $5,000. I know the money was paid and the note was given and the other contract was issued. Samuel Oppenheim took the money up himself. I met him on the street on the way up and he told me he was going to pay it. I did not see the money paid or the note delivered. Q. After August 3, 1908, and between that date and June and July, 1909, did you have any conversation with either of the Levys or Mr. Oppenheim with reference to the contract of 1908 for 1,000 bales? (Objection sustained.) Mr. Fink: I offer to prove by this witness that frequently during the period between August 3, 1908, and June and July, 1909, he had conversation with Elias Levy, Charles Levy, and Mr. Oppenheim in which their purchase of this 1,000 bales of bags under the contract of August 3, 1908, was discussed with this witness, and in which they asked this witness to endeavor if possible to make a sale of the bags for the defendant corporation. (Objection sustained.) The Witness (continuing): I received a commission on the 1907 deal. Q. Did you receive any commission on the 1908 deal? (Objection sustained.) Mr. Fink: I offer to prove that he did not. (Objection sustained.) Mr. Fink: If the court please, that is our case. We ask permission, in the event your honor thinks we have not proved a case under the present complaint, to permit us to file an amended complaint. I have a rough draft of it now. It sets out this entire transaction just as it has been testified to by the witnesses. The Court: I don't see that there is any complaint that can be filed in this action under which I can give you relief. Mr. Wise: Let the record show a formal motion for a nonsuit upon the ground that plaintiffs have failed to establish a case or have failed to establish any contract as set forth in the complaint, or otherwise, or at all, or have established or proved or submitted any evidence oral or documentary to sustain the allegations of their complaint as to the execution of a contract by defendant or its breach or any damages thereunder. The court took said motion under advisement. Thereafter plaintiffs prepared an amended complaint and requested leave of court to file the same, which said request the court then and there denied, stating that the document offered as the contract of the defendant corporation is not in law the contract of the defendant; that such contract was never ratified by the defendant; that, as the defendant has received nothing under the alleged contract, no estoppel exists or can be proven, and for the said reasons, and for no other, the court denied the application for leave to file an amended complaint. (To which ruling of the court plaintiffs then and there duly excepted and now assign said ruling as error.)"

This proposed amended complaint set forth the transaction of 1907, the failure of defendants to comply with it, the negotiations following their failure, the surrender of that contract and waiver of the damages which accrued to plaintiffs, the adjustment of those damages and surrender of the contract in consideration of certain money payments, and the further consideration that defendant would enter into a new contract, the contract of August 3, 1908, for the purchase of a like number of bags the following year on like terms, the purchase by plaintiffs of bags to meet the contract, the failure and refusal of defendant to accept them when the time of delivery arrived, the tender and demand made by plaintiffs, and, on refusal by defendant, the sale in the open market for the best obtainable price leaving still due plaintiffs the amount claimed. In brief, this proposed amended complaint alleges the facts and circumstances as proved or sought to be proved and as appears by the foregoing narrative of what took place at the trial.

It is a fact of common knowledge that a very large part of the mercantile business of the country is, as matter of convenience, if not, indeed, as matter of necessity, carried on by corporate organizations rather than by partnerships. It would greatly hamper their usefulness if all the daily current purchases and sales of merchandise could be made only by resolution of directors, or that the public dealing with their officers would do so at the peril of having their contracts repudiated when they might happen to be unfavorable to the corporation, or less profitable than was anticipated when made. Suppose an incorporated mercantile house of San Francisco should, in its corporate name, signed by its secretary, and on the verbal authority of the president and one other of the five directors, cable an order to a Paris house for a bale of dry goods of a kind and value previously purchased from the latter by the former. Must the Paris house demand and receive an authenticated copy of a resolution by the board of directors of the San Francisco house authorizing the order for goods before the Paris house could safely fill the order? Suppose the Paris house should ship the goods, and on arrival it happened that they had depreciated in value and the San Francisco house repudiated the contract, claiming their right to do so under the rule now contended for. A system of law that would tolerate such an evasion of responsibility would be unworthy of a civilized people.

[1] Yet that is substantially what happened here. Defendant, by its president, secretary, and another director, personally ordered the bags from plaintiffs, and the latter, at great cost, purchased them in a foreign market and shipped them to San Francisco and held them for delivery as they had agreed to do. Meanwhile the price fell off and defendant repudiated the contract. Indeed, the case is stronger than appears by this simple statement. There is evidence in the record showing the following facts: That, in 1907, defendant executed a contract, whose validity is not to be questioned, to purchase 1,000 bales of bags from plaintiffs to be delivered in June or July, 1908, at buyer's option; that plaintiffs purchased bags to meet the contract and had them on hand for delivery; that when the time for delivery arrived defendant was unable to meet its obligations and sought a settlement with plaintiffs; that the damage to plaintiffs resulting from defendant's default was about $12,000; that plaintiffs finally agreed to cancel this contract on condition that defendant would pay them $5,000 cash and execute its note for $2,000 and would also make a new contract for a like number of bags on like terms, delivery to be made in June or July, 1909; that defendant agreed to this, i. e., the president and secretary and one other of the directors so agreed, and the defendant, in its corporate capacity, did in fact pay the money, execute the note, and later pay the same; that with the knowledge of these same directors and by their direction and pursuant to the agreement made with plaintiffs, by which defendant was released from the first contract, thus avoiding the payment of the remaining damage caused by defendant's breach of the contract of 1907, the secretary of defendant, and in its name, executed and delivered to plaintiffs the contract of 1908 in question; that plaintiffs accepted this contract in part settlement of their claim, proceeded in good faith to meet its requirements on their part, purchased the bags in Calcutta, and had on hand for delivery the necessary number, and not until about the last day for delivery were they notified of defendant's repudiation of the contract; that at this time the price of bags had dropped to a point involving the damages claimed by plaintiffs. It appeared that the board of directors consisted of Oppenheim, secretary, Charles Levy, president, Elias and William Levy, and one other. It was admitted by defendant "that the three Levys named were directors and participated with him (Oppenheim) in the conduct of the affairs of the corporation." The corporation recognized and acquiesced in the contract by paying money, and in its corporate capacity executing a note and paying it, which note formed part of the contract. The transaction was in pursuance of the only business the corporation was engaged in—the buying and selling bags, burlap, and twine. In fact, the contract was but the renewal of one canceled, about which latter no question of its validity can arise. Defendant is seeking to avoid this substituted contract, which plaintiffs accepted in good faith, surrendered a considerable part of their claim for damages under the first contract, expended a large sum of money in purchasing bags to fill the second contract. We think that the beneficent principle of estoppel was adopted by the courts to meet just such cases as this. This would seem to us the equitable and reasonable view of the case in the absence of authority. But we think it supported, not alone by its intrinsic merit, but by adjudicated cases of recognized value.

From the viewpoint of the learned trial judge, he consistently ruled out both contracts and many questions intended to cast light upon the transactions which, in our view, should have been allowed. Indeed, from his conception of the case it is somewhat remarkable that he let in the facts which we have been able to extract from the record.

In Crowley v. Genessee Mining Co., 55 Cal. 273, the court said of the common-law rule contended for by respondent: "In the United States, nothing more is requisite than to show the authority of the agent to contract. That authority may be conferred by the corporation at a regular meeting of the directors, or by their separate assent, or by any other mode of their doing such acts. 'If this were not so,' says Mr. Chief Justice Redfield, 'it would lead to very great injustice, for it is notorious that the transaction of the ordinary business of railways, banks, and similar corporations in this country, is without any formal meetings or votes of the board. Hence there follows a necessity of giving effect to the acts of such corporations, according to the mode in which they choose to allow them to be transacted.'"

The modern mercantile corporations have come into use since this was written. Their business is of such a character as to require even greater latitude in conducting their affairs than the classes above named.

[2] In Gribble v. Columbus Brewing Co., 100 Cal. 67, 71, 34 Pac. 527, 529, the court said: "The most that can be claimed is that the contract, as executed, was in excess of the power conferred by the board of directors upon the president; that it varied from his authority. In this respect the transaction does not differ from that of an agent of an individual who has exceeded his authority. That which the principal may authorize an agent to perform he may ratify when performed by the latter without authority. And where with full knowledge of all the facts involved a principal reaps the fruits of the unauthorized contract of his agent, and for some time yields acquiescence to its provisions, he will be deemed to have ratified it, and will be estopped, as against one who has fully performed the contract on his part, from repudiating it to the injury of the latter. And this doctrine applies to corporations equally with individuals"—citing cases. "A voluntary acceptance of the benefit of a transaction is equivalent to a consent to all the obligations rising from it, so far as the facts are known, or ought to be known, to the person accepting." Civ. Code, § 1589. Among the maxims found in the Code is the following: "He who takes the benefit must bear the burden." Civ. Code, § 3521. It was held in Phillips v. Sanger Lumber Co., 130 Cal. 431, 62 Pac. 749, that an oral authorization would suffice for conferring an agency to execute the promissory note of a corporation; and it will be ratified by accepting or retaining the benefit of the act, with notice thereof. Civ. Code, § 2310. See West v. Will C. Prather & Co., 7 Cal. App. 81, 93 Pac. 892. Without prolonging the discussion, we refer to one more case. Kelsey v. National Bank of Crawford County, 69 Pa. 426. The cashier of defendant offered a reward for the detection of the thieves who had robbed the bank, and the question of his authority arose when plaintiff sought to prove that the reward was offered by the cashier in the presence of some of the directors, pursuant to which plaintiff undertook the detection of the thief; that more than a majority of the directors had knowledge of the offered reward and sanctioned and approved it. The trial court rejected the evidence. On appeal it was held admissible. Among other things the court said: "It is not necessary to decide whether the cashier ex officio had authority to offer the reward in question for the detection of the thieves that robbed the bank. If he had no authority, the bank is liable for the reward if the offer was acquiesced in and ratified by the directors. The law is well settled that a principal who neglects promptly to disavow an act of his agent, by which the latter has transcended his authority, makes the act his own (Bredin v. Dubarry, 14 Serg. & R. [Pa.] 30), and the waiver which makes the ratification equivalent to precedent authority is as much predicable of a corporation as it is of ratification by any other principal; and it is equally to be presumed from the absence of dissent (Gordon v. Preston, 1 Watts [Pa.] 387 [26 Am. Dec. 75].") Quoting from the Bank of Pennsylvania v. Reed, 1 Watts & S. (Pa.) 101, the court said: "When the principal has been informed of what has been done, he must dissent and give notice of it in a reasonable time; and, if he does not, his assent and ratification will be presumed. * * * Nor was it necessary, in order to bind the bank by their acquiescence, that notice should have been given to the directors, when sitting in their official capacity as a board. If they were personally cognizant of the offer made by the cashier, it was their duty to call a meeting of the board and disavow the act, if they were unwilling that the bank should be bound by it. It would be unjust to permit the plaintiff to spend his time and money for the detection of the thief, on the faith of the promised reward, and then repudiate the offer, as unauthorized, when he had succeeded. * * * If the evidence, tending to show that the directors had notice of the offer and that they acquiesced in it, was sufficient to establish the fact, if believed, the case should have been permitted to go to the jury. We think the evidence was sufficient, and that it should not have been withheld from them. It tended to show that the cashier offered the reward at the instance of one of the directors, and upon his suggestion that the directors would bear him out in it; and that the offer was made in the presence of three of the directors; and that the plaintiff 'separately met all the directors and talked the matter over with them,' with the exception of William Davis, Jr. * * * The evidence touching the question was amply sufficient to go to the jury."

It is our opinion that the learned trial judge tried the case on an erroneous conception of the law, that he refused much evidence which should have been admitted, that the court erred in granting the nonsuit, and that plaintiffs should have been permitted to amend their complaint.

The judgment and order are reversed.

PROSTITUTION (§ 1*)—PANDERING—STATUTE—CONSTRUCTION—"INMATE."

Act Feb. 8, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 9) § 1, provides that any person who shall procure a female inmate of a house of prostitution, or shall procure for a female person a place in such house or as an inmate therein, shall be guilty of pandering. Held, that the word "inmate" means one who occupies or lodges in a place with others, or any occupant, even if alone, so that the act must be construed as requiring the procuring of a place in a house of prostitution for one who actually becomes an inmate thereof, and where defendant had agreed to let one of a number of designated rooms in such a house to a prostitute when it was ready for occupancy, but the room was never put in condition, and was never occupied by her, the offense was not complete.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Pete Matsicura was convicted of pandering, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. R. Dorsey and Thomas Scott, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ALLEN, P. J. An information was filed against the defendant charging him with the crime of pandering, in that "on or about the 12th day of July, 1912, at and in the said county of Kern, state of California, and prior to the filing of this information, he did then and there willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously procure for a female person, to wit, June McIntosh, a place as inmate of a house of prostitution, said house of prostitution being then and there situate at No. 2131 M street in the city of Bakersfield, county of Kern, state of California." Trial was regularly had, and the defendant was found guilty by the verdict of a jury, and from the judgment pronounced, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

The undisputed facts in the record may be briefly stated as these: At the date alleged in the information, and for many months prior thereto, defendant was and had been the owner or lessee of a house devoted to purposes of prostitution; this house containing many rooms occupied by harlots plying their vocation. Many months prior to the date alleged in the information the girl June McIntosh had been one of these inmates. She, however, had left the premises and gone to Stockton. On July 12th she wired defendant to come to Stockton or send a ticket at once. Defendant through the proper channel procured a ticket to be delivered to her, and she arrived in Bakersfield on the morning of the 13th of July. The woman went from the depot to the house of defendant and awakened him. Not yet having had her breakfast, defendant went with her to a restaurant, where they breakfasted. While at breakfast the defendant was arrested charged with the offense set out in the information. The woman did not have sexual intercourse with any one after her arrival at Bakersfield, did not go to any room or place designated by defendant or any other person, or actually enter any house of prostitution or place designed for such purpose. It is shown, however, that she did at breakfast ask defendant, "Is my crib ready for me?" the defendant answering, "No; not yet, but after breakfast I will fix it up for you." That was all that was said. Defendant did not designate what particular room she was to have, but pointed out some back rooms, and said, "You may have one of these." His front rooms were all occupied. This is a summary of the evidence appearing in the record.

Section 1 of the act of February 8, 1911 (Stats., 1911, p. 9), upon which this information is based, provides: "Any person who shall procure a female inmate for a house of prostitution, * * * or shall procure for a female person a place as inmate in a house of prostitution or as an inmate of any place in which prostitution is encouraged or allowed within this state," is guilty of pandering. The principal question suggested upon this appeal, then, relates to the construction which should be given this section, or that portion of it alleged in the information to have been violated. The offense defined is that of procuring a place for a female as inmate of a house of prostitution. There can be no question but that defendant intended to commit the crime charged in the information, but, in our opinion, he stopped short of its actual commission. The word "inmate" is defined by the Standard Dictionary as "one who occupies or lodges in a place with others," or "any occupant, even if alone"; in other words, the words "inmate" and "occupant," when employed with reference to a building, are synonyms. The statute must, therefore, be construed as defining the offense to be the procuring of a place in a house of prostitution for one who becomes an inmate thereof; and it must necessarily follow that, in order to complete the offense, it must be made to appear that the female person actually became an occupant of the place designated or procured. A place may be said to be procured where the owner of a building permits the occupancy, as completely as though one not the owner had leased, rented, or secured a room of the actual owner, but that the offense should be complete something more must be done than the mere selection or procurement of the room. The offense does not consist in procuring a room intended to be occupied or used for purposes of prostitution. It must be occupied by the female, and when so occupied, and not before, is the statute violated. There is no claim that this woman June McIntosh ever occupied any room owned by defendant, leased by him, or designated by him, or by him devoted to purposes of prostitution. The most that can be said is that he agreed with her that after the rooms were put in preparation she might have one of a number of designated rooms in which to continue her prostitution. But the room was never put in condition for occupancy, was never occupied, and, in our opinion, no offense was committed under this section of the statute as charged in the information.

The defendant asked the court to charge the jury that: "You are further instructed that if you believe from the evidence that the defendant procured a place for said June McIntosh in a house of prostitution, and the prosecution has failed to prove that she became an inmate of any such house, then I further charge you that it is your duty to acquit the defendant." Another instruction requested by the defendant was to the effect that it was necessary for the prosecution to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the said June McIntosh became an inmate of a house of prostitution. These charges were refused by the court, and none given covering the subject. We think the court erred in refusing to give those charges; that the evidence appearing in the record was such that the defendant was entitled to an instruction directing the jury to acquit upon the ground that the offense charged was not shown to have been committed. Respondent contends that this statute is similar to that relating to abduction, as defined by section 267 of the Penal Code, in the construction of which our Supreme Court has said in People v. Lewis, 141 Cal. 543, 75 Pac. 189, that the taking of a child from its parents for the purposes of prostitution completes the offense; but it will be observed that that section in plain language provides that every person "who takes away any female under the age of eighteen years from her father, mother, guardian, or other person having the legal charge of her person, without their consent, for the purpose of prostitution, is punishable." There is a marked distinction between the two sections. Section 267 makes the mere taking the offense, while the section under consideration makes the occupancy—that is to say, the procuring of a place actually occupied—the offense; and we think that the authorities cited in connection with section 267 have no application here.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 626*)—ORDINANCES—VALIDITY.

A municipal ordinance making it unlawful to construct any building to be used as a stable for horses or other animals without obtaining a permit from the board of supervisors and the board of health, and making it unlawful to maintain as a stable any existing structure not used as such at the date of the passage of the ordinance without obtaining such permit, is invalid, as improperly discriminating between structures used as a stable at the time of the passage of the ordinance and those not so used.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1380; Dec. Dig. § 626.*]

Application by Luigi Dondero for a writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner discharged.

Louis Ferrari, for petitioner. Leo C. Lennon, for respondent.

HALL, J. Upon application of petitioner a writ of habeas corpus was issued out of this court, to which a return has been made by the chief of police of the city and county of San Francisco. From the record thus made up it appears that the petitioner has been charged, convicted, and sentenced for violating section 197 of Ordinance No. 1008 (new series) of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco. It is not disputed but that the complaint is sufficient to charge an offense, if the section of the ordinance is valid. The only question to be determined by this court is as to the validity of the provision of the ordinance for the violation of which petitioner was convicted. The section is as follows: "Section 197. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation hereafter to construct any building or premises to be used as a stable for horses, mules, cows or other animals without first obtaining a permit from the board of supervisors and the board of health, specifying the name of the permittee and the location of building to be used as a stable, and the number of animals intended to be kept therein. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to maintain as a stable for horses or mules any existing structure not used at the date of the passage of this ordinance for stable purposes, without first obtaining a permit from the board of supervisors and board of health, specifying the name of the permittee, the location of the building or premises to be used as such, and the number of animals to be kept therein." Petitioner was charged with having constructed and maintained, at a time subsequent to the enactment of the ordinance, a stable for horses without first obtaining a permit from the board of supervisors and the board of health.

It is claimed by petitioner that the ordinance is invalid, first, because it makes the right to construct and maintain a stable dependent upon the permission of the boards of supervisors and health, which permits may be granted or withheld at the discretion of said boards, to be exercised upon each case; and, second, because it discriminates between stables in operation at the date of the passage of the ordinance and such as may be established and maintained thereafter.

As to the validity of ordinances which vest in certain municipal officer's the power at their discretion to grant permits to carry on such business or operations as are proper subjects of municipal regulation, the authorities are not uniform, as may be seen by an examination of the cases collected in the note to Elkhart v. Murray, reported in 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 940. It is said in Fischer v. St. Louis, 194 U. S. 361, 24 Sup. Ct. 673, 48 L. Ed. 1018, that the authority to delegate such discretion to a board for that purpose is sustained by the great weight of authority. We do not find it necessary to decide this point, for under the rule laid down in Ex parte Bohen, 115 Cal. 372, 47 Pac. 55, 36 L. R. A. 618, and followed and approved in Los Angeles v. Hollywood Cemetery Association, 124 Cal. 344, 57 Pac. 153, 71 Am. St. Rep. 75, the ordinance is invalid for the reason stated as the second ground of attack. It is plain that the purpose of the ordinance is to regulate the maintenance of stables. The mere erection of a building for stable purposes could not injuriously affect the community. It is the maintenance and operation of a stable that might injuriously affect the public health or otherwise create a nuisance; yet, under this ordinance, if a structure was being used as a stable at the enactment of the ordinance, no permit to maintain such stable in such structure is required, either of the board of supervisors or the board of health, while such permit is required to maintain a stable in any structure not so used at the time of the enactment of the ordinance.

These provisions bring this case clearly within the rule laid down in Ex parte Bohen, supra, where it was held that an ordinance, which assumed to prohibit the sale of cemetery lots for burial purposes and the burial of bodies therein, while permitting burials in lots already purchased for burial purposes, was discriminating in its operation between individuals similarly situated, and was for that reason unreasonable and invalid. The Bohen Case is approved and followed in Los Angeles v. Hollywood Cemetery Ass'n, supra. We cannot differentiate the case at bar from these cases and are bound to follow them. The case of Fischer v. St. Louis, 194 U. S. 363, 24 Sup. Ct. 673, 48 L. Ed. 1018, relied upon by respondent, does not touch upon the point decided by the two California cases above cited.

It is ordered that the petitioner be discharged, and the bail given by him to answer to the order of this court is exonerated.

BARTNETT v. HULL et ux. (Civ. 962.)
(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 17, 1912.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 167*)—APPEAL—DISMISSAL OF ACTION FOR WANT OF JURISDICTION.

Where, on an appeal from a judgment of a justice of the peace on the law and the facts, the defendant seasonably challenges the jurisdiction of the justice's court over the subject-matter of the action, if such want of jurisdiction appears on the face of the record, the superior court should dismiss the action for want of jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 647-651, 654; Dec. Dig. § 167.*]

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 44*)—PLEADING—COMPLAINT.

A complaint filed in justice's court consisted of a copy of a bill showing a balance due under date of November 21, 1905, of \$271, which was followed by an item reading: "Nov. 9, 1909, to 3 years 11 $\frac{3}{4}$ mos. interest due on note at 10%.....107.66." Held that, as \$107.66 was the correct amount of interest from November 21, 1905, to November 9, 1909, the complaint would not be construed as demanding the sum of \$107.66 as a part of the principal sum sued for, and hence as showing that the justice of the peace had no jurisdiction, especially where the parties and the justice of the peace apparently construed it as demanding \$271 and interest thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 157-172; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 192*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW.

Where a pleading is ambiguous, uncertain, or susceptible of two interpretations, and the parties have apparently adopted and acquiesced in one interpretation in the trial court, the losing party cannot insist, on appeal, that it should have been differently construed, since, if the uncertainty had been pointed out in the trial court, it could have been corrected by amendment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1221-1225; Dec. Dig. § 192.*]

4. COURTS (§ 212*)—JURISDICTION—SUPREME COURT.

Where a justice's court had jurisdiction of an action and the superior court had appellate jurisdiction, the Court of Appeal has no jurisdiction of an appeal from the superior court's judgment, except to dismiss the appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 511-516; Dec. Dig. § 212.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Action by D. G. Bartnett against J. F. Hull and wife brought in a justice's court, and tried de novo in the superior court. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Robert F. Bell, for appellants. J. E. Rodgers, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for plaintiff, rendered by the superior court, in the sum of $271, together with interest thereon at the legal rate to date of judgment, amounting to $97.20. The action was brought in the justice court, where it was tried upon the issues raised by the answer of defendant to the complaint. The justice of the peace rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the principal sum of $235.05, together with interest in the sum of $75.47. Defendants appealed to the superior court upon questions of law and fact.

Before the cause came on for trial in the superior court, defendants moved said court to dismiss the action upon the ground that neither the justice court nor the superior court had jurisdiction of the action, for the reason, as defendants claimed, that it appeared upon the face of plaintiff's complaint that the amount sued for exceeded the sum of $300, exclusive of interest. The motion was denied. Subsequently, when the cause was called for trial upon its merits, defendants renewed their motion, and it was again denied, and the court tried the cause upon its merits. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence defendants moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction for the same reasons as were urged upon the motion to dismiss.

[1] We believe the law to be that where, as in this case, a defendant, after appealing to the superior court upon questions of law and fact, seasonably challenges the jurisdiction of the court to try the action upon its merits, by reason of want of jurisdiction of the justice court over the subject-matter of the action appearing upon the face of the record, such defendant is entitled to a judgment or order dismissing the action for want of jurisdiction to try it upon its merits. Ballerino v. Bigelow, 90 Cal. 500, 27 Pac. 372; Hoban v. Ryan, 130 Cal. 97, 62 Pac. 296; Nolan v. Hentig, 138 Cal. 281, 71 Pac. 440; Poyser v. Murray, 6 Ind. 35; Darrell v. Biscoe, 94 Md. 684, 51 Atl. 410; Elder v. Dwight Co., 4 Gray (Mass.) 201; Berth v. McElvain, 41 Kan. 269, 20 Pac. 850; Hope v. Hurt, 59 Miss. 174; Barnett v. Railroad Co., 68 Mo. 56, 30 Am. Rep. 773; Ball v. Biggam, 43 Kan. 327, 23 Pac. 565; Shea v. Regan, 29 Mont. 309, 74 Pac. 737; Southern Ry. Co. v. Born Steel Range Co., 122 Ga. 658, 50 S. E. 488; McHenry v. Mays, 110 Ga. 299, 34 S. E. 1010; Missoula E. L. Co. v. Morgan, 13 Mont. 397, 34 Pac. 488. We therefore pass to the consideration of the contention that the complaint upon its face shows that the justice court did not have jurisdiction of the action for the reason that plaintiff sued for a sum amounting to $300 and over, exclusive of interest.

[2] The complaint filed in the justice court consisted of a copy of a bill, as is allowed in such courts, made up of various debit items under various dates, amounting to the sum of $362.50. There next followed several credits under various dates aggregating $91.50. The complaint or copy of the bill then concludes with the following entries:

Nov. 21, 1905, balance	$271 00
Nov. 9, 1909, to 3 years 11½ mos. interest due on note at 10%	107 66

It is claimed by appellants that it thus appears from the face of the complaint that the item under date of November 9, 1909, of $107.66 was claimed as a principal sum, and not as interest upon the balance of $271 sued for. We cannot agree with this contention. The most that can be fairly claimed is that the complaint is uncertain or ambiguous. No attack, however, was made in the justice court on this ground or any other. It does not appear that it ever occurred to defendants until after the cause had been appealed to the superior court that plaintiff had sued for a sum, exclusive of interest, in excess of $300.

It may be noted that the sum of $107.66, claimed as interest under date November 9, 1909, is the correct amount of interest at 10 per cent. upon $271, the balance stated under date of November 21, 1905, for the period between said dates, which period amounts to 3 years 11½ months. The words "due on note" in the item as to the interest suggests the idea that the amount of the balance sued for as the principal sum was also evidenced by a note. Nevertheless, the complaint is fairly and most reasonably susceptible of the interpretation that the interest claimed was interest on the identical sum of $271, constituting the balance of the principal sum claimed. That such was the interpretation put upon the complaint by defendants is manifest from the fact that they did not attack the jurisdiction of the justice court or the sufficiency of the complaint in such court by demurrer or otherwise. The same interpretation was put upon the complaint by the justice of the peace as is evidenced by the entry in his docket as to the amount of the demand, which is "Demand $271.00 and interest." The same interpretation of the complaint was followed by the plaintiff in his affidavit for an attachment, in which he set forth that defendants were indebted to him in the sum of $271, "together with interest thereon from Nov. 21, 1905, at the rate of 10% per annum," etc.

[3] Where, as in this case, a pleading is perhaps ambiguous and uncertain, or susceptible of two interpretations as to its meaning, and all parties to the action apparently adopt and acquiesce in an interpretation that sustains the jurisdiction of the court as to the subject-matter of the action, the losing party in such court should not be allowed upon appeal for the first time to insist upon a different interpretation of the pleading—one that will oust the court of its jurisdiction. If the uncertainty in the complaint had been pointed out in the justice court, it could have been readily amended so as to have certainly corrected the defect and placed the question of jurisdiction beyond cavil.

[4] We are therefore of the opinion that the record shows that the sum claimed in plaintiff's complaint, exclusive of interest thereon, did not amount to $300, and the justice court therefore had original jurisdiction of the action, and the superior court had appellate jurisdiction thereof to try the same upon its merits.

It follows that this court has no jurisdiction of this appeal other than to order a dismissal thereof, and this appeal is accordingly dismissed.

PEOPLE v. EARL. (Cr. 220.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 16, 1912.)

1. STATUTES (§ 217*)—CONSTRUCTION—INTENT OF LEGISLATURE.

The function of the courts in construing statutes is to give effect to the intent of the lawmakers, which may be ascertained from the history of the legislation and concurrent statutes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 293; Dec. Dig. § 217.*]

2. STATUTES (§ 181*)—CONSTRUCTION—EFFECT.

The fact that the enforcement of a statute according to its literal import will prohibit necessary and useful acts raises a presumption that it was not the intent of the Legislature to so operate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 259, 263; Dec. Dig. § 181.*]

3. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 79*)—OFFENSE INCIDENT TO OPERATION.

Pen. Code, § 619, provides that every person who willfully discloses the contents of a telegraphic or telephonic message addressed to another person without permission, unless directed to so do by an order of court, is punishable by imprisonment. Section 620 provides that every person who willfully alters the meaning of a telegraphic or telephonic message is punishable as provided in the preceding section. Section 621 provides that every person not connected with any telegraph or telephone office, who, without the authority or consent of the addressee, opens any sealed message with the purpose of learning its contents, is guilty of an offense. Held, that the offense denounced by the first section was that of disclosure by persons engaged in the transmission of messages, and not by ordinary individuals, who, through an innocent means, learned of their contents.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 22; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

4. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 110*)—SUFFICIENCY—WORDS OF STATUTE.

While ordinarily an indictment in the words of a statute is sufficient, it is not sufficient if the statute does not fully express the facts necessary to a complete offense, so that an indictment under Pen. Code, § 619, denouncing the offense of disclosing the contents of a telegraphic or telephonic message, though in the words of the statute, is insufficient if failing to show that the accused was in some way connected with the company transmitting the message.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 289-294; Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 304*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

The courts will not take judicial notice as to whether wireless is the only means of communicating with an island some distance from the coast line of the state.

6. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 79*)—OFFENSES INCIDENT TO OPERATION—INDICTMENT—CONSTRUCTION.

In a prosecution for an unauthorized disclosure of the contents of a telegraphic message, the bare allegation that the message was transmitted by the Union Wireless Telegraph Company is not an allegation of the means of transmission.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Edwin T. Earl was indicted for willfully disclosing the contents of a telegraphic message, and from an order sustaining a demurrer to the indictment the People appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., J. D. Fredericks, Dist. Atty., and G. Ray Horton, and Arthur Keetch, Deputy Dist. Attys., for the People. T. E. Gibbon, Anderson & Anderson, Edwin A. Meserve, and Shirley C. Ward, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This is an appeal taken by the people from a judgment entered for defendant on a demurrer to an indictment.

Defendant was indicted under the provisions of section 619 of the Penal Code, which provides as follows: "Every person who willfully discloses the contents of a telegraphic or telephonic message, or any part thereof, addressed to another person, without the permission of such person, unless directed so to do by the lawful order of a court, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years, or in the county jail not exceeding one year, or by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by both fine and imprisonment."

The indictment charged that on the 31st day of July, 1911, in the county of Los Angeles, a telegraphic message was transmitted by the Union Wireless Telegraph Company by means of its telegraphic apparatus to one F. F. Peard, from the city of Los Angeles, at Avalon, Catalina Island, which said telegram was signed by one Fenner H. Webb. The indictment then proceeds to charge as follows: "That the said Edwin T. Earl did then and there willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously print, publish, and cause to be printed and published the contents of said message in a certain newspaper, to wit, the Los Angeles Tribune, and which said newspaper was then and there printed, published, circulated, and distributed in said county to one D. J. Johnson and to the subscribers of said newspaper and to divers other persons (too numerous to mention and to the grand jury unknown and for that reason not herein specifically named), and that he, the said Edwin T. Earl, did then and there and thereby willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously disclose the contents of said telegraphic message to the said D. J. Johnson and to the subscribers of said newspaper and to divers other persons (too numerous to mention and to the grand jury unknown and for that reason not herein specifically named), without first having obtained the permission of said F. F. Peard, sometimes called and known as F. S. Peard, so to do, and without having first been directed so to do by the lawful order of a court." The indictment did not set forth how or in what manner defendant obtained knowledge of the contents of the telegraphic message, nor that he was connected in any way with the transmitting company, or that he had any duty to perform with respect to the transmission of the message. In the demurrer of defendant interposed to the indictment, the ground was assigned that sufficient facts were not charged to show that a public offense had been committed. In reviewing the ruling of the trial judge upon that question, it becomes necessary to examine the provisions of the section quoted, and to determine whether under the facts alleged the defendant is made to appear to be such a person as is punishable as therein declared.

[1] The function of the courts in construing statutes is not restricted to a view which shall give literal effect to every word and phrase appearing by the letter of the law. In that analysis reason must have its just proportion, and the intent of the law-makers is to be ascertained by taking into account several considerations, as the history of the legislation upon the subject treated, and concurrent legislation affecting the same or closely kindred subjects.

[2] The fact that the enforcement of a statute according to its literal import will have the effect of prohibiting otherwise necessary and useful acts may also furnish an entirely sufficient reason for concluding that the intent of its framers was not that it should so operate. Our Supreme Court, in Ex parte Lorenzen, 128 Cal. 431, 61 Pac. 68, 50 L. R. A. 55, 79 Am. St. Rep. 47, has declared the rule thus: "But for the more substantial objection that the ordinance by its terms would oppress and lead to the conviction of persons guilty of no fraudulent act it is to be remembered that the letter of a penal statute is not of controlling force, and that the courts, in construing such statutes, from very ancient times have sought for the essence and spirit of the law and decided in accordance with them, even against express language; and in so doing they have not found it necessary to overthrow the law, but have made it applicable to the class of persons or the kind of acts clearly contemplated within its scope." As an illustration, the old Bologna law, which provided in literal terms for the punishment of a person who should let blood in the streets and which was held not to apply to a barber performing the office of a surgeon, is given, among others. This expression of Mr. Justice Field, used in U.

S. v. Kirby, 7 Wall. 482, 19 L. Ed. 278, is also quoted: "All laws should receive a sensible construction. General terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to injustice or oppression or an absurd consequence. It will always be presumed that the Legislature intended exceptions to its language which would avoid results of this character. The reason of the law in such cases should prevail over its letter."

[3] With this preface we may proceed to examine the statute before us. Section 619 of the Penal Code, which we have quoted, is followed by two sections which deal with the same subject, and which provide as follows:

"Sec. 620. Every person who willfully alters the purport, effect, or meaning of a telegraphic or telephonic message to the injury of another, is punishable as provided in the preceding section.

"Sec. 621. Every person not connected with any telegraph or telephone office who, without the authority or consent of the person to whom the same may be directed, willfully opens any sealed envelope inclosing a telegraphic or telephonic message, addressed to another person, with the purpose of learning the contents of such message, or who fraudulently represents another person and thereby procures to be delivered to himself any telegraphic or telephonic message addressed to such other person, with the intent to use, destroy, or detain the same from the person entitled to receive such message, is punishable as provided in section six hundred and nineteen."

It will be noted that section 621 expressly provides that "every person not connected with any telegraph or telephone company" who, without authority in the way and for the purpose described, opens a telephonic or telegraphic message, is made punishable. It may be noted, also, that by this last section it is not made a crime for such a person to divulge the contents of a message so unlawfully opened. His offense consists in opening for the purpose of learning the contents of a telephonic or telegraphic message. If section 619 is to be given the effect which its language literally imports, then the sender of the message who discloses its contents, either before or after sending, and every person to whom he so discloses it, might in turn be guilty and subject to punishment by fine or imprisonment, or both. Taking the three sections to which we have referred alone, and considering the sense of the expressions used by the Legislature there in context, it appears very clear to us that the intent was, by the enactment of section 619, to preserve secrecy as to telegraphic messages only among all those who have a duty to perform with respect to the dispatch, transmission, or delivery thereof. Any other interpretation placed upon the provisions of that section would cause it to embrace every person who might obtain knowledge of the contents of any message, no matter how such contents might have been learned, or through however so many persons such information may have been communicated, as well as to include the sender of the message and the persons whom he might have informed of the contents of the message. To so hold, in our opinion, would be to give to the statute an unreasonable and absurd meaning. The history of the legislation upon the subject, as well as other sections of the Code, which we need not further refer to, support the view we have taken in our construction of the statute.

[4] Having reached the conclusion just expressed, we have then to examine the indictment to ascertain whether sufficient is there stated to constitute a good charge against the defendant. On this proposition it is urged on behalf of appellant that the charge is framed in the language of the statute, and that such form of pleading is sufficient under our practice. It is true that there are many decisions holding that a pleading in the language of the statute will be treated as a sufficient statement of the offense intended to be charged, but it is also true that to this holding there are exceptions. If the statute does not express fully the facts necessary to constitute a complete offense, then and in that case it will not be sufficient to frame the charge in the terms of the statute. We quote, as pertinent to this point from People v. Ammerman, 118 Cal. 23, 50 Pac. 15, where the writer of the decision says: "I do not understand that our court intends to hold that, where a fact must be stated in an information in order to charge an offense, it may be omitted from the information where the statute is silent as to that fact." We quote again from People v. Eppinger, 105 Cal. 36, 38 Pac. 538: "An indictment or information must contain matter which shows on its face that a crime has been committed by the accused. If the matters charged in the indictment or information are as consistent with the innocence of the accused as with his guilt, the presumption of his innocence will overcome the accusation of guilt, and the accused is not to be subjected to a trial of the charge." Again, it is stated in People v. Neil, 91 Cal. 465, 27 Pac. 760: "The information, as we have before stated, charges the offense in the language of the Code, and it is well settled under our system of pleading in criminal cases that this will generally be held to be sufficient; but, where the particular circumstances of the offense are necessary to constitute a complete offense, they should be stated and averred, and a failure to do so will vitiate the information or indictment." See, also, People v. McKenna, 81 Cal. 158, 22 Pac. 488; People v. Terrill, 127 Cal. 99, 59 Pac. 836; People v. Perales, 141 Cal. 581, 75 Pac. 170. In our opinion the demurrer to the indictment in this case was properly sustained.

[5] Some attention is given in the briefs

to the subject of wireless telegraphy, and the question is argued as to whether any of the statutes found in the Penal Code touching the matter of transmission of telegraphic or telephonic messages are applicable to the operation of the wireless telegraph. We do not think that that question is properly in this case at all. It is not disclosed by the indictment that the message was a wireless message, and we are not of opinion that judicial notice can be taken of the fact, if it be a fact, that the only method of telegraphic communication between Catalina Island and the mainland is that afforded by the wireless system.

[6] The mere allegation that the message was transmitted by the Union Wireless Telegraph Company is not a statement of the means of transmission. For aught that appears, this company may have used or employed other than a wireless system as the means of transmission. While we are of the opinion that those statutes apply to every method of telegraphic communication, any extended discussion upon that subject, for the reason we have stated, would constitute dicta merely.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 36*)—JURISDICTION—ACTIONS INVOLVING LAND TITLE.

An action to recover a deposit made under a contract to purchase land, based on claimed invalidity of the vendor's title, is an action involving title to land of which the superior court, and not the justice court, has original jurisdiction, under Const. art. 6, § 5.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by C. R. Bates against Francis Ferrier. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions to dismiss.

J. Rollin Fitch, for appellant. Gibson, Woolner & Conklin, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for plaintiff for the sum of $233.80, and was taken according to the method prescribed by sections 941a and 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The action was originally brought in the justice's court of the town of Berkeley, and by it the plaintiff, as appears from his complaint, sought to recover the sum of $200, and interest thereon, paid by him to defendant as a deposit on the purchase of a lot of land, under an agreement that the same should be repaid to plaintiff if the title to the land proved to be invalid. It is alleged in the complaint that the title to the land was not good and valid, in that the title of defendant thereto is burdened with certain building restrictions, which are set forth in the complaint. Defendant demurred to the complaint upon the grounds that the justice's court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the action, and that the complaint did not state a cause of action. This demurrer was overruled, and defendant filed an answer and cross-complaint. In his answer defendant admitted that the land was subject to the building restrictions as alleged in the complaint, but that plaintiff at the time of entering into the contract in writing to purchase said land did orally waive said restrictions as constituting a cloud upon the title to said land, and further denied that said title to said property was not good or valid by reason of said building restrictions or otherwise. By his cross-complaint defendant sought to recover of plaintiff $200 as damages for plaintiff's refusal to complete the purchase of the land. The pleadings were not verified. The trial before the justice of the peace resulted in a judgment for plaintiff for the amount sued for, and that defendant take nothing by reason of his cross-complaint. From this judgment defendant in due time took an appeal to the superior court "on questions of both law and fact."

Upon the calling of the action for trial in the superior court, defendant by his counsel gave notice that he appeared specially at the trial of said action, and objected to the court hearing or determining the action upon its merits, and moved the court to remand the cause to the justice's court with directions to sustain defendant's demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend. The objection and motion were made upon the grounds that the justice's court had no jurisdiction of the action, and that, therefore, the superior court acquired no appellate jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the action, and had no original jurisdiction over the person of the defendant. The objections and motion of defendant were denied, and exception taken by defendant, and the court proceeded to try the action upon its merits, and made findings and rendered judgment for plaintiff.

It is now contended that the judgment of the superior court must be reversed for want of jurisdiction to try the action upon its merits.

[1] As preliminary to a consideration of the question as to the jurisdiction of the superior court to try the action upon its merits, counsel on both sides have devoted considerable space in their briefs to a discussion of the question as to whether or not the action involved any question of title to real estate. Where, as in this case, the plaintiff founds his right of action upon an allegation that title to land agreed to be purchased by him is invalid, and according to his own pleadings seeks the return of a purchase deposit upon the ground of such invalidity, it is certain that title to land is necessarily involved in the action (Holman v. Taylor, 31 Cal. 338; Copertini v. Oppermann, 76 Cal. 181, 18 Pac. 256; Boyd v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 126 Cal. 572, 58 Pac. 1046; Hart v. Carnall-Hopkins Co., 103 Cal. 133, 37 Pac. 196; Dungan v. Clark, 159 Cal. 30, 112 Pac. 718), in which case, of course, original jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action is in the superior court and not in the justice court (article 6, § 5, Const. Cal.). Copertini v. Oppermann, supra, was an action to recover a purchase deposit of $200. The right to recover was founded, as in this action, upon the alleged defective title to the land, but the action was brought in the superior court. The jurisdiction of the superior court was attacked by demurrer to the complaint, and it was held that such court had original jurisdiction of the action. The case is decisive of the question of the original jurisdiction of an action such as is set forth in the complaint in the case at bar being in the superior court and not in the justice court.

[2] Respondent insists, however, that, even if the cause of action set forth in the complaint was not within the jurisdiction of the justice court, the superior court obtained jurisdiction to try the action upon its merits, because the defendant appealed to said court upon both questions of law and fact. In support of this contention, respondent cites a number of cases in which the right of the superior court to try a case, upon the merits, appealed to it, upon questions of law and fact, from a justice court which had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, has been sustained. The only ones that are at all pertinent are City of Santa Barbara v. Eldred, 95 Cal. 381, 30 Pac. 562; Hart v. Carnall-Hopkins Co., 101 Cal. 160, 35 Pac. 633; Hart v. Carnall-Hopkins Co., 103 Cal. 132, 37 Pac. 196; De Jarnatt v. Marquez, 132 Cal. 701, 64 Pac.

1090; Armantage v. Superior Court, 1 Cal. App. 130, 81 Pac. 1033; Van Dyke v. Rule, 49 Ohio St. 530, 31 N. E. 882, and Birks v. Houston, 63 Ill. 77, and cases cited therein.

In Armantage v. Superior Court it was not claimed that the justice court did not have jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and the case is not therefore in point upon the question in the case at bar. In none of the other cases cited did the appellant make any objection to the superior court trying the cause upon its merits, or in any way raise the question as to its jurisdiction so to do until after judgment in such court, except in the case of Hart v. Carnall-Hopkins Co., and in that case it did not appear from the record transmitted upon appeal to the superior court from the justice court that any question of possession or title to real property arose or was presented in the justice court, but for aught that the record showed such issue first arose upon the trial in the superior court, all of which is clearly pointed out in the opinion in the case reported in 103 Cal. 140, 141, 37 Pac. 196. In each of the other cases cited it is pointed out that the case was tried in the superior court upon its merits without objection by the appellant, and stress is laid upon such fact.

[3] Upon the other hand, the authorities are abundant, and, we believe, substantially uniform to the effect that, where the want of jurisdiction of the justice court appears upon the record transmitted from such court to the appellate court, an objection made by the appellant to the appellate court trying the case upon the merits is good if seasonably made. The following are but a few of such authorities: Poyser v. Murray, 6 Ind. 35; Darrell v. Biscoe, 94 Md. 684, 51 Atl. 410; Elder v. Dwight Co., 4 Gray (Mass.) 201; Berroth v. McElvain, 41 Kan. 269, 20 Pac. 850; Hope v. Hurt, 59 Miss. 174; Barnett v. Railroad Co., 68 Mo. 56, 65, 30 Am. Rep. 773; Ball v. Biggam, 43 Kan. 327, 23 Pac. 565; Shea v. Regan, 29 Mont. 309, 74 Pac. 737; Southern Ry. Co. v. Born Steel Range Co., 122 Ga. 658, 50 S. E. 488; McHenry v. Mays, 110 Ga. 299, 34 S. E. 1010; Missoula E. L. Co. v. Morgan, 13 Mont. 397, 34 Pac. 488. In Ballerino v. Bigelow, 90 Cal. 500, 27 Pac. 372, the complaint set forth a cause of action not within the jurisdiction of the justice court, and defendant appealed to the superior court upon questions of law and fact, where a trial de novo was had, resulting in judgment for plaintiff. The Supreme Court reversed the judgment and ordered "cause dismissed in the lower court for want of jurisdiction." The same course was pursued in Hoban v. Ryan, 130 Cal. 97, 62 Pac. 296, upon the authority of Ballerino v. Bigelow, supra, the complaint showing a want of jurisdiction in the justice court, which was raised by demurrer filed in the superior court. In the still later case of Nolan v. Hentig, 138 Cal. 281, 71 Pac. 440, the justice court had no jurisdiction, but "the cause was appealed to, and heard de novo in, the superior court without objection to the jurisdiction." The court said: "The judgment cannot now be questioned. De Jarnatt v. Marquez, 132 Cal. 700 [64 Pac. 1090]. In Hoban v. Ryan, 130 Cal. 96 [62 Pac. 296], relied on by appellants, there was a demurrer filed and urged in the superior court on the ground of want of jurisdiction. Had defendants in the present case done likewise Hoban v. Ryan would apply."

In the case at bar the defendant substantially did all that the defendant did in Hoban v. Ryan, and more, for he not only urged in an appropriate way before the superior court its want of jurisdiction because of the want of jurisdiction in the justice court, but he had raised the same question by his demurrer, filed in the justice court, to the complaint, and upon the superior court overruling his objection declined to put in evidence as to the facts (a matter which we have not heretofore mentioned). The rule laid down in Hoban v. Ryan should therefore control, and the superior court, when objection was made to its jurisdiction to try the cause, should have sustained such objection and dismissed the cause for want of jurisdiction. See, also, to the same effect, Null v. Superior Court, 4 Cal. App. 207, 87 Pac. 392, and Shealor v. Sup. Ct., 70 Cal. 564, 11 Pac. 653.

The judgment is reversed, and the superior court is directed to dismiss the action for want of jurisdiction.

HARDY v. SCHIRMER. (L. A. 2,880.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 3, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 499*)—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE—RECORD—GROUNDS OF OBJECTION.

An objection to the admission of evidence cannot be reviewed, where the record does not show the grounds of the objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2295-2299; Dec. Dig. § 499.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 118*)—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL.

Where, in an action for assault, it appeared that defendant struck plaintiff with a hammer and inflicted serious injury, and on the trial claimed he acted in self-defense, a statement by plaintiff's attorney that defendant had a powerful motive for stating that he struck in self-defense, because if he admitted that his act was not justified or in self-defense he would be liable to be prosecuted for a felony, which would be a penitentiary offense, was proper argument, and not objectionable as charging that defendant was in fact guilty of a felony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 290-293; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

3. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 40*)—EXCESSIVENESS—PERSONAL INJURIES—ASSAULT.

Defendant assaulted plaintiff by striking him twice with a hammer. Plaintiff's physician testified that his skull was fractured, and that other very severe injuries had been sustained. At the time of the trial, plaintiff, as the result of defendant's blows, was suffering from dizzy spells, which might affect him for a long period. Held, that a verdict for plaintiff for $1,900 was not excessive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. § 55; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

4. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 35*)—EVIDENCE.

In an action for assault, evidence held to sustain a verdict for plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. § 51; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 203*)—INSTRUCTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF—MATTERS ADMITTED.

Where defendant's answer admitted that he struck plaintiff as alleged, there was no necessity for giving, at defendant's request, a charge that before plaintiff could recover it was necessary for him to prove by a preponderance of the evidence all the material allegations of the complaint, that the defendant without any cause whatever, assaulted plaintiff and injured him by beating him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 477-479; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

6. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 26*)—BURDEN OF PROOF—SELF-DEFENSE.

Where defendant admitted striking plaintiff and pleaded self-defense, the burden was on defendant to establish such defense; there being no presumption that bodily injury is justified or justifiable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. § 36; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 255*)—INSTRUCTIONS—DUTY TO REQUEST.

It was not error for the court to omit to charge as to what constituted a preponderance of the evidence, in the absence of a request therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 627-641; Dec. Dig. § 255.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 216*)—OBJECTIONS NOT RAISED AT TRIAL.

Defendant cannot take advantage of the court's failure to give an instruction, defining a preponderance of the evidence, for the first time on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO CASE.

In an action for assault and battery, an instruction practically in the language of Civ. Code, § 3294, that the jury might give exemplary damages if defendant was "guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice," was not substantial error, as inapplicable to the evidence, since it was abstract, in so far as the word "fraud" was concerned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4220; Dec. Dig. § 1066.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon F. Moss, Judge.

Action by B. W. Hardy against R. I. Schirmer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Herald and W. W. Wideman, for appellant. W. J. Wood and Frank Karr (Charles Lantz, of counsel), for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This was an action brought by plaintiff for damages for personal injuries. Originally the wife of defendant was made a party to the action; but at the close of the testimony for the plaintiff the court granted defendant's motion for nonsuit as to her. The jury rendered a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $1,900, and from the judgment entered thereon, as well as the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, this appeal is taken.

The trouble resulting in the injuries to plaintiff occurred in a lodging house owned by defendant, who had just served on plaintiff's brother a notice to pay rent, or to vacate the premises within three days. After service of the notice, defendant went downstairs, secured a hammer, and, returning, was about to tack up in the hallway some cards containing the rules of the apartment house. Before this, however, he had some words with plaintiff's brother, who was in the kitchen, and the latter shut the door between the kitchen and the hall. At that moment, according to plaintiff's testimony, defendant applied a vile name to plaintiff's brother; whereupon plaintiff said: "There are others in the house." At that, as he testified, defendant turned and struck him with the hammer. He called for help; his brother and the latter's wife came to his assistance, and finally defendant was disarmed, but not until he had again struck plaintiff with the hammer. Defendant's account of the affair differed greatly from that given by plaintiff. He testified that both brothers set upon him, and that he only struck in self-defense.

[1] Defendant assigns as error the ruling of the court, whereby C. S. Hardy was permitted to testify regarding a conversation had with defendant's wife two or three weeks before the assault. According to C. S. Hardy's statement, Mr. Schirmer had called witness downstairs to the apartments occupied by defendant and his wife, and in her presence had asked Hardy if he knew who had caused his (Schirmer's) arrest for maintaining a cesspool. Then Mrs. Schirmer had said: "We are going to find out who had us arrested, and we will have revenge, if it takes 10 years." This was followed by further testimony that defendant subsequently expressed a strong belief that plaintiff had caused his arrest. The ruling admitting this testimony cannot be disturbed, because the record before us does not show the grounds for defendant's objection to its introduction. The record merely reveals the fact that objection was made to the admission of the testimony, and was by the court overruled. In the absence of specification of the grounds of objection, we cannot say that the ruling was injurious. Hughes v. Wheeler, 76 Cal. 234, 18 Pac. 386; Frank v. Penne, 117 Cal. 256, 49 Pac. 208.

[2] Appellant also assigns as error the conduct of the court in failing to instruct the jury to disregard certain remarks made by plaintiff's attorney. But the remarks of which complaint was made were not improper. There was a sharp conflict of testimony, and it became important to know who was telling the truth. In his argument to the jury, Mr. Karr said: "This defendant has a powerful motive for stating that he struck the plaintiff in self-defense; for if he should admit that he struck the plaintiff with a hammer, and it was not justified, or in self-defense, he would be liable to be prosecuted for a felony, and it would be a penitentiary offense." This was not a declaration (as defendant insists it was), that Schirmer was actually guilty of a felony. It was a statement—and a correct one—of facts that might make one guilty of a felony; but it did not, by any means, amount to a declaration that defendant was a felon. There was no error in refusing to strike out the language of the attorney for plaintiff.

Nor was there any error in permitting the reading to the jury, before their retirement, of a portion of the testimony of plaintiff. No objection was made to the re-reading of this testimony, and it is too late to specify error here for the first time.

[3] The damages allowed were not excessive. Plaintiff's physician testified that his patient's skull was fractured, and that other very severe injuries had been inflicted upon plaintiff. At the time of the trial, plaintiff, as a result of defendant's blows, was suffering from dizzy spells, which might afflict him for a long time. Under these circumstances, we cannot say that the amount awarded by way of damages was unreasonable.

[4] The verdict is sustained by the evidence. The jurors doubtless believed the testimony of plaintiff; and that testimony certainly showed a wanton and vengeful attack upon plaintiff.

[5-8] Appellant complains because the judge failed to instruct the jury, at appellant's request, as follows: "Before the plaintiff can recover, it is necessary for him to prove by a preponderance of the evidence all of the material allegations contained in his complaint, that the defendant, without any cause whatever, assaulted plaintiff and injured him by beating him." There was no reason for the giving of such an instruction in this case, because the defendant, by his answer, admitted striking plaintiff. The injury having been admitted, and the special defense of self-defense having been interposed, it became necessary for defendant to establish such defense by a preponderance of the evidence. There is no presumption that bodily injury is justified or justifiable. He who asserts the justification must prove it by a preponderance of evidence. Marriott v. Williams, 152 Cal. 710, 93 Pac. 875, 125 Am. St. Rep. 87. Appellant also complains that there was no instruction as to what constituted a preponderance of evidence. If such an instruction had been desired by defendant, it should have been presented to the court; but the record does not show that such a course was followed. Appellant cannot here, for the first time, take advantage of the court's failure to give such an instruction. People v. Northey, 77 Cal. 632, 19 Pac. 865, 20 Pac. 129.

[9] The court instructed the jurors practically in the language of the Civil Code (section 3294) that they might give exemplary damages if defendant was guilty of "oppression, fraud, or malice." It is argued that, as no fraud was shown, the instruction was not applicable. We do not see, however, how appellant was injured by this ruling. The leaving of the word "fraud" in the instruction did not constitute material error. An instruction upon a mere abstract proposition of law, not entirely applicable to the circumstances of the particular case, will not warrant reversal, where it is apparent that no injury resulted to the appellant therefrom. People v. Romero, 143 Cal. 459, 77 Pac. 163. The issues in this case were so simple that we cannot see how any juror could have harbored the idea that possible fraud was an element to be considered. No other alleged errors require notice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. EVIDENCE (§ 183*)—SECONDARY EVIDENCE—ABSTRACT OF TITLE—EXECUTION OF DEED.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1951, authorizing admission in evidence of the original record of an instrument affecting land, or a certified copy of such record, does not permit admission of an abstract of title to show execution of a deed, where the original record is destroyed, without proof of loss or destruction of or inability to produce the original deed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Isabella Dahler against all persons claiming any interest in or lien upon certain land. Judgment for plaintiff, and Carrie E. Bridge and others appeal. Affirmed.

Thos. E. Haven, for appellants. Alfred B. Weiler and Albert B. Harris, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. A hearing in bank was ordered after judgment of affirmance in department. After further consideration, we are entirely satisfied of the correctness of the views expressed by the department, and adopt the opinion of Henshaw, J., reading in substance as follows:

"This is an action to quiet title under the provisions of the McEnerney act. Plaintiff claimed title through her husband, who, in turn, deraigned title from the Market & Stanyan Streets & Golden Gate Park Land & Improvement Company. Appellants' contention in effect is that Henry M. G. Dahler, husband of plaintiff, had reconveyed the land in controversy to the Market & Stanyan Streets & Golden Gate Park Land & Improvement Company, and that, by mesne conveyance from the latter, title to this property vested in appellant Carrie E. Bridge. Henry M. G. Dahler testified that he had never made any deed of this property to the Market & Stanyan Streets & Golden Gate Park Land & Improvement Company. The point in controversy was whether in fact such a deed had been made by him subsequent to his taking the deed from the corporation and prior to the conveyance by him to his wife. Appellants sought to show by the record that such conveyance had been made, and it was conceded that, if the evidence offered by the appellants to this end were admissible, it would show that the record title to the property stood in appellants.

"To this end appellants showed that there was preserved from the conflagration of April 18, 1906, a general index book, an official record of the recorder's office, showing a deed from H. M. G. Dahler and wife to the Market & Stanyan Streets & Golden Gate Park Land & Improvement Company of October 26, 1894. The index, however, did not contain any description of the property affected by the deed. Harry Strehl was then called and testified that he was a searcher of records; that each day's duty was to abbreviate the documents recorded in the recorder's office and to furnish this breviate to Mr. Edwards, publisher of a paper known as 'Edwards Abstracts from Records'; and that he did so furnish correct breviate to Edwards for the latter's publication. He did not know whether the publications were or were not correct copies of the notes which he furnished, but did know that his notes or breviate were correct. Mr. Edwards, in turn, secretary and manager of the Edwards Publishing Company, testified to the reception of these breviate from Mr. Strehl and the publication of them by this company; that he read the proof in each instance, and saw that the publication was a correct reproduction of the notes furnished by Mr. Strehl. He was then asked, referring to his publication, 'whether or not on October 25, 1894, a deed was recorded in the office of the recorder of the city and county of San Francisco from H. M. G. Dahler and his wife to the Market & Stanyan Streets & Golden Gate Park Land & Improvement Company.' Objection was made and overruled, and the witness answered, 'Yes.' Other questions to the same purport were asked and the answers admitted over objection.

"H. P. Platt testified that he was the cashier of the California Title Insurance & Trust Company, which company had been in the business of examining titles, preparing abstracts, and issuing title insurance since 1884; that he was familiar with the records kept by that company; and that such company had an abstract which was prepared before the fire of April, 1906, showing the condition of the record title of the property in dispute as it existed on April 18, 1906. This abstract was offered in evidence; the court examining the witness in detail as to the character of the abstract and the method of its preparation. Portions of this abstract were then read, showing the record of the deeds from Dahler and wife to the Market & Stanyan Streets & Golden Gate Park Land & Improvement Company covering the property involved in the action. Subsequently the court struck out the testimony of Edwards and Platt and refused recognition of the abstracts as not being such as are contemplated by section 1855a of the Code of Civil Procedure, and gave judgment for plaintiff.

"A preliminary objection interposed and insisted upon by respondent to the introduction of much of this evidence was that it was absolutely inadmissible without proof of the loss or destruction of or inability to produce the original deeds, and that no such proof was made or offered to be made; respondent contending that, if such deeds ever had existence, they were forgeries. Appellants argue that they were entitled to introduce this evidence without proof of the loss or destruction of the original instruments, basing their argument upon the provisions of section 1951 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section declares in effect, (1) that every instrument affecting real property, duly acknowledged, may be read in evidence without further proof; (2) that the original record of such conveyance or instrument thus acknowledged may be so read in evidence without further proof; and (3) that a certified copy of the record of such conveyance or instrument may be so read in evidence with the like effect as the original instrument without further proof. The argument based upon this is that the Code recognizes three classes of evidence, each as primary, and each therefore as being entitled to consideration without proof of anything further in the background upon which it must lean for support. And, following the argument through its next step, as you may prove by secondary evidence the contents of a lost or destroyed instrument, because the instrument itself is the primary evidence, so, when the law has declared these three things to be primary evidence, you may prove the contents of any one of them by secondary evidence upon proof of the loss or destruction of the primary evidence; that, the recorded deeds being thus primary evidence of the second class above enumerated, one may make secondary proof of the contents of such an instrument after proof that the original record was destroyed, and that this proof was here made. This, we think, however, is carrying the language to an extreme that was never intended, for the same argument would make admissible secondary proof of the contents of a certified copy upon proof of the destruction of that certified copy, notwithstanding that the original instrument or the recorded instrument might still be in existence. The rule of section 1951 is itself a modification of the general rules of evidence requiring proof of loss or destruction or inability to produce.

[1] "It will not be unduly extended, and that the extension here claimed would be undue we think is manifest. As was said in Gloss v. Cessna, 207 Ill. 69, 69 N. E. 634: 'There was no evidence that the original deeds which appeared in the alleged abstract were lost or destroyed. * * * The act for registering title may be of a progressive nature, but not to the extent of abrogating the rules of evidence and permitting the introduction of abstracts without proper foundation being laid.'"

[2] It was proper to strike out the testimony of Edwards touching the making and existence of the deed from Dahler and wife to the Market & Stanyan Streets & Golden Gate Park Land & Improvement Company. Without regard to the validity of other objections interposed, this testimony was properly excluded on the ground that it purported to give the contents of deeds without proof of the loss or destruction of the originals.

"Platt's testimony and the abstracts which accompanied it were offered as evidence in conformity with section 1855a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[3] "The purpose of section 1855a is to enable a person to prove the contents of a lost or destroyed document and to derain his title to land through the secondary evidence afforded by certain transcripts or abstracts from the original recorded documents after proof made of the destruction of such documents. The abstracts of the California Title Insurance & Trust Company were compiled from the public records from day to day, and, since a part of the business of the company was the insurance of titles, it may be taken for granted that its compilations were made with the utmost exactitude and care. The presentation of such an abstract so made, before the calamity and showing the condition of any title at the time of the calamity, is secondary evidence of the highest dignity and character. The Legislature might well have made provision for its general admission to supply the hiatus caused by lost or destroyed records. It could well have done this without preliminary proof from the authors of the abstracts and breviate that they were correct transcriptions. It might well have permitted the introduction in evidence of an abstract made from such abstract after the calamity, and certified to after the calamity as being correct. These modifications of the general rules of evidence to meet the exigencies presented by such a disaster would not be regarded as unreasonable, but the Legislature has not seen fit to do this thing. It has made a much narrower departure from the general rules of evidence. In effect, it has declared that such an abstract only, if made, certified to, and issued before the destruction, shall be received in evidence without further proof than that it was prepared and made in the ordinary course of business prior to such loss or destruction. The abstracts here presented, we repeat, are of equal dignity with those which this section permits to be used in evidence, and, if anything, they are of even higher quality since they represent the originals from which the abstract which is certified and issued to the client is prepared. They are thus one step nearer to the original documents themselves. But nevertheless the Legislature has seen fit to limit the introduction of such evidence only to abstracts certified to and issued in the ordinary course of business prior to the loss or destruction, and it is not for this court to extend the rule. Thus, not measuring up to the requirements of section 1855a, the court was right in excluding from consideration the evidence of Platt and of the abstracts, since first there was no proof of the loss or destruction or inability to produce the original documents which would justify the introduction of secondary evidence as to their contents, and, second, there was no evidence from the makers of the abstracts showing the correctness of their transcripts as the foundation for the admission of secondary evidence of their contents.

"Plaintiff showed sufficient possession of the property through her grantors. Botsford v. Eyraud, 148 Cal. 431 [83 Pac. 1008]."

It is suggested by the appellants that, since the filing of the opinion in department, section 1855a has been amended (Stats. Extra Session 1911, p. 64) in such manner as to authorize the introduction in evidence of the abstracts offered. Whether or not a judgment should be reversed for the exclusion of evidence which was inadmissible under the law in force at the time of trial is a question that need not be decided here, for the reason that the appellants would not be helped by a resort to the section as amended, assuming it to be applicable. The section in its present form provides that "no proof of the loss of the original document or instrument shall be required other than the fact that the same is not known to the party desiring to prove its contents to be in existence." This, in effect, requires the party undertaking, under section 1855a, to show the contents of an instrument by means of an abstract, to prove that he does not know of the existence of the original instrument. No such proof was offered here.

The order denying appellants' motion for a new trial is affirmed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 612*)—RECORD—CERTIFICATION.

The new method of preparing records on appeal provided by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a, 953b, 953c, does not require or authorize the judge to certify to the correctness of any papers except such as form part of the transcript designed to take the place of a bill of exceptions, and hence a record is insufficient on appeal from the judgment, where the judgment roll and notice of appeal, which papers under the old method would not properly be part of the bill of exceptions, were not certified to by the clerk or the attorney, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 953.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2694-2701; Dec. Dig. § 612.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 598*)—RECORD—TRANSCRIPT—ORIGINAL OR COPIES.

Originals of the judgment roll and notice of appeal should remain on file in the office of the clerk of the superior court, and not be sent up to the reviewing court; but, where a transcript of the testimony, certified by the judge, is used in place of a bill of exceptions, the original and not a copy should be sent up.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 616*)—RECORD—REVIEW.

Where all papers necessary to a consideration of an appeal from an order denying a new trial are contained in the transcript and certified to by the judge, the record, though not certified to by the clerk, is sufficient to authorize a determination on its merits of the appeal from such order.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County.

Action by Ulrich Knoch and another against John Hazlip and others. From judgment for defendants and order denying new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Leave given to present a proper record.

Edward Judson Brown, for appellants. Hester, Merrill & Craig and Jones & Weller, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Appeals by plaintiffs from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial were submitted for decision on April 18, 1912. The respondents in their brief ask that the appeals be dismissed for failure of the appellants to "furnish the requisite papers." Code Civ. Proc. § 954.

[1] There is on file a record, made up in compliance, or attempted compliance, with the new method provided by sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure. It contains copies of the pleadings, the findings of fact and conclusions of law, the judgment, the notice of intention to move for a new trial, the order denying said motion, the notice of appeal from the judgment and order, as well as a transcript of the testimony taken at the trial, with copies of the exhibits. All of these papers are bound together in a single volume of typewritten matter, and are certified to be correct by the judge of the court below. There is no certification by the clerk.

The new method of preparing records on appeal does not require or authorize the judge to certify to the correctness of any papers except such as form part of a transcript designed to take the place of a bill of exceptions. Christensen Lumber Co. v. Seawell, 157 Cal. 405, 108 Pac. 276. It would seem to follow that papers which under the old method would not properly be a part of such bill are still to be certified by the clerk or the attorneys, as provided by section 953.

[2] Such papers include, on an appeal from the judgment, the judgment roll and the notice of appeal. Section 950. With respect to these papers, the main effect of the new method seems to be to permit the use of typewritten, instead of printed, copies. Section 953c. We fully agree with the view expressed by the District Court of Appeal in Waterbury v. Temescal Water Co., 11 Cal. App. 632, 105 Pac. 940, that the originals of this class of papers should remain on file in the office of the clerk of the superior court, and not be sent up to the reviewing court.

[3] Different considerations apply to the transcript of testimony, etc., prepared in lieu of a bill of exceptions, and certified by the judge. The statute evidently contemplates that the original, rather than a copy, of such transcript, should be transmitted to the court in which the appeal is to be heard, and the only certification required is that of the judge. Where the order appealed from is not included in a judgment roll (as, for example, an order granting or denying a motion for new trial), the parties may have inserted in the transcript any of the pleadings, papers, records, and files in the cause and the same when so incorporated shall be "deemed fully authentic for use on said appeal." Inasmuch as the appellants have had inserted in the transcript all the papers necessary to a consideration of their appeal from the order denying a new trial, the record filed authorizes a determination of this appeal on the merits.

There is, however, no sufficient record on the appeal from the judgment. Many of the points raised by appellants are not available on an appeal from the order, but may be considered on the appeal from the judgment alone. As the record now stands, a decision of the cause would require us to disregard or to dismiss the appeal from the judgment. This we think should not be done. There has been much uncertainty and doubt among the members of the bar concerning the procedure under the new sections, and the correct practice can hardly be said to have been settled by our decisions heretofore. It would, therefore, work an unjustifiable hardship to deprive an appellant of the benefit of an appeal where, as here, he has, in evident good faith, attempted to comply with the statute. Furthermore, it may be questioned whether under section 953c, the duty of transmitting a proper record is not, where the new method is followed, imposed, in the first instance, upon the clerk of the court below.

Under these circumstances, we shall not, at this time, dismiss the appeal from the judgment. The record being incomplete, the appellants are granted leave to withdraw the transcript from the files, and to refile such transcript, with copies of the judgment roll and the notice of appeal from the judgment, duly certified by the clerk of the superior court, or by the attorneys, within 30 days. In the event of a failure to thus present a proper record, the appeal from the judgment will be dismissed, and the appeal from the order denying a new trial disposed of on its merits.

(L. A. 2,585.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 18, 1912.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 138*)—WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY—AGENCY OF HUSBAND.

A deed to their daughter by the owner of a lot, in which the owner's husband joined, wherein the grantors reserved "the right to the use, control and proceeds of the property during their lives, or the life of either of them," did not authorize the husband during the lifetime of his wife, and without her consent, to bind her by an agreement to leave vacant for light a strip off one side of the lot.

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 136*)—AGENT'S LACK OF AUTHORITY—LIABILITY OF AGENT.

Where the professed agent of the owners of a lot, contracted in his own name and for "parties interested with him" with an adjoining owner that a strip would be left vacant on one side of the lot for light, he was personally liable for a breach of such contract, though he was not authorized by the owners of the lot to make such agreement.

3. EASEMENTS (§ 12*)—CONTRACT—VALIDITY.

An agreement respecting adjoining lots that each of the parties should give a certain frontage for the purpose of light was not so vague and indefinite, nor so insufficient for want of designation of the grantee, that it could not be the basis of an action for its breach.

5. CONTRACTS (§ 57*)—CONSIDERATION—MUTUAL PROMISES.

Where two parties agreed that two adjoining strips off the sides of adjoining lots should be left vacant for light, their mutual covenants afforded a consideration sufficient to bind both.

6. CONTRACTS (§ 52*)—CONSIDERATION—"DET- RIMENT."

To bind the party who breached the contract, it was a sufficient consideration for a contract to leave two adjoining strips vacant for light that the other parties to the contract constructed a building in accordance with it in such manner as to render valueless the strip left by them; this being a detriment which they were not "lawfully bound to suffer," within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 1605, providing what shall be a good consideration.

8. TRIAL (§ 397*)—FINDINGS—NECESSITY.

Where, in an action for breach of a contract, the amount of damages was put in issue and was material, failure to find thereon is error.

10. EASEMENTS (§ 12*)—CONTRACT—ACTION FOR BREACH—DEFENSE.

In an action for breach of a contract that two adjoining narrow strips of land should be left vacant for the purpose of light, it was no defense that the contracting plaintiff was not the legal owner of the lot as to which he contracted where he owned an equity and the owner of the legal title joined him as plaintiff.

11. ESTOPPEL (§ 78*)—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL —RECITAL IN CONTRACT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 2, providing that the presumption of the truth of the facts recited in an agreement is conclusive between the parties thereto, a party to a contract to leave strips off lots vacant for light was estopped, in an action for its breach to deny the truth of a recital in the contract that the other contracting party was owner of "adjoining lots."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 204-210; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

12. DAMAGES (§ 120*)—CONTRACT—BREACH— MEASURE.

Where one of the parties to a contract to leave adjoining strips off lots vacant for light breached the contract, the measure of damages to the other party, under Civ. Code, § 3300, providing that the measure of damages for the breach of a contract shall be such amount as will compensate the party aggrieved, was the difference between the value of their adjoining property if the agreement had been performed and its value under the existing conditions.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by Ulrich Knoch and another against John Hazlip and others. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

See, also, 124 Pac. 997.

Hester, Merrill & Craig, for appellants. Edward Judson Brown (Jones & Weller, of counsel), for respondents.

SLOSS, J. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The complaint presents two counts, one for the breach of an agreement under which, as the plaintiffs claim, they became entitled to an easement for light over the lands of the defendants, and the second to recover damages from the defendants for alleged fraud in connection with the making of said agreement. The findings of the court were against the allegations of fraud, and, as these findings are fully sustained by the evidence, there is no occasion to further consider this cause of action.

Most of the allegations of the first count are sustained by the findings of the court which are substantially as follows: On the 29th day of January, 1910, plaintiff Hooper owned the legal title to lots 5 and 6 in block 2 of the Orchard tract in the city of Los Angeles, and plaintiff Knoch held an equity in said lands under an agreement with Hooper for the purchase thereof. The plaintiffs were preparing to erect a three-story brick business block upon said lots 5 and 6 to be occupied by Knoch as a printing house.

On the day mentioned Knoch and the defendant John Haizlip executed a writing reading as follows:

"Ulrich Knoch agrees to give one foot frontage extending on the east side of his lots 5 and 6, in block two (2), in the Orchard tract in the city and county of Los Angeles, state of California, for purposes of light, providing that John Haizlip or parties interested with him in the ownership of the adjoining property on the east, will give two and one-half feet of land for the same purpose. Los Angeles, Calif., January 29, 1910. [Signed] Ulrich Knoch.

"John Haizlip and parties interested with him agree to give two and one-half feet of land on the west side of lot A, blk. 2 in the Orchard tract, in the city and county of Los Angeles, state of California, for the purpose of light, providing that Ulrich Knoch, owner of adjoining lots, give one foot of land for the same purpose. Los Angeles, Calif., January 29, 1910. [Signed] John Haizlip."

On said January 29, 1910, the defendant Laura C. Janes had the legal title to said lot A of block 2 of the Orchard tract under a deed of conveyance thereof to her by Laura Ann Haizlip executed and recorded more than five years theretofore by which deed it was provided that said Laura Ann Haizlip reserved the right to the use and occupation of said lot during her lifetime. It was found that on January 29, 1910, Laura Ann Haizlip was not the legal owner of said lot, and that neither the defendant John Haizlip nor the defendant Loren L. Janes had any title to or interest in the said lot, except as husbands, respectively, of Mrs. Haizlip and Mrs. Janes. It is found that defendant John Haizlip was not at any time authorized by any of the codefendants to execute said writing in their behalf. About the 24th day of February, 1910, the plaintiff Knoch commenced the erection of a three-story brick building upon said lots 5 and 6, setting the eastern wall thereof one foot westerly from the eastern line of said lots, and placed windows and a door therein for the purposes of light and air to said building, and afterwards completed said building. About April 11, 1910, defendant Laura C. Janes began and afterwards completed the erection of a two-story brick building on said lot A, setting the westerly wall thereof in and along the line between said lot A and plaintiffs' lots 5 and 6, but not $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet therefrom. It is found that the westerly wall of said building on said lot A obstructs to some degree the light of the first and second floors of the plaintiffs' building, that the value of said lots 5 and 6 and of the said building thereon has been materially diminished by the erection of said building on said lot A, and the said one foot of ground upon and along the easterly side of lots 5 and 6 has been thereby rendered valueless. There is also a finding to the effect that the defendant John Haizlip did not receive any consideration for the execution of the writing by him.

[1] Since the defendants other than Haizlip did not join in the making of the agreement, it is apparent that the plaintiff could have no cause of action against them without establishing that they had authorized Haizlip to make the agreement on their behalf. The finding is that there was no such authority, and this finding is not included among those specified by plaintiffs as unsupported by the evidence. The appellants seek, however, to overthrow it indirectly by an attack upon the further finding that John Haizlip had no title to or interest in the lot other than as husband of Laura Ann Haizlip. It is claimed that this latter finding is contrary to a stipulation, made during the trial, to the effect that in 1903 Laura Ann Haizlip, who was then the owner of the lot, joined with her husband in a deed to their daughter Laura C. Haizlip (now Laura C. Janes, one of the defendants herein), which deed contained a proviso reserving to the grantors "the right to the use, control and proceeds of the property during their lives or the life of either of them." We are unable to see any inconsistency between these two findings. Whether the latter one, relating to Haizlip's want of title, be right or wrong, the finding that he had no authority to bind the other defendants would still stand as an insupportable obstacle to any recovery against them. Furthermore, even if the court had made a finding in the exact words of the stipulation, such finding would have afforded no support for a judgment against any one but John Haizlip. Assuming that the reservation was valid in favor of John Haizlip, who was a stranger to the title, it could not vest in him the power to affect any interest but his own. It did not authorize him during the lifetime of his wife, and without her consent, to execute any writing which would create a lien or an easement as against her interest. If the clause reserving the right to the "control of the property" could be construed so broadly as to permit the making of an agreement like the one here in question, such right was reserved to Haizlip and his wife jointly, and neither was thereby vested with the power of acting for the other. The appellant can point to nothing in the record, beyond the stipulation referred to, to overcome the finding that Haizlip was without authority to bind his codefendants. As we have seen, the stipulation cannot be given such effect, and the judgment in favor of the codefendants must accordingly stand.

[2] But Haizlip himself is not relieved from liability upon his own undertaking merely because the codefendants for whom he assumed to act were not bound. "If the professed agent contracts in his own name he is, of course, personally liable upon the contract." Tiffany on Agency, 369.

[3] One of the points strongly relied upon by the respondents is that the agreement itself is too vague and indefinite to afford a basis for recovery. By the agreement each of the parties agrees to "give" a certain frontage "for the purpose of light." It is argued that this constitutes an undertaking to make grants of real property, and, as such, is insufficient for want of designation of a grantee. But we think this objection is not tenable. The writing is not the product of a skilled draughtsman's pen. But, though not worded with technical accuracy, it still, when read in the light of the surrounding circumstances, plainly discloses the intent of the parties. The two parcels of land affected were adjoining lots fronting upon the same street. Their dividing line ran north and south, constituting the east line of lots 5 and 6 and the west line of lot A. The plaintiffs were contemplating the erection of a building. Under these circumstances, the expression that each of the parties would give, respectively, "one foot frontage extending on the east side of lots 5 and 6" and "two and one-half feet of land on the west side of lot A" (in each instance for purposes of light), would, according to the ordinary significance of the words, be taken to mean just what the appellants contend it means; that is, that the space thus to be "given" by each of the parties was to be left vacant to the end that mutual easements of light for the two parcels should exist in the $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet thus to be left uncovered by any building. There can be no serious doubt as to the identity of the land described by the expression "one foot frontage extending on the east side of his lots 5 and 6." Clearly this designates the strip of land one foot in width along the length of the said east side, and a similar meaning is the natural one to be attributed to the words "two and one-half feet of land on the west side of lot A" used in the second part of the agreement. If, then, the plaintiffs had a contract binding upon the defendant John Haizlip whereby, in consideration of plaintiffs' leaving unoccupied one foot of their land, they were to have an easement of light over two and one-half feet of the adjoining lot, it would seem obvious, even without any finding to that effect, that damage would ensue to the plaintiffs from a breach of such agreement. But here the court did make an express finding as above stated, that the value of said lots 5 and 6 and of the building thereon has been materially diminished by the erection of said building on lot A and that the one foot of ground left vacant by plaintiffs has been thereby rendered valueless. The plaintiffs having complied with the agreement on their part, and said agreement having been broken to the damage of plaintiffs, we are unable to see why a judgment for such damages as may have been suffered should not be rendered against the defendant John Haizlip.

[4-6] The only finding which would seem to authorize the judgment in favor of this defendant is one that he "did not receive any consideration for the execution of said writing so executed by him." This finding must be disregarded as entirely without the issues. Besides, it is in conflict with the undisputed evidence. The mutual covenants on the part of Knoch and Haizlip to grant the respective easements afforded a consideration sufficient to bind both. Also the construction by plaintiffs of their building in accordance with the agreement in such manner as to render valueless one foot of their ground was certainly a detriment which they were not "lawfully bound to suffer" and this constituted an ample consideration for any promise based thereon. Civ. Code, § 1605.

[7] While the court found that the plaintiffs had suffered damage, it failed to find the amount of the damage. Even without any finding of the amount, the plaintiffs were entitled to nominal damages, and the conclusions of law and judgment in favor of Haizlip were erroneous in this respect.

[8] Furthermore, it was error to fail to find the amount of damage. This was put in issue by the pleadings, and the issue thus raised was clearly material. A failure to find on material issues renders the decision one "against law." Knight v. Roche, 56 Cal. 15; Swift v. O. M. Co., 141 Cal. 161, 74 Pac. 700; Kaiser v. Dalto, 140 Cal. 167, 73 Pac. 828, and cases cited.

[9] This was one of the grounds stated in the notice of intention to move for a new trial. It is said, in Kaiser v. Dalto, supra, that the moving party must, in some form, specify the particular issues on which findings were omitted. But this declaration was not necessary to the decision, and is based upon the citation of an authority (Haight v. Tryon, 112 Cal. 6, 44 Pac. 318) which does not support it. All that was held in Haight v. Tryon was that a party relying upon a failure to find must make his motion for new trial on the ground that the decision is "against law." We find nothing in the Code requiring any further specification. Where a finding is assailed as unsupported by the evidence, there must be specifications of insufficiency (Code Civ. Proc., §§ 648, 659), and, where a motion for new trial is made on a statement (section 659, subd. 3), or on the minutes of the court (section 659, subd. 4), errors of law relied upon must be specified. In the absence of any similar provision regarding a claim that the decision is "against law," we see no ground for holding that any specification of issues not found is called for.

[10, 11] The respondent Haizlip contends that there should be no judgment against him because Knoch was not the owner of the legal title to lots 5 and 6, and therefore could not carry out any agreement to create an easement in said lots. Civ. Code, § 804. But it is found that Knoch did own an equity, and the complaint alleges that Hooper, the owner of the legal title, authorized the making of the contract in his behalf. Even if there had been no antecedent authority, Hooper, by joining as plaintiff in the action, has clearly ratified the agreement. Furthermore, it is found that the plaintiffs (i. e., Knoch and Hooper) did erect a building on lots 5 and 6 in compliance with the agreement. The benefit for which Haizlip contracted has, therefore, been conferred on lot A, and it does not lie in this defendant's mouth to say that the agreement was one which Knoch could not carry out. A further answer to the point is that the agreement signed by Haizlip describes Knoch as "owner of adjoining lots." This is a recital which, in an action between the parties to the agreement, Haizlip is estopped to deny. Code Civ. Proc., § 1962, subd. 2.

[12] It may be well, as guide to further proceedings in the court below, to indicate our view of the proper measure of damages. The court below seems, after some discussion, to have taken the position that the damages, if the plaintiffs had a right to recover, were to be measured by the difference between the value of their property if the agreement had been performed and its value under the existing conditions. This conclusion we think is correct and in accordance with the rule declared in section 3300 of the Civil Code. If the action against John Haizlip be viewed as one for the breach of an implied warranty of authority, the measure of damages would be the same. Tiffany on Agency, p. 573.

Under the views expressed, it becomes unnecessary to consider any other points made by the appellants.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for new trial are reversed, so far as they are in favor of the defendant John Haizlip; so far as they affect the other defendants, they are affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon F. Moss, Judge.

Action by Theodore Rimpau and others against E. J. Baldwin and others. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

Munson & Barclay, for appellants. Bradner W. Lee and Hatch & Lloyd, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiffs sued to quiet their title to 18.29 acres of land. The defendants, in their answer, denied plaintiffs' title and alleged that E. J. Baldwin is the owner in fee of the land. The defense of the statute of limitations was also pleaded. As a further defense, the defendants averred facts showing that the dispute concerning the land is in fact a dispute in regard to the location of the boundary line between plaintiffs' land and Baldwin's land adjoining plaintiffs on the south, and that more than 20 years before the action was begun said division line was established and located on the ground by the respective owners; that each party had ever since claimed and occupied up to the line so established; that plaintiffs had ever since acquiesced in the line so established; and that, according to this location, the land in controversy was not claimed by plaintiffs, and did not belong to them. The court found in favor of the defendants on all the issues, including a finding that Baldwin had acquired title to the land by adverse possession. Judgment was given accordingly. Baldwin having died, his representatives have been substituted as parties.

The plaintiffs have appealed from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. It is conceded that the answer states good defenses, and that the findings support the judgment. As grounds for reversal, the plaintiffs rely solely on the claim that the evidence does not support the findings.

The question presented for determination was the location of the southern boundary line of plaintiffs' land. They claim that it is, by law and in fact, situated far enough to the south of the location claimed by defendants to include between their side lines the 18.29 acres in controversy. It concerns the location of the common boundary line of the rancho Las Cienagas on the north, of which plaintiffs' land is a part, and the rancho La Cienega O'Paso de la Tijera on the south; the latter ranch being owned by Baldwin. The most that can be said in favor of the appellants is that the evidence is conflicting upon each issue. If there is enough evidence to justify the finding as to any one of the defenses alleged, the judgment and order would be affirmed, although it might be insufficient to support some one, or any, of the others. We cannot weigh conflicting evidence and determine according to the preponderance. That function devolves upon the trial court alone. A perusal of the record shows that there is sufficient evidence to sustain each finding. No benefit can be derived from recording here a discussion of it in detail. The appeal cannot be sustained.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by Joanna O'Meara against Sam Hables. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

P. L. Benjamin, for appellant. Stafford & Stafford, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In the justices' court of the city and county of San Francisco, plaintiff sued defendant to recover the sum of $210, which, it was alleged, was due for rental of certain premises. The complaint charged in several counts. In the first, it was alleged that defendant has "occupied said premises for several years past, and has paid no rent to said plaintiff since May 1, 1909." In the third count, it was charged that defendant was the assignee of a lease of the premises made by plaintiff to one John Doe Creely, and that said defendant entered under the assigned lease, and "has had possession of said premises ever since said time."

Trial was had in the justices' court, and resulted in a judgment in favor of defendant, from which judgment he appealed to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco upon questions both of law and of fact. The trial de novo in the superior court resulted in a judgment for plaintiff in the amount sued named. Defendant has taken an appeal from that judgment to this court. Respondent here moves to dismiss it for lack of jurisdiction in this court to entertain it.

[1, 2] The motion must be granted. The Constitution (article 6, § 5) declares that the "superior court shall have original jurisdiction in all cases of equity and in all cases at law which involve the title or possession of real property." By section 4 of the same article, it is declared that this court "shall have appellate jurisdiction on appeal from the superior courts in all cases of equity, except such as arise in the justices' courts; also in all cases of law which involve the title or possession of real estate." Section 964 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides for the taking of an appeal from a judgment of the superior court rendered on an appeal from the justices' courts "in all cases involving the title or possession of real property."

The Legislature has made no attempt to confer jurisdiction upon justices' courts in actions involving the possession of real property (Code Civ. Proc. § 112), but, to the contrary, has provided that parties to an action in a justices' court cannot give evidence upon any question which involves the title or possession of real property. Code Civ. Proc. § 838. But this means, under all the decisions of this court, and from the association of words in the constitutional provision, such a possession of real property as has relation to title, or is necessary to the enforcement or defeat of the cause of action asserted. These propositions are illustrated by such cases as Holman v. Taylor, 31 Cal. 338; Copertini v. Oppermann, 76 Cal. 185, 18 Pac. 256; Hart v. Carnall-Hopkins Co., 101 Cal. 162, 35 Pac. 633; Boyd v. Southern California Ry. Co., 126 Cal. 573, 58 Pac. 1046. From these and like cases, the meaning of the Constitution and of the Code sections may readily be discovered. The possession here contemplated is, as we have said, either a possession akin to title, as in ejectment, trespass, or title by adverse possession, where possession is of the essence of the right sought to be established, or it is a possession which, for some other good reason, becomes a direct and material fact and issue in the case, "upon which the plaintiff relies for a recovery, or the defendant for a defense." Holman v. Taylor, supra.

[3] This action is an action at law to recover a specific sum of money as rent under a lease. The allegation that defendant had occupied the premises or had possession of them during the period when the rent accrued was unnecessary to the cause of action. No right of possession is here involved, and no possession is made the foundation for the establishment of any other right.

It follows therefrom, as above said, that the motion is well taken, and is therefore granted.

The appeal is dismissed.

BEATTY, C. J., does not participate in the foregoing.

BRAY v. LOWERY. (S. F. 5,773.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 29, 1912.
Rehearing Denied July 29, 1912.)

1. SALES (§ 481*)—CONDITIONAL SALE—BUYER'S DEFAULT—RIGHTS OF SELLER.

A defaulting buyer in a contract for a conditional sale of personal property may not usually demand the return of the moneys paid on account of the sale when the seller repossesses himself of the property because of the buyer's default.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 1451; Dec. Dig. § 481.*]

2. SALES (§ 481*)—CONDITIONAL SALES—CONTRACT—BREACH—"FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION."

Where a conditional seller of automobiles resumed possession for the buyer's alleged failure to pay the installments required, but in fact before the buyer was in default under the contract, the seller's act constituted a repudiation of the agreement, amounting to a failure of consideration within Civ. Code, § 1689, providing that a party may rescind a contract for failure of consideration either in whole or in part.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1449-1455; Dec. Dig. § 481.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3. p. 2647.]

3. PLEADING (§ 252*)—AMENDMENT—COMPLAINT.

Where a demurrer to a complaint was sustained, and an amended complaint filed on which the case was tried, the original complaint passed out of the case, and could not be considered for any purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 736-743; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1058*)—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

Any error in the sustaining of an objection to a question to plaintiff on cross-examination whether he kept accurate books of account was cured by the court permitting counsel to examine plaintiff at length regarding his expenditures, so that whether the books were correct or not must have been developed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4195, 4200-4206; Dec. Dig. § 1058.*]

5. SALES (§ 481*)—CONDITIONAL SALE—RECOVERY OF CONSIDERATION.

Where defendant by seizing certain automobiles conditionally sold to plaintiff, when plaintiff was not in default, under a claim that he was in default, thereby treated the contract as abandoned and annulled, a formal rescission on plaintiff's part was not necessary to entitle plaintiff to recover the money paid under the contract in an action for money received, and this though the failure of consideration was only partial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1449-1455; Dec. Dig. § 481.*]

6. SALES (§ 481*)—CONDITIONAL SALE—REMEDIES OF BUYER.

Where defendant wrongfully terminated a contract for the conditional sale of automobiles, whereupon plaintiff sued for the amount already paid as money received by defendant to plaintiff's use, defendant was entitled to credit for the profit, if any, realized by defendant from the use of the cars.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by R. R. Bray against George W. Lowery. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. C. Wright and William P. Hubbard, for appellant. Otto Irving Wise, Hugo K. Asher, and Henry J. Brodsky, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment against him for $5,750, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. The action was one for money had and received, and grew out of a transaction connected with an attempted conditional sale of three automobiles to plaintiff Bray by defendant Lowery. Plaintiff's theory of the case was that by the conduct of defendant the contract had ceased to exist, and that he was entitled to the return of all of the money paid on the purchase price of the automobiles. Defendant by his answer denied all indebtedness, and by cross-complaint demanded judgment for $275 which he alleged had been paid for the use and benefit of plaintiff. On May 18, 1907, the parties to this action entered into an executory contract which was in writing, whereby the plaintiff, R. R. Bray, was to have possession of, and was eventually to become the owner of, three certain automobiles upon consideration of certain payments which were to aggregate $8,250. It was understood and agreed that these automobiles were to be used by Bray for the purposes of public hiring. The title to the automobiles was to remain in the defendant George W. Lowery until the whole sum of $8,250 should be paid. Pursuant to the terms of the contract, the sum of $3,000 was paid at the time of the delivery of the cars and $2,000 subsequently. The contract provided, generally speaking, that thereafter payments should be made at the rate of $500 per month, although there was a provision that, if the machines ran less than five hours a day, there was to be a certain reduction in the amount of the monthly installments. The sum of $6,000 was paid, one installment of $500 having been received and accepted by appellant Lowery on September 20, 1907, 10 days after it became due. On October 18th another installment became due. It was not paid, and on November 18th a similar sum was payable under the terms of the contract, but as to the latter payment the court ruled, and so instructed the jury, that, owing to the legal holidays proclaimed by the Governor of the state of California for every day of the month of November, 1907, the respondent, Bray, was not bound to make his payment during that month. About the 20th of November, by mutual consent of the parties to the agreement of conditional sale, one of the automobiles was sold to a third person for $1,100. Of this amount the sum of $250 was, by mutual consent, applied to the payment of a debt owed by Bray for repairs on the automobiles, and the balance, $850, was credited on account of the purchase money. It will thus be seen that about November 20th plaintiff's account was credited with $6,850, with approximately $1,400 still due to defendant. According to the testimony of plaintiff the other two cars were taken by Lowery, against plaintiff's protest and objection. This, he said, occurred on the 6th and 7th of November, 1907, and that after that time he never had the use of these automobiles in the rental service, although upon one occasion he was permitted on a written order of Lowery to take one of them out of a garage for purposes of demonstration. On December 31st, according to Bray's testimony, he demanded that these cars should be returned to him, and then was informed that they had been sold at public auction, in accordance with the terms of their contract, that Lowery had bought them in and that Bray had no further interest in them. Bray testified that he had never received notice of any intended auction sale of the property in question. It was in evidence that the sale at auction was made on December 26, 1907, after advertisement in a newspaper, and that Lowery was the only bidder. At the trial the court instructed the jury that in no event could they give judgment for the $1,100 realized from the sale of the machine on November 20th. They were also told that the amount demanded by the cross-complaint, according to the court's understanding, was that portion of the $1,100 realized from the sale of one of the automobiles which had been expended on a bill for repairs. The court also instructed the jury as follows: "This is an action for money had and received; that is to say, an action to recover money which it is claimed that, in equity and good conscience, the defendant should not retain. I have held that, in the very nature of this action, the defendant was entitled to show what profit, if any, the plaintiff made from the operation of the machines during the time they were in his custody. Upon that subject you have heard a great deal of evidence. If you find the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and you should find that he had made a profit out of the use of those machines during the time that he had them, then the defendant is entitled to have that amount, whatever you may find, if you find such an amount, deducted from the amount you find due the plaintiff."

[1] Appellant takes the position that his act, in possessing himself of the automobiles, was not a breach of the contract because the respondent had defaulted in the payments due. Unquestionably a defaulting vendee in a contract of this sort may not usually demand the return of the moneys paid on account of the sale. That rule is well established by such cases as Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17; Liver v. Mills, 155 Cal. 459, 101 Pac. 299; Muncy v. Brain, 158 Cal. 300, 110 Pac. 945.

[2] But respondent insists that there was no default on his part, and that the retaking of the automobiles by appellant constituted a repudiation of the agreement which amounted to a failure of consideration, giving respondent the right to institute this sort of action. This was doubtless the view of the case which the jury took under the instructions of the court. The contract contained this provision: "In the event that said second party shall not be able to operate said cars by careful, prudent, industrious application to said work, then the balance of said sum shall be payable within two months from the date of the last payment as herein provided." It will thus be seen that the vendee was to have 60 days from the date of his last payment in case he should be unable to operate the cars. As appellant took them on or about November 7, 1907, and sold them on December 31st of that year, the respondent could not operate them during that period. He had, therefore, 60 days following November 10th, when ordinarily the full installment of $500 would be due, in which to make that payment. By his own act appellant created this condition. This case therefore comes within the rule stated in Richter v. Union Land & Stock Co., 129 Cal. 372, 62 Pac. 40, as follows: "In all executory contracts the several obligations of the parties constitute to each, reciprocally, the consideration of the contract; and a failure to perform constitutes a failure of consideration—either partial or total, as the case may be—within the meaning of section 1689 of the Civil Code." See, also, Sterling

v. Gregory, 149 Cal. 121, 85 Pac. 305, and Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. 280, 18 Am. St. Rep. 187.

[3] Appellant calls our attention to the fact that the original complaint contained a count in which plaintiff prayed damages for breach of contract. This, he says, was an admission on the part of respondent that the contract was a subsisting agreement. But the demurrer to the original complaint was sustained, and the cause was tried upon a complaint stating a cause of action only for money had and received. The original complaint may not be considered by us for any purpose.

[4] Appellant assigns as error the sustaining by the court of objections to questions directed to plaintiff Bray on cross-examination, in which he was asked if he kept accurate books of account. If these rulings were erroneous, they were cured by subsequent happenings, because, as counsel were permitted to examine the witness quite at length regarding his expenditures, it must have appeared to the jury whether he kept correct books or not.

Appellant's next point is based upon the assertion that an action for money had and received in a case like this may not be maintained unless the contract has become of no effect from a total failure of consideration, that a partial failure is not sufficient, and his counsel call our attention to section 1691 of the Civil Code, providing for prompt rescission, and the restoration of everything of value received under a contract. They quote the following language from Richter v. Union Land & Stock Co., supra: "Nor where the failure of the consideration is total—which implies, of course, that nothing of value has been received under the contract by the party seeking to rescind—is it necessary that a formal rescission be made before bringing suit. In such cases a suit may always be maintained for the recovery of the consideration paid. Santa Clara, etc., Fuel Co. v. Tuck, 53 Cal. 304; Rose v. Foord, 96 Cal. 154 [30 Pac. 1114]; Hayes v. Los Angeles County, 99 Cal. 79 [33 Pac. 766]; 1 Chitty on Pleading, 362, note z; Russ, etc., Co. v. Muscupiabe, etc., Co., 120 Cal. 521 [52 Pac. 995, 65 Am. St. Rep. 186]." They insist that under the foregoing authority and cases of like type, where partial failure of consideration is depended upon, there must be a formal rescission of the contract before suit for the money paid may be instituted. To this contention respondent makes several answers. He says that, in view of the jury's conclusion that there was a total failure of consideration (for the verdict was for the entire amount paid minus the $1,100 for which one of the cars sold and to which plaintiff formally disclaimed title), the decision does not conflict with appellant's theory.

[5] His counsel insist, however, that the right to maintain an action for money had and received exists whether the failure of consideration be partial or entire. They do not pretend that rescission on the part of respondent has taken place. They depend, they say, upon appellant's election to treat the contract as terminated. This position is entirely correct. By his seizure of the cars upon the claim that respondent was in default and by his refusal to return the property, appellant treated the contract as abandoned and annulled by respondent. Formal rescission on the part of the latter was, therefore, not necessary. Drew v. Pedlar, 87 Cal. 443, 25 Pac. 749, 22 Am. St. Rep. 257. In Russ, etc., Co. v. Muscupiabe, etc., Co., 120 Cal. 529, 52 Pac. 998, 65 Am. St. Rep. 186, the rule was thus stated: "It is contended by respondent that it does not appear that the irrigation company has at any time been without assets so that its promise was without value, or that its obligations may not be ultimately fulfilled and that it may have assets out of which its debts may be paid or payment enforced, and therefore concludes that the failure to fulfill the contract was only partial, and that a partial failure without rescission would not be a defense.

* * * But a failure of consideration, either total or partial, may be pleaded as a defense to an action upon a promissory note, either wholly or pro tanto. See Drew v. Towle, 27 N. H. 424, 59 Am. Dec. 380, and numerous authorities there cited; 2 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 369, and notes; Tillotson v. Grapes, 4 N. H. 444." In Phelps v. Brown, 95 Cal. 576, 30 S. W. 774, it was held that the voluntary abandonment of a contract by vendors left the money of the vendee in their hands subject to suit for its recovery.

[6] In such a suit as this the right to recover by the respondent would of course be subject to the credit for the profit, if any, realized from the use of the cars. This was emphatically stated to the jury in an instruction which is quoted herein. Upon the testimony the jury found, in effect, that there had been no such profit.

Appellant assigns as error the sustaining of an objection to the following question addressed to the plaintiff: "You took in a large amount of money, did you not, by the operation of those cars during that period of time?" While the question would have been proper if addressed to appellant's own witness, it was not proper upon cross-examination of the respondent.

The instructions were drafted substantially in accordance with the views herein expressed. It is unnecessary to review them in detail. It is sufficient to say that they correctly stated the law to the jury.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

DEETS v. HALL. (L. A. 2,675.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 29, 1912.
Rehearing Denied July 29, 1912.)

1. TAXATION (§ 734*)—LEVY—FUNDS—CLERICAL ERROR—ESTIMATE OF AUDITOR—ESTABLISHMENT OF LEVY.

A sale of land to the state for delinquent taxes was not void because, in making the tax levy, there was a clerical omission to apportion a part of the tax to a particular fund, as required by Pol. Code, § 3714; the order fixing the levy having adopted the auditor's report, which designated the various funds, correctly specifying the amounts required for each and the rate necessary to procure the same.

2. TAXATION (§ 762*)—TAX SALES—DEEDS—REQUISITES—TIME OF REDEMPTION.

Pol. Code, § 3785, prescribes the recitals to be contained in tax deeds from the tax collector to the state, among which is a statement of the time when the right of redemption expired. Held that, where land was sold for taxes July 1, 1903, and the time to redeem expired with the end of July 1, 1908, a recital in deeds to land sold to the state for such taxes that the time for redeeming the property expired July 2, 1908, and that no redemption had been had, did not invalidate the deed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. R. Hervey, Judge.

Action by Jackson Deets against J. W. Hall. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

George H. Moore, for appellant. O. B. Carter and F. A. Knight, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an action to quiet title to two lots in the city of Long Beach, Los Angeles county. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appealed from it, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The judgment was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal for the Second Appellate District, and subsequently a further hearing was granted in this court.

Against the ownership of plaintiff, defendant asserted title to the property under two tax deeds to him from the state. It was stipulated on the trial that plaintiff was the owner of the lots, unless defendant could sustain title thereto "under and by virtue of tax proceedings, sales, and tax deeds upon which he relied." The judgment in favor of the plaintiff was based upon the conclusion of the trial court that the tax deeds upon which defendant relied were void. In support of the judgment and order, and against the attack made on them by the appellant it is insisted by respondent that the tax deeds from the state, upon which appellant relied, are invalid for two reasons: First, it is claimed that in the tax levy for the year 1902, upon which the sales to the state of the two lots in payment for taxes were based, a portion of the taxes levied (to wit, 5 cents on the $100) was not levied for any specific purpose, and was not apportioned to any particular fund; hence it is claimed that that portion of the tax was illegal and the whole levy void, and the sales and deeds made thereunder invalid. Second, and independent of this, that the tax deeds to the state are void upon their face, because they do not recite, as required by law, the correct date when the period of redemption expired.

[1] As to the first point. The Political Code requires the board of supervisors to levy the state and county rate upon the taxable property of the county, "designating the number of cents on each one hundred dollars of property levied for each fund." Section 3714. The claim of respondent is that this was not done; that as to 5 cents on the $100 levied by the board it was not levied for any specific fund. While there is some slight ground for this claim, it will be found on a fair examination of the face of the levy itself, particularly when taken in consideration with the estimate of the auditor, to which it refers, that it is based upon a clerical error occurring, in one instance, in the levy with reference to the rate fixed to provide $60,000 for the Temple Street jail fund. The report of the county auditor, filed with the board pursuant to section 3737 of the Political Code, contained an estimate of the amount of money necessary to be raised by taxes, for the support of the county government for the fiscal year 1902-03. It designated the 12 separate funds of the county, among which was the Temple Street jail fund, and specified the amount necessary for each particular fund and the special rate to be levied to procure the particular amount for each fund. The aggregate amount to be raised for the funds was totaled in the column as $886,035, and the aggregate tax rate to produce it .8180; the net valuation of the taxable property in the county being estimated at $112,276,055. The report set forth that as to one of the 12 funds—the Temple Street jail fund—it was necessary to raise $60,000, and the rate on each $100 of taxable property necessary to produce that amount was designated at .0535. The board of supervisors, in the preamble to their order fixing the tax levy, adopted this report of the county auditor specifying the different funds, amounts required, and particular rates under which the amounts were to be raised exactly as contained in the estimate of the auditor. The order of the board then proceeded to fix the general tax rate for county purposes at .8180, being the aggregate of the special fund rates as reported by the auditor and mentioned in the preamble, with a further rate of .60 for road purposes and the state tax of .3820.

It then declared that the said .8180 cents levied for county purposes should be apportioned to the funds, setting them forth in columns with respect to names, amounts, and special rates just as they appeared in the estimate of the auditor, as that estimate had been in effect adopted by the board, with the exception that the rate for the Temple Street jail fund was specified therein at .0035, instead of .0535, on the $100 of assessable property. It is from this that respondent claims that 5 cents on each $100 of the taxable property of the county was not levied for any special purpose or appropriated to any specific fund. It is quite clear, however, that this insertion of .0035 as the special rate for the Temple Street jail fund found in this apportionment column, instead of .0535, was clearly a clerical error; and it is apparent from a consideration of the various amounts contained in the order of the board itself where this error is contained. In the preamble to the order for the tax levy, the board recited it appears that .0535 was the rate necessary to be fixed to raise the amount required for the Temple Street jail fund. That special rate, with the other special rates fixed to supply the amounts for the other funds, and concerning the accuracy of which there is no question, makes up exactly the total rate of .8180 fixed for county purposes. This column of special rates, in which the rate of .0035 is inserted, is totaled on the face of the order itself as amounting to .8180, which is exactly the aggregate rate fixed for county purposes. This, of itself, shows that the insertion of this lower rate was a clerical error, because a correct addition of the various rates, with the rate for the Temple Street jail fund at .0035, would make the county tax rate .7680, instead of .8180, with the result that this rate of .7680 applied to the assessed valuation of the property of the county would produce only $862,280 for county purposes; while it is clearly apparent all through the recitals in the order that $886,035 was required, which amount would be procured with the rate fixed at .8180. Supplementing this with the further fact that it equally appears all through that $60,000 was required for the Temple Street jail fund, and that .0535 would produce that amount, and .0035 would produce but a little over $3,900, we have additional confirmation that the insertion of the lower rate was purely a clerical error.

Counsel for appellant seems to have had no difficulty in discovering on the face of the order for the levy just where this error arose, but contends that the error is fatal to the levy; that the rule of strict construction in tax matters applies. But, in so far as the rule is applicable here, it only means that the validity of the levy must be determined from a consideration of the language of the board, used in making it, without resort to extraneous evidence to prove its intention. Here, however, there is no resort to extraneous evidence. The intention of the board is derived solely from a consideration of the order itself making the levy. It clearly appears therefrom, as we have pointed out, that the intention of the board was to levy for the Temple Street jail fund .0535 on the $100 of taxable property in the county, and that the insertion of .0035 in one of the columns of rates for that particular fund was clearly a clerical mistake. There is no question in this case but that the board had the power to levy a rate of .0535 to procure that fund. The only question is, Was this evidently its intention? We are satisfied that there can be no doubt on that point, when the actual order is considered, and, this being true, the intention must prevail, the error disregarded, and the validity of the levy sustained as properly made in compliance with section 3714 of the Political Code.

In this same connection, it is insisted by respondent that the levy is further void, because the county tax rate is referred to in the order of the board as sometimes .8180 and .8120. But it is equally clear that, as with the rate for the Temple Street jail fund, this is also a clerical mistake. The rate of .8180 is the rate in the preamble of the order of the board containing the estimate of the auditor necessary to produce the total amount of $886,035 required for the various funds, is the actual footing as made by the auditor in his report of the aggregate of the various rates necessary to provide the amount for the funds, as it is also in the column where the error as to the Temple Street jail fund appears; and in the final summarization of the rates that amount of .8180 is fixed as the county rate which, with the state rate of .3820 and the general and special rate tax of 60 cents, makes the total tax declared to be levied and stated in the order at $1.80.

The attack on the levy was not considered in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal; that court holding the deeds invalid on the other ground of attack made on them by respondent, namely, that the date on which the period of redemption expired was not correctly stated in the deeds to the state.

[2] These deeds contained the recital: "And whereas, the certificate of sale stated that unless the said real estate was redeemed within five years from the date of sale to the state, the purchaser thereof would be entitled to a deed therefor on the 2d day of July, 1908; that said certificate of sale bears the date of the first day of July, 1903, the day of said sale; and whereas, the time, to wit, five years, for redeeming said property expired on the 2d day of July, 1908, and the same had not been redeemed or any part thereof," etc.

Section 3785 of the Political Code prescribes what recitals should be contained in deeds from the tax collector to the state, and, among other matters, requires that there shall be recited therein "the time when the right of redemption had expired." It was held by the District Court of Appeal that, as the sales to the state were made on July 1, 1903, and the redemption expired with the last minute of July 1, 1908, the deeds made to the state should have recited this latter date as the time when the right of redemption expired, and, having incorrectly stated that time as on July 2, 1908, the deeds were void. Respondent, on the hearing here, insists that this view is correct; reliance being placed on Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 560, 89 Pac. 352, and Stanton v. Hotchkiss, 157 Cal. 652, 108 Pac. 864, the same cases referred to in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal in support of its determination. Baird v. Monroe did not decide any question as to whether a date given in the deed there was correctly stated or not. There the deed contained no recital of any date at all; and whether it was void on that ground the court was not called on to decide, and did not decide, as it sustained the validity of the deed under the curative act of 1903.

In Stanton v. Hotchkiss, the deed recited the date of sale as June 24, 1898, and that the time of redemption expired on June 24, 1903. The deed to the state was made June 25, 1903. One point made on the appeal there was that the date when redemption had expired was not correctly recited, and that the date recited should have been June 25th. In sustaining the validity of the deed, this court said: "The recital in the deed made June 25, 1903, * * * was correct. June 24, 1903, was certainly the last day on which redemption could be effected within five years from the date of sale." In that case the validity of the deed was sustained. It was not held, however, that the recital of any other date as the time when the right of redemption had expired would have been incorrect.

And it by no means follows that, because of the decision in Stanton v. Hotchkiss, the date named in the deed in the present case is erroneous. All that the statute requires is a declaration of the time when the right of redemption had expired. As pointed out in Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 560, 89 Pac. 352, this requirement is of no possible value to the property owner, and the requirement of the statute was fully complied with by the date designated, in this instance, in the deeds in question, which was perfectly correct, in that it named a date after the redemption had in fact expired.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; MELVIN, J.

SHAW, J. I concur on the ground that the expiration of the redemption period was at the infinitely small space of time between the two days, and that therefore the naming of either the last day of the period, or the first day of the time succeeding it, will be good, under the peculiar wording of the statute. I do not say that the recital of any later or earlier day would be sufficiently accurate to make the deed valid.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; SLOSS, J.

PER CURIAM. The judgment and order appealed from in the above-entitled case are declared to be affirmed. By clerical misprision, manifestly appearing upon the face of the judgment, "affirmed" is erroneously used where "reversed" was intended and meant. It is therefore ordered that the judgment in the above-entitled case, filed June 29, 1912, is amended and corrected by substituting in the last line thereof the word "reversed" for the word "affirmed."

GARRISON et al. v. NORTH PASADENA LAND & WATER CO. (L. A. 2,910.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 29, 1912.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 201*)—PRIVATE CORPORATIONS—DUTY TO SUPPLY WATER TO NONSTOCKHOLDERS.

Where a private corporation was organized to supply water to stockholders only, the fact that it furnished surplus water to another corporation as an accommodation did not confer on the customers of the latter the right to enjoin a discontinuance of the supply, on the theory that defendant thereby became a public service corporation.

Where a private corporation was organized to furnish water to its stockholders, it was authorized to limit the right to receive water to such stockholders; and waters so distributed by it were not necessarily dedicated to public use.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. R. Hervey, Judge.

Suit by Arizona Garrison and others against the North Pasadena Land & Water Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal on the judgment roll alone. Affirmed.

Philaletha S. Michelsen, for appellants. Porter & Sutton and Lee, Chase, Overton & Valentine, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This was an action for an injunction to prevent respondent from cutting off a certain water supply, to which appellants asserted a right, as consumers, upon the tender of the proper compensation therefor. The appeal is upon the judgment roll alone from a judgment adverse to plaintiffs, who take the position that the findings do not support the judgment.

The court found that defendant was not a public service corporation, within the meaning of the Constitution and statutes of the state of California, but that at all times since its incorporation it has been a private mutual corporation, organized for the purpose of supplying water to its stockholders, and not to the general public; that, under the articles of incorporation and rules of said defendant, the water to be distributed by it was to be used upon the Painter & Ball tract in Los Angeles county, containing about 1,800 acres; and that the applicants for use of such water should hold such proportion of the stock of the company as the acreage to be supplied might bear to the whole tract. It was also found that in sales of land in said tract it was customary to value and sell the land and stock together; that none of the plaintiffs owned any of said stock; that in 1892 the Cottonwood Canyon Water Company laid pipes and began, and ever since has been engaged in, the business of supplying water to the residents of block A, San Pasqual tract (in which plaintiffs and those in whose behalf they bring this suit are residents); and "that, in the year 1905, said Cottonwood Canyon Water Company induced said defendant to supply said Cottonwood Canyon Water Company with water, through a five-eighths inch meter; that said water was supplied as a matter of temporary accommodation, and with the express understanding and agreement that said Cottonwood Canyon Water Company was not to acquire any right to the continued supply of water, but that said defendant could cut off said supply at any time." The court further found that the portion of block A, San Pasqual tract, on which plaintiffs and those in whose behalf they brought this action are residents, formerly had appurtenant thereto a certain portion of the waters of the Arroyo Seco, and was entitled to be supplied with water by the Lake Vineyard Land & Water Association, and its successor, Lake Vineyard Land & Water Company, but that the predecessors in interest of those here seeking relief had sold and conveyed said water for use on other lands; that said waters so sold and conveyed were derived from the same source from which defendant gets its water supply; that in July, 1909, a committee representing plaintiffs and those for whom they sue, requested the board of directors of defendant to furnish water to said residents of block A, "but that said board of directors did not vote to supply said residents * * * with water, but did instruct the superintendent of defendant to furnish more water to the Cottonwood Canyon Water Company, provided each consumer of said Cottonwood Canyon Water Company would sign an agreement in the form set out in paragraph X of plaintiffs' said complaint; that said water committee, to wit, the plaintiffs in this action, thereupon circulated copies of said instrument, set out in paragraph X of plaintiffs' said complaint, and procured the same to be signed by all the residents of said portion of block A, San Pasqual tract, to wit, by the persons named in paragraph X of plaintiffs' said complaint, and thereafter returned said instrument to said defendant, duly signed; that said instrument is not void, and was not known by defendant to be void, and was not obtained by said defendant with intent to defraud said residents, and said residents were not induced to sign said instrument fraudulently, or under any misapprehension of its full import and effect; that said defendant made no misrepresentations as to the character or status of defendant as a mutual water company, or otherwise, but disclosed to said plaintiffs the provisions of its articles of incorporation and by-laws at and prior to the time that said plaintiffs circulated said written instrument and obtained the signatures thereto; and that the said instrument is, and at all times since its circulation and signatures, as aforesaid, has been, valid." The instrument mentioned in the last finding was in form as follows:

"Pasadena, Cal., 1909.

"To the Secretary of the North Pasadena Land & Water Co.—Dear sir: I, the undersigned, residing outside of the limits of the lands specified and prescribed in the articles of incorporation and in the by-laws of your corporation as the lands upon which only the waters of said corporation can be used and so not being legally or equitably entitled to be supplied with waters from its water systems; but nevertheless, through courtesy and under revocable license having been in the past occasionally permitted to be so supplied with water during periods when your company had a surplus on hand; hereby respectfully request your company for my temporary accommodation that it permit me to be supplied from its system with water for domestic purpose out of any surplus which it may have from time to time, not claimed by its stockholders, and upon such terms and subject to such rules as its board of directors or officers may from time to time establish. In making this request and in order to induce your company to accede to the same, I acknowledge and agree with said North Pasadena Land & Water Company that I have not, by reason of any privileges heretofore extended to me by it, in the use of its waters acquired any legal or equitable right to the use of or to purchase or to be furnished with any of the waters, owned or controlled by it; and that should said company accede to my request and permit me to be furnished with its waters as above stated, I will not at any time claim to have, by reason of said permission, or use of its waters, any right whatever in or to the same, or to the use thereof, or to purchase, or to be furnished with any of said waters, and that said company has and shall continue to have full and absolute right to discontinue said privileges and to cease to furnish me with water whenever in its judgment it shall deem it for the best interest of its said stockholders so to do. Very respectfully."

The court found, also, that in August, 1909, the defendant, relying upon the instrument which had been circulated and signed, took out the five-eighths inch meter through which it had formerly supplied some water to the Cottonwood Canyon Water Company and replaced said meter with three one-inch meters, and thereafter, until February 11, 1910, from time to time furnished water to the Cottonwood Canyon Water Company through these meters as said water was needed by that company, and this water was mingled with other waters owned by the last-named company, and was by said company distributed to its consumers, including plaintiffs and those represented by them; that the Cottonwood Canyon Water Company had never been the agent of defendant, nor had the defendant ever entered into any arrangement with the Cottonwood Canyon Water Company for the use of the latter's pipes; that in February, 1910, the plaintiffs, on their own behalf and that of others whom they represent, notified the Cottonwood Canyon Water Company that they would no longer purchase water from it, and said company thereafter requested defendant to discontinue furnishing it with water, and to disconnect defendant's distributing system from that of said Cottonwood Canyon Water Company; that almost immediately thereafter this request was complied with; that, while defendant has more water than its stockholders need in the winter time, such is not the case in the summer, and that no substantial quantity of water is permitted to go to waste in the summer; and that the complaining residents of block A, San Pasqual tract, could obtain a partial supply of water from the Cottonwood Canyon Water Company, and could sink a well and make up the necessary amount of water for their properties at "substantially no more expense than the defendant would have to incur, in order to supply them with water from its system."

[1-4] Appellants contend that the existence of the five-eighths inch meter connecting the system of respondent with that of the Cottonwood Canyon Water Company made the North Pasadena Land & Water Company a public service corporation. Upon this theory, they tendered a month's rent to that corporation, and, upon the refusal of its officers to accept their offer, began the present action. They cite numerous authorities to the effect that a corporation thus doing a public business may not refuse to furnish water, if it have a sufficient supply, to those whom it has previously served. Respondent concedes this to be the law, but insists that the mere accommodation of another company with some of its surplus water did not constitute those supplied by such company respondent's customers. This is the proper view of the matter. The findings bring respondent clearly within that class of corporations recognized by such cases as Hildreth v. Montecito Creek Water Co., 139 Cal. 25, 72 Pac. 395; Barton v. Riverside Water Co., 155 Cal. 518, 101 Pac. 790, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 331; Burr v. Maclay Rancho Water Co., 160 Cal. 250, 116 Pac. 715. Such corporations may limit the right to receive water to their stockholders; and waters distributed by such corporations are not necessarily dedicated to public use. Even if we were to consider the water furnished to the Cottonwood Canyon Water Company through the small meter sufficient to create for defendant the status of a public corporation, that would not improve the position of plaintiffs and the other signers of the solemn waiver of all rights, whether existent or prospective, to the use of water furnished by defendant. In the absence of fraud, such a waiver was perfectly good, and the court found that no fraud had been practiced. Appellants' counsel seem to think that the mere signing of such a waiver indicates that it must have been obtained by trick, device, "and a subtle form of duress," but in an appeal upon the judgment roll alone all intendments are in favor of the regularity of the judgment. The findings of the court are conclusive as to the facts found. Lane v. Tanner, 156 Cal. 138, 103 Pac. 846; Sather Banking Co. v. Briggs Co., 138 Cal. 726, 72 Pac. 352. The waiver was circulated according to the findings, not by the defendant, but by the committee appointed by the very persons who are seeking relief in this action. Having admitted their position as mere licensees, the signers of that document are estopped from asserting that defendant is under any obligation to continue pouring water for their use into the distributing system of the Cottonwood Canyon Water Company.

SHAW v. BERNAL. (Sac. 1958.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 2, 1912.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 49½*)—WIFE'S SEPARATE ESTATE—PROPERTY CONVEYED TO WIFE—GIFT FROM HUSBAND—PRESUMPTIONS.

Under Civ. Code, § 164, providing that, when any property is conveyed to a married woman by an instrument in writing, it will be presumed that title is vested in her as of her separate property, where a gift by a husband to wife is essential to a theory that property conveyed to the wife was her separate property, such a gift on the part of the husband will be presumed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 249-255; Dec. Dig. § 49½.*]

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 141*)—SEPARATE PROPERTY OF WIFE—IMPROVEMENTS.

Where improvements were placed on real estate, the separate property of a wife, with funds which were either community property or the husband's separate earnings, the improvements followed the title, and became the separate property of the wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 538-540; Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 14*)—CONVEYANCE TO BOTH—TENANTS IN COMMON—STATUTES.

Civ. Code, § 164, provides that where land is conveyed to a married woman and her husband, or to her and any other person, the presumption is that the married woman takes the part conveyed to her as tenant in common, unless a different intention is expressed in the instrument. Held, that such presumption was only a prima facie one, except where a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for a valuable consideration was concerned, and that it did not apply where it appeared that the property was purchased with the wife's funds by the husband acting as her agent, and that he procured the conveyance to himself and her without her knowledge or consent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 71-89; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

4. TRUSTS (§ 81*)—TRUSTEE—HUSBAND AND WIFE—PURCHASE OF LAND WITH WIFE'S FUNDS.

Where a husband purchased real property with his wife's funds and procured the conveyance to be made in the name of both, in the absence of proof of intention on her part to make a gift to him, the husband will be regarded as a trustee of his interest in the deed for the wife's benefit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 115-118; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

5. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 49¼*)—WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY—GIFT TO HUSBAND—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where a husband purchased property with his wife's funds, and caused the conveyance to be made in the name of both, the fact that he acquired possession and subsequently managed and controlled the property with his wife's consent was insufficient to show an intent on her part to make a gift of the property to him, or to change its status from her separate property to community property, or to change his relation as trustee of an undivided half thereof for her benefit.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by Mary J. Shaw, administratrix of J. W. Shaw, deceased, against Charles Bernal, as executor of the will of Mary J. W. Shaw, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. G. Harrier and T. T. C. Gregory, for appellant. Frank R. Devlin and Vincent Surr, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This action, in the nature of an action to quiet title, was brought by J. W. Shaw against the executor of the will of his deceased wife, Mary J. W. Shaw, to obtain a decree that he is the sole owner of certain real property in the city of Vallejo, being lot 5 in block 265, and the west 18 feet 4 inches of lot 6 in the same block, according to the official map of said city, with the improvements thereon; the theory of the complaint being that the same was the community property of the spouses, and that under the provisions of section 1401 of the Civil Code, he became the absolute owner thereof on the death of the wife. By his answer defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, and alleged that said property was the separate property of the wife at the time of her death. J. W. Shaw having died before decision in the lower court, Mary J. Shaw, administratrix of his estate, was substituted as plaintiff. The findings were in favor of defendant; the court expressly finding, among other things, that the property was purchased by Mrs. Shaw with her own separate funds, and also that J. W. Shaw and Mrs. Shaw did not acquire the property as community property, and that Mary J. W. Shaw was at the time of her death the sole and exclusive owner in fee of the whole of said property. Judgment was given decreeing plaintiff to be without any interest or estate in the property, and that the whole of said property at the time of her death was the separate property of Mary J. W. Shaw, and that defendant is entitled to the sole and exclusive possession thereof for all purposes of administration. This is an appeal by plaintiff from such judgment. The question presented on this appeal is whether the evidence is legally sufficient to support the findings.

J. W. Shaw and Mary J. W. Shaw were married in the year 1887, at which time Mrs. Shaw was a widow with four children, to three of whom she left all her property by will dated October 6, 1908. She died in the year 1909. The property involved in this action was purchased from F. E. Allen and wife in the year 1905, the deed therefor being dated January 4, 1905, and running to J. W. Shaw and Mary J. W. Shaw, his wife, as grantees. This property was generally referred to in the evidence as the "York street property." The consideration specified in the deed of this property was $10, and the actual consideration was $2,300 or $2,350. The evidence was clearly sufficient to support the conclusion that this consideration was wholly paid from the separate property of Mrs. Shaw. Mr. Shaw himself testified that he bought this property with the $2,350 received on the sale of lot 6 in block 250, Vallejo, with the improvements thereon. A deed evidencing such sale, dated January 3, 1905, from John W. Shaw and Mary J. W. Shaw, his wife, to John Johnson and Annie Johnson, his wife, was introduced in evidence. The actual consideration therefor, according to Mr. Shaw, was $2,350, and this $2,350 was the whole price paid for the York street property. Said lot 6 in block 250 was purchased in 1897. Mr. Shaw testified that "I bought it from Timothy Healey," and paid for it "$500 with my wife's money that she received from France." He further testified that she received about $2,000 from Dr. Cells, her brother-in-law in France, that he "handled about $1,200 of it," and that he "bought lot 6 with $500 of that." He had no knowledge of the reason for the sending of this money to his wife, and only knew that it "came from Dr. Cells in France." We deem it unimportant to determine the question elaborately discussed by counsel whether this $2,000 received by Mrs. Shaw from France must be deemed to have been community property, in view of the prima facie presumptions in favor of community property as to all property acquired by a spouse after marriage. The deed given on such purchase presumably executed according to the directions of Mr. Shaw, for according to his testimony he appears to have conducted all the negotiations, was introduced in evidence as one of his exhibits. It was dated November 10, 1897, and ran from Timothy Healey and Bridget Healey, his wife, as grantors, to Mary J. W. Shaw, as sole grantee. At the time of the execution of this deed, section 164, Civil Code, after declaring substantially that all property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife, except that acquired by either spouse by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, with the rents, issues and profits thereof, is community property, provided, as it does now, as follows: "But whenever any property is conveyed to a married woman by an instrument in writing, the presumption is that the title is thereby vested in her as her separate property."

[1] It is settled that, under this statutory provision, where a gift by the husband to the wife is essential to the theory that the property conveyed to the wife is the separate property of the wife, such a gift on the part of the husband will be presumed. See Alferitz v. Arrivillaga, 143 Cal. 646, 77 Pac. 657; Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 282, 104 Pac. 308. So here, if we assume that the evidence was not such as to warrant a conclusion that the $2,000 received by Mrs. Shaw from France was her separate property, which by no means do we concede, and if, in fact, the money paid for said lot 6, block 250, was community property, nevertheless the fact that the deed was caused by Mr. Shaw to be made to Mrs. Shaw as sole grantee gave rise to the presumption that Mr. Shaw intended a gift of the property to his wife as her separate property. This, it is true, was only a prima facie presumption as between husband and wife, but there was certainly nothing in the evidence requiring a conclusion that this presumption had been controverted. No explanation to show a contrary intention was even attempted by Mr. Shaw, and the facts shown were not such as to compel a conclusion contrary to that of the lower court. The case in this respect is not as strong in favor of the husband as was that of Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 104 Pac. 308, relied on by appellant, where the court in upholding the finding of the trial court in favor of the husband intimated very strongly that a contrary conclusion on the part of the trial court on the question of intent to make a gift would have been held to be sufficiently supported by the testimony. Hammond v. McCollough, 159 Cal. 639, 115 Pac. 216, relied on by appellant, was also a case where the finding of the lower court was in favor of the husband, and this court simply held that there was sufficient legal support in the evidence for such finding.

[2] Mr. Shaw thereafter built a house on said lot 6, block 250, using therefor $700 of "the money that came from France," and, he claimed, about $700 more of his own earnings. If we assume that all the money expended in constructing the house on this land was community property, it still remains that both the land and the building constructed thereon constituted separate property of the wife. A similar question was early decided by this court. The conveyance of land purchased with community funds had been by express direction of the husband, made to the wife, with the intent on his part to make to her a gift of the property. Subsequently the husband from community funds constructed a dwelling house thereon. The court said: "The question is, who was the owner of the house when it was built under those circumstances. It admits of only one answer—the owner of the lot was also the owner of the house. It formed a part of the real estate, and the title to the home is necessarily included in the title to the lot on which it is erected, in the absence of an agreement sufficient to pass the title to the house alone. Peck v. Brummagim, 31 Cal. 441, 448, 89 Am. Dec. 195. This holding is in accord with the general rule stated in 21 Cyc. 1648, as follows: "Improvements made during marriage on the separate property of either husband or wife, although with community funds, will as a general rule belong to the spouse owning the separate property." An agreement between the parties may produce a different result as is implied in the above quotation from Peck v. Brummagim, supra, creditors of the husband may perhaps establish a claim to improvements so constructed where they can show that the expenditure therefor was a fraud upon them (see Maddox v. Summerlin, 92 Tex. 483, 49 S. W. 1033, 50 S. W. 567), the wife might reach as community property a building erected by the husband from community funds on his separate property, for the very purpose of fraudulently depriving her of her interest therein (see Smith v. Smith, 12 Cal. 216, 73 Am. Dec. 533), but it is clearly the rule that where a husband deliberately constructs from community funds a building upon the separate property of his wife, in the absence of any sufficient agreement or undertaking to the contrary, as between him and her, the title to the building follows the title to the land and is separate property of the wife, and neither he nor the marital partnership has any title to any portion of the property, either land or building. The authorities hold that the most that the marital partnership may acquire under such circumstances, if anything, is a right to reimbursement to the extent of the value added to the property by the improvements. Whether the right to reimbursement exists in such cases is a question not at all involved in this proceeding and we express no opinion thereon. In support of the views we have expressed are the following authorities, in addition to those already cited: McKay on Community Property, § 249; Ballinger on Community Property, note to section 19; 6 American and English Encyclopedia of Law (2d Ed.) 324; Rice v. Rice, 21 Tex. 58; Maddox v. Summerlin, 92 Tex. 483, 49 S. W. 1033, 50 S. W. 567; Humphreys v. Newman, 51 Me. 40. The only expression of opinion that we have found that may be claimed to be in any way opposed to the views we have stated is in Collins v. Bryan, 40 Tex. Civ. App. 88, 88 S. W. 432, a case decided by the Civil Court of Appeals of Texas. There was absolutely nothing in the evidence relative to this property to take the case from the effect of the rule we have discussed. The disposition of the rents received from the house constructed on said lot, viz., their collection by Mr. Shaw and the placing of the same by him in the bank to his credit, is immaterial in the determination of the question we have been discussing.

As we have said, the deed for the York street property, the property here involved, ran to both Mr. and Mrs. Shaw, as grantees. Mr. Shaw said that he bought this property, conducted the negotiations, and gave the instructions "to the agent." We have thus a case where real property was purchased by the husband, wholly with money belonging to the wife as her separate property, and the conveyance therefor, presumably by the direction of the husband, was made to both husband and wife. The evidence is not such as to compel the conclusion that Mrs. Shaw was ever made acquainted with the fact that Mr. Shaw was named as a cograntee with her in this deed, or that there was any understanding between him and her prior to or at the time of the purchase that he should be so named. The testimony of Mr. Shaw contains no such claim on his part. There was a small house upon the property, which Mr. Shaw moved to the rear of the lot and repaired at a cost of some $900. This was the residence of the family to 1907. Mr. and Mrs. Shaw then constructed four flats on the property at a cost of some $5,700, which they borrowed, executing a mortgage to secure their note for that amount to one Margaret J. Best. This mortgage covered the property here involved, and also a lot purchased by Mr. Shaw with community funds on February 15, 1895 (lot 5, block 250, Vallejo). From about the year 1895, Mr. Shaw was employed as a machinist at the Mare Island Navy Yard, receiving from $4.16 to $4.48 per day. He collected the rentals from the flats, as to which his wife had full knowledge, and deposited both rentals and wages in the bank to his own credit, and the fund thus created was drawn on for all necessary expenses, including household expenses, repairs of the property, and payments on account of the mortgage debt. On July 19, 1907, he sold lot 5 in block 250 for $3,000, and they built two additional flats on the property in controversy at a cost of some $3,600 or $3,700. New mortgages covering the property in controversy, given by both husband and wife to secure their notes, one dated July 19, 1907, for $4,200, and one dated March 1, 1908, for $5,000 were shown. After the building of the two new flats, Mr. and Mrs. Shaw lived in one of the flats. The present value of the whole property is about $12,000. The foregoing matters were shown by the testimony of Mr. Shaw.

In view of what we have said as to the rule applicable where a husband voluntarily constructs with community funds buildings upon the separate property of the wife, there is nothing in the foregoing testimony to compel a conclusion that any part of the property here involved, land or improvements, was community property at the date of death of Mrs. Shaw. Even if we assume all the money put into the buildings constructed on this property to have been community property, the court was nevertheless warranted in concluding that none of such property (land or buildings) was community property, if indeed it was not compelled to so conclude. There was nothing requiring a conclusion bringing the case within the operation of the rule referred to in Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Ingersoll, 153 Cal. 1, 94 Pac. 94, as to a transmutation by agreement of separate property of the wife into community property, even if such an agreement as to real property constituting such separate property could be effectual if not in writing. See Yoakam v. Kingery, 126 Cal. 30, 33, 58 Pac. 324. And the mere fact that both Mr. and Mrs. Shaw were named as the grantees in the conveyance could not operate to require a conclusion that the property purchased was community property. Section 164, Civ. Code. So that we know of no theory upon which it can be held that the conclusion of the trial court that none of this property was community property is not sustained by the evidence.

[3] There remains for consideration but one other claim of plaintiff, a claim not presented by the complaint, which went entirely upon the theory that all of the property was community property, but which is made in the briefs, and is involved in the claim of defendant that all of the property was the separate property of Mrs. Shaw at the time of her death. This was found and adjudged by the trial court. The claim is that one-half of the property was the separate property of Mr. Shaw. This claim has for its basis the fact that the conveyance of the property was to both Mr. and Mrs. Shaw as grantees. Section 164 of the Civil Code, after providing as we have already set forth, declares: "And in case the conveyance be to such married woman and to her husband, or to her and any other person, the presumption is that the married woman takes the part conveyed to her, as tenant in common, unless a different intention is expressed in the instrument." This presumption, like the one declared in favor of the wife where the conveyance is to her as sole grantee, is simply a prima facie presumption, except where a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for a valuable consideration is concerned. It has been said that under this provision the legal presumption arising upon the face of such a deed as this "is that the grantees took the land as tenants in common, each one-half as his or her separate estate."

Yoakam v. Kingery, 126 Cal. 32, 58 Pac. 324. Assuming that such a presumption exists in favor of the husband, as it is established that the purchase was made by the husband wholly with money in his possession constituting the separate property of the wife, we are satisfied that the trial court was warranted in concluding upon the evidence before it, as we must assume that it did conclude, that any presumption arising under such section was sufficiently controverted, and that the husband acquired no beneficial interest in the property so purchased.

[4] There was nothing in the evidence to require a conclusion that Mrs. Shaw had ever done more in relation to the money derived from the sale of her lot 6 in block 250 than to intrust it to the custody and control of her husband. As in Title Insurance Co. v. Ingersoll, 158 Cal. 483, 111 Pac. 364, "the relation of the parties and their conduct with respect to her money justified the court in preferring the inference that the understanding was that he was to act as trustee for her in the management and disposition of it." It is well settled that "if a husband purchase lands with the separate estate of his wife in his hands, * * * or money put into his hands to invest for his wife, and take the title in his own name, a trust results to the wife" (1 Perry on Trusts, § 127), in the absence of a clear understanding to the contrary, had at the time of the purchase. (Id. § 140). See, also, 3 Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. § 1049; Heinrich v. Heinrich, 2 Cal. App. 479, 483, 84 Pac. 326.

[5] It was substantially said in Title Insurance Co. v. Ingersoll, 153 Cal. 1, 5, 94 Pac. 94, that it is well settled that the mere acquirement of the possession of a wife's separate property by the husband, and his subsequent management and control of the same, all with her consent, do not show any intent on the part of the wife to make a gift of the property to the husband or to change its status from separate to community property, that the presumption in such a case is that the property continues to be the separate property of the wife and that the husband holds it in trust for her, and that under such circumstances it devolves on the trustee claiming a gift or change in the status of the property to show the same. The utmost that can here be claimed for Mr. Shaw in this regard is that he held the dry legal title to an undivided one-half of the property, as trustee for his wife, who was the sole beneficial owner thereof and entitled to have the same conveyed to her. If we assume this to be the situation, there is no practical necessity for a reversal or for any modification of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

McKAY v. GESFORD. (Sac. 1,836.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 29, 1912.)

1. TRIAL (§ 395*)—FINDINGS—CONSTRUCTION.

Where, in ejectment, the court made a finding of the ultimate facts from the probative facts previously found, such ultimate finding could not be sustained, unless supported by the specific facts found.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 927-934, 939; Dec. Dig. § 395.*]

2. HOMESTEAD (§ 35*)—DECLARATION—USE OF BUILDING.

Where husband and wife occupied a six-room building, erected on her separate property, for a hotel and boarding house, occupying no portion of the building permanently, but shifting from one room to another as the exigencies of their business demanded, such use did not deprive the premises of their homestead character, so as to deprive the wife of the right to file a homestead declaration thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. §§ 50-55; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

3. HOMESTEAD (§ 35*)—USE OF PROPERTY—PARAMOUNT PURPOSE.

Where premises are bona fide used as the home of the owners, such use will be regarded as the paramount purpose, and the fact that they are also used for some business in order to afford a means of livelihood to the occupants will not prevent the property being subject to a homestead exemption.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; John E. Raker, Judge.

Action by Rose McKay, as special executrix of Julia D. Ferguson, deceased, against Frances Helen Gesford. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

J. H. Stewart, for appellant. N. A. Cornish, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action is in ejectment. It was brought by plaintiff as special administratrix of the estate of Julia D. Ferguson, deceased, claiming that certain real property belonged to the estate of her intestate.

Defendant admitted that the property in question had originally been the separate property of Julia D. Ferguson, but averred and showed that Julia D. Ferguson, while the wife of A. H. Ferguson and while she with her husband was residing in the house upon the land in controversy, filed her declaration of homestead for the joint benefit of herself and her husband. Julia D. Ferguson having died, it is conceded that the property passed to the surviving husband (Civ. Code, §§ 1263, 1265; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1474, 1475), if at the time of her death there was, under her homestead declaration, a valid subsisting homestead upon the property. Defendant and appellant is the grantee of the husband, claiming title by deed executed by him after the death of his wife. The court made voluminous findings, and from them reached the conclusion that in law the homestead declaration was invalid. Judgment passed for plaintiff, and from that judgment and upon the judgment roll defendant appeals, contending that the findings do not support the judgment.

The findings are that in 1884 Julia D. Ferguson, then Julia D. Edwards, a spinster, owned the land in controversy, and in 1884 constructed a building thereon consisting of four rooms "as and for a hotel, and to keep boarders and lodgers as she could accommodate." In 1888 she married A. H. Ferguson. At the time of her marriage she was residing "on said premises in the hotel building thereon, and continued to keep such boarders and lodgers as could be accommodated in said hotel building, and to run said hotel and hotel business with all the customers, boarders and lodgers that could be obtained." In 1891 or 1892 she "built two additional rooms onto said hotel building." She continued thus in occupancy, and use of the premises until her death. After her marriage with her husband in 1888 she with her husband continuously resided upon the premises and "in the hotel building thereon," and this was their sole and only home and residence. She was so residing with her husband upon the premises, when in 1894 she made the homestead declaration in due and regular form, claiming the premises as a homestead for the joint benefit of herself and her husband. This homestead declaration was duly acknowledged and recorded. "From the time of the erection of said hotel building on said premises described in the complaint, in the year 1884 and up to the 1st day of January, 1895, the said Julia D. Ferguson conducted a hotel on said premises, and her residence upon said premises and in said building was but incidental to the running of said hotel, and that the said building and premises were used primarily and principally as and for a hotel, and not otherwise." During all of this time "Julia D. Ferguson performed the principal labor necessary to keep the said hotel, did the cooking and waiting on table, and otherwise attended to the wants of her boarders and lodgers; but at times hired a cook and waiter girls, and other help, when necessary to run said hotel, and, after her marriage to the said A. H. Ferguson, the said A. H. Ferguson when not otherwise engaged would give his help and assistance to his wife in and about the said hotel in doing the work and in conducting the same. * * * Said hotel building was not dedicated to residence purposes primarily, and was actually used by said Julia D. Ferguson and was occupied for business purposes for the accommodation of the public. * * * No particular room or rooms on the premises were reserved for the exclusive use of said Julia D. Ferguson and her husband, or either of them, but that she and her husband used any of them for themselves as was convenient, when not needed to be used by their boarders and lodgers, and that no particular portion of the premises was used exclusively, primarily, or principally for a home by either of them. * * * A sign bearing the words 'Star Hotel' was continually kept on the building from the time of its construction, and a bell was rung at regular intervals at meal hours to call persons to meals; that occasionally advertisements of the Star Hotel were published in a newspaper by the said Julia D. Ferguson, and that Julia D. Ferguson solicited many of the business men of the town to send her patronage to her hotel." At no time were the premises of a greater value than $1,000. The residence of Julia D. Ferguson before her marriage and of herself and her husband after their marriage upon the premises in question "had been and was but incidental to the running of the hotel business and conducting of a hotel business thereon; and the said building on said premises was used and occupied by said Julia D. Ferguson and by said Julia D. Ferguson and said A. H. Ferguson, at all the times herein specified and found in these findings, primarily and principally and chiefly as and for a hotel to accommodate the public, and not otherwise." Finding 20: "That said lands and premises, together with the building thereon known as the Star Hotel, being occupied and used as hereinbefore found, primarily and principally and chiefly as and for a hotel and doing a hotel business, and the residence of the said Julia D. Ferguson and A. H. Ferguson in said hotel and on said lands and premises being but incidental at all times to the running of said hotel and not primarily and principally as a home, said house known as the Star Hotel, and the land and premises which it occupied, being the lands and premises described in the complaint, was not, nor was any part thereof, impressed as a homestead and with the homestead character as homestead property, and was not a valid homestead. And said building known as the Star Hotel, and the premises being occupied and used as hereinbefore found, could not be impressed with the title and character of a valid homestead interest, nor was it thus impressed, and it did not exist as a valid or any homestead of said Fergusons, or of either of them."

[1] All of the above quotations are from the findings, and by finding 20 quoted in extenso it will be seen that the court there makes its ultimate finding of fact from the probative facts previously found. It is, of course, well settled that a general and ultimate finding such as that declared in finding 20 which is drawn as a conclusion from facts previously found cannot stand if the specific facts upon which it is based do not support it. Sav. & Loan Socy. v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 540, 39 Pac. 922; McDonald v. Randall, 139 Cal. 254, 72 Pac. 997.

[2] The question, then, before us is whether the ultimate finding of the court, namely, that by reason of the facts previously found the property could not be impressed with the homestead characteristic is or is not supported. It was recognized at a very early day that questions of difficulty would arise under our homestead law touching the character of the property sought to be exempted under its provisions. Ackley v. Chamberlain, 16 Cal. 181, 76 Am. Dec. 516. It is there said "that the question whether property devoted chiefly to business purposes can be subjected to a homestead claim is full of embarrassment." But, when it is borne in mind that the homestead law is a beneficent law calling for liberal construction (Heathman v. Holmes, 94 Cal. 291, 29 Pac. 404), we think all difficulty will be removed and all doubt resolved by the following suggestion: If under these identical circumstances of ownership of the property, of the construction of the building thereon, and of the use of that building Mrs. Ferguson, instead of being a married woman with a husband, had been a widow with minor children to support, and an attack had been made upon a declaration of homestead which she had duly made and recorded upon the property, would any court say, or would any one say, that, notwithstanding that it was the residence and sole and only home of herself and babies, it could not be impressed with the homestead characteristics because the principal purpose and use of the premises was its conduct by her as a hotel or boarding house in order that she might thus support herself and babies and give them a home? But the law is no different if you substitute a husband for the babies. The dominant and controlling fact still remains that this was the residence and home of the family, that it was suitable for the purpose, and was used for the purpose. We are not in this case embarrassed by difficulties which have arisen in other cases where the character of the business maintained is one entirely foreign to the conception of a home, if not repugnant to it—such a case, for example, as is instanced by Chief Justice Field in Ackley v. Chamberlain, supra, of an effort to impress a gas factory with homestead characteristics because the owner lived in it. Here the very business which was carried on was conducted for the purpose of maintaining the home, for, if this be not so, then it must follow that any widow seeking to support herself and perhaps her children by taking boarders or lodgers under circumstances where it can be truly said that the principal business conducted upon the premises is that of a lodging house or a boarding house cannot have a homestead, although she is conducting this very business so as to maintain herself and her offspring in a home. Each case of this character stands by itself and is to be governed by its own facts. Our own cases have passed recently under review in Estate of Levy, 141 Cal. 646, 75 Pac. 301, 99 Am.St. Rep. 92. Without again reviewing them, it is sufficient to refer to this case. Therein, after extended consideration of our decisions, and amongst them Heathman v. Holmes, 94 Cal. 291, 29 Pac. 404, where it is said, "Using a building partly or even chiefly for business purposes, or renting part of it, is not inconsistent with the right of homestead, provided it is and continues to be the bona fide residence of the family" this court said: "These cases are all authority for the proposition that, if a building is the actual bona fide residence of a party, he may legally select it and the land on which it is situated as a homestead, even though, incidentally, a part thereof, no matter how large, may be used by him for other purposes than those of family residence. There is no decision of this court in conflict with this view."

[3] Under the rule of liberal construction which it has been repeatedly declared should be extended to homestead laws, in every permissible case where the premises are the bona fide home of the parties, it should be held that the business conducted within the premises is not the paramount and principal purpose, but the incidental and subordinate purpose; that the home is the main thing, not the business; that the business is conducted to enable the parties to maintain a home, and not that the parties are incidentally inhabiting the premises for the purpose of maintaining the business. Especially is this true in such a case as the one at bar, where it appears from the findings that the parties during all their married life never had any other home than their six-room hotel. Nor is it of determinative import that they occupied one or another of these six rooms or shifted themselves about as the exigencies of their business demanded. In some cases the actual occupancy of a room or rooms in a building has become important as evidence showing residence. These were cases like Skinner v. Hall, 69 Cal. 195, 10 Pac. 406, and Heathman v. Holmes, 94 Cal. 291, 29 Pac. 404, but in this case the permanent occupancy of one or another room is of no material significance, since it is shown that these spouses either lived and made their home and residence upon the premises in controversy, or they lived and made their home and residence nowhere.

It follows from the foregoing that the ultimate finding of the court to the effect that the property could not be impressed with the characteristics of a homestead is not supported by the specific facts upon which the finding is based, and that the judgment itself is therefore unsupported by the findings.

Wherefore the judgment appealed from is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to enter its judgment for the appellant.

BEATTY, C. J., does not participate in the foregoing.

FLEMING v. LAW. (S. F. 5,786.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 29, 1912.
Rehearing Denied July 29, 1912.)

1. ASSIGNMENTS (§ 58*)—CONSENT—SALES.

Where one who had contracted to furnish marble for the construction of a building assigned his contract, and the assignee requested the owner of the building to consent to the assignment, to which the owner replied by letter refusing to consent, but agreeing to acknowledge receipt of notice of assignment and to pay the assignee on the assignor's order any money which became due to the assignor, the owner did not thereby consent to the assignment so as to substitute the assignee for the assignor in the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. §§ 121-123; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

2. ASSIGNMENTS (§ 109*)—CONTRACT—LIABILITY OF ASSIGNEE.

Where, without the consent of the owner, an assignee is substituted for the original contractor for marble for a building, a prior written modification of the contract made by the owner and the contractor is binding on the assignee, though he has no knowledge of such modification at the time of the assignment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. § 188; Dec. Dig. § 109.*]

3. SALES (§ 89*)—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION—MODIFICATION.

A modification providing that payments made on a contract to buy marble were to be approximate only and that the actual marble to be paid for would be measured as set in the building, was contemplated by a provision of the original contract that a "square foot agreement will be substituted for a lump sum contract * * * to be drawn and entered into as soon as sufficient drawings have been completed."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 251, 252, 259; Dec. Dig. § 89.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 413*)—CONTRACTS — ORAL EVIDENCE.

In the absence of fraud, coercion, or mutual mistake, a witness cannot by the mere declaration of his understanding of a written contract overthrow its plain language.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by T. J. Fleming, Trustee, against Herbert E. Law. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Edgar C. Chapman, for appellant. Milton T. U'Ren, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought to enforce the payment of a sum of money alleged to be due on a contract for furnishing marble to the Monadnock Building in San Francisco owned by the defendant. The cause was tried before a jury and plaintiff received a verdict in the sum of $6,170.61, the full amount sued for, with interest. Judgment was rendered in accordance with the verdict. Defendant appeals from that judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

So little dispute is there over the facts that it may be said that they are presented without conflict. The controversy arises over the legal conclusions to be drawn from the admitted facts. The latter are the following: In 1904 defendant Law contemplated the construction of an office building in San Francisco known as the Monadnock Building. W. A. Perrin, a marble man, entered into a contract with Law to furnish the marble proposed to be used in the construction of this building. The contract was in writing. It set forth the various prices for the marbles and the condition in which they were to be shipped f. o. b. cars, Colton, Cal. This contract was known as the "square foot" agreement, and concluded as follows: "If my quotations are accepted, it is understood that this per square foot agreement will be substituted for a lump sum contract, this contract to be drawn and entered into as soon as sufficient drawings have been completed to enable us to do so." It is unquestioned that the true meaning of this was that the lump sum contract was to be substituted for the temporary square foot agreement. The drawings and specifications were not at that time sufficiently complete to enable the parties to know just how much marble and of what character would be required in the building.

In the square foot agreement the provision for payment was the following: "On arrival and checking of marble in San Francisco in carload lots 90% of the amount due will be paid on presentation of architect's certificate. The balance of 10% will be due twenty-five days after the marble is set in the building complete." Perrin entered upon the delivery of the marble. Because of his immediate need for money to pay his labor and because of the delay in procuring the architect's certificates Perrin testifies, and it is without dispute, that the mode of payment was modified. The presentation of the architect's certificate was waived, and Law permitted Perrin to draw upon him for 90 per cent. of the contract price of the marble as soon as it was placed on the cars at Colton. Meanwhile the drawings, plans, and specifications had been completed, and Law from time to time requested Perrin to enter into the "lump sum" agreement which was to take the place of the "square foot" agreement with the result that on February 23, 1906, Perrin executed the following writing: "San Francisco, California. Mr. Herbert E. Law, Rialto Building, City—Dear Sir: It is agreed that payments for marble on contract dated September 6, 1904, for marble in Monadnock Building are approximate only and that the actual marble to be paid for by you will be measured set in building; the owner taking no responsibility as to size or condition, etc., delivered. Yours very truly [Signed] W. A. Perrin. Dated this 23rd day of February, 1906." Perrin had fallen into financial difficulties, and was unable to pay his laborers. On or about the date of the letter above quoted he entered into an agreement with T. J. Fleming, plaintiff herein, which declared that he assigned and transferred his contract with Law to Fleming as trustee in trust for the purpose of carrying out and fulfilling its provisions. The "trust" thus declared was to fulfill the contract by the performance of its terms and to pay to Perrin's creditors, a list of whom was given, the moneys due to them. Upon the completion of the contract any excess of the moneys over and above the amount due the creditors was to be paid to Perrin. It was fully understood and agreed "that said T. J. Fleming assumes no personal liability under said contract, and the only responsibility assumed by him is the fulfillment of the trust referred to in this assignment." Fleming was to have full management and control of Perrin's marble plant.

Following these writings, and upon March 6, 1906, Fleming presented the following letter to the defendant: "March 6, 1906. Herbert E. Law, San Francisco, California—Dear Sir: I beg to hand you herewith two copies of the assignment of the contract Mr. W. A. Perrin has with you for furnishing the marble to be used in the Bishop Building (Monadnock) in San Francisco. I understand that Perrin has been in San Francisco and advised you of this assignment, and that it is agreeable to you. If this is correct I would be pleased if you would designate your acceptance on one of the copies and return it to me at your earliest convenience. I understand there will be a carload of marble ready to be shipped in a few days. Thanking you for your prompt attention to this matter, I am very truly yours, [Signed] T. J. Fleming, Trustee." To this letter he received this response: "San Francisco, Cal., March 8, 1906. Mr. T. J. Fleming, California Portland Cement Co., 401-3 Trust Building, Calif.—Dear Mr. Fleming: I have your favor of the 6th inst. It will be quite apparent to you that I cannot consider the transfer of my contract to a number of persons of whom I know nothing, and of whose responsibility and ability to carry out the contract I do not know. Mr. Perrin, I think, is a responsible man and that he will carry it out. These gentlemen are perhaps responsible, I do not know anything about them. It seems to me, Mr. Fleming, that a transfer on my part is not necessary anyhow. Mr. Perrin will give you an order on me for the money that falls due from time to time, and I will pay it to you. That is all there will be to it. Just as soon as you have served me with notice of assignment, I will acknowledge receipt and whatever money becomes due to Mr. Perrin, I will pay on his order. It seems that this would accomplish your desire without requiring any other assignment than the arrangement that may be made between the men, Mr. Perrin and yourself. Very truly yours, [Signed] Herbert E. Law."

It appears that the suggestion in Mr. Law's letter outlined the course which was actually pursued for Perrin did give a written order to Mr. Law to "pay to T. J. Fleming, trustee, all moneys now due or that may become due me on that certain contract for furnishing marble," etc. Much marble had been delivered under this contract at the time of the earthquake and fire of April, 1906. The Monadnock Building was injured in this calamity. In May, 1906, inspection was had and measurements were made of the marble saved from the disaster. A detailed list of the kinds and quantity of marble thus saved was prepared by Perrin and his son who had the contract for setting the marble in the building. It was shown that in value $7,404.35 had been saved. Work was taken up for the completion of the building and more marble was shipped and placed therein. It is shown that up to within a few days before the April disaster there had been shipped for use in the Monadnock Building marble of the contract value of $32,588.29. Upon this Law had paid $29,815.50, leaving a balance unpaid of $2,738.78. After the disaster marble of the value of $34,747.23 was shipped. Upon this Law had paid $31,315.40, leaving the value of the marble unpaid $3,431.83. These two items of $2,738.78 and $3,431.83 represent the sums sued for by plaintiff for which he obtained judgment.

Appellant, however, contends, and it is without dispute, that the contract price for all the marble actually set in the building and measured therein upon its completion amounted to the sum of $33,908.45; that it is equally without dispute that $7,404.35 of this amount was marble saved from the disaster; that, deducting this latter sum from the former, there is left $26,504.10 as the contract price of the marble shipped after the disaster and actually set in the building. Appellant shows, further, that there was an excess of marble shipped over that used in the building amounting to $8,243.13. It is by all parties conceded that Law was not in the business of buying marble, and that under his contract he needed and was required to take only the marble called for by the specifications for the Monadnock Building, and, so far as the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff is concerned, it is all to the effect that it was intended to cut and ship no more marble than was called for by the plans and specifications. Nevertheless, there was shipped this excess in value of $8,243.13. The explanation probably is that after the disaster the plaintiff did not make an allowance for the $7,404.35 of marble saved therefrom, but duplicated the original quantity called for by the contract.

Appellant still further argues and shows that immediately after the disaster there was a balance unpaid upon the marble shipped of $2,730.78; that there was marble saved to the value of $7,404.35. Deducting from this the sum of $2,730.78, which was owing, $4,665.57 had been paid upon the marble saved from the disaster and placed in the building. Upon the shipment of marble made after the disaster, there has admittedly been paid $31,315.40, making a total payment for the marble actually set in the building of $35,980.97. But (so runs appellant's argument) the value of all marble set in the building, measured by its contract price, was only $33,908.45, from which results the inevitable conclusion that appellant, instead of being indebted to plaintiff, has made payments in excess of the full contract price, and for the excess marble, wherever it is or whatever it may be, appellant disclaims all liability and responsibility. Respondent, in effect, concedes this to be true if his rights are to be measured by the contract between Perrin and Law embodied in the written communications above set forth, and in particular, if his rights are to be affected by Perrin's letter of February 23, 1906, where the declaration is made over Perrin's signature that Law is to pay only for the actual marble set in the building, and there measured. To avoid the effect of this, respondent contends that Law assented to and accepted the assignment made by Perrin to Fleming; that at the time this assignment was so made and assented to he, Fleming, did not know of the modification of the contract contained in the letter of the 23d of February, and that, therefore, he is not bound by it; and that the legal conclusions which necessarily follow from this are that Law agreed to pay the full contract price for the marble shipped, 90 per cent. of that contract price when the marble was f. o. b. cars at Colton, and 10 per cent. upon delivery, and that any excess marble belongs to Law and should be paid for by him.

[1, 2] Thus it will be seen that the legal controversy between these parties revolves around two propositions: (1) Did Law assent to Perrin's assignment of his contract to Fleming to the extent that Fleming became substituted for Perrin therein? (2) Was this assent to the assignment, if given, given under such circumstances as to relieve Fleming from the operation of the modification contained in Perrin's letter to Law of February 23d? Without hesitation both of these questions must be answered in the negative. As to the first, Law's response to Fleming's letter is a distinct refusal to recognize the assignment and to relieve Perrin from his responsibility thereunder. He was willing to go no further, and did go no further, than to declare that he would recognize in favor of Fleming such orders for the payment of moneys due to Perrin arising under the contract as Perrin might give. Such an order was actually given and was honored by Law. Upon the second proposition, it is, of course, beyond argument that, if Fleming had not been substituted for Perrin as assignee under the contract with the acceptance of Law, Law and Perrin were at perfect liberty to make such modifications and changes in their contract as they saw fit.

[3] The modification evidenced by the letter of February 23d, however respondent may argue against the unreasonableness of it, was precisely such a modification as was contemplated in the original "square foot" contract where it is said: "It is understood that this per square foot agreement will be substituted for a lump sum contract, this contract to be drawn and entered into as soon as sufficient drawings have been completed to enable us to do so." Perrin himself testified: "He sent me a paper [meaning the letter of February 23d which Perrin signed], and asked me to do as I had agreed to and sign that paper, and I did so. Q. You had agreed to sign such a paper a year before? A. Yes, sir. Q. And had put it off from month to month until February 23, 1906, when you signed the paper? A. Yes, sir. Q. Whereby the amount of money that you were to receive was to depend upon the actual measurement of marble in the building set up? A. Yes, sir."

We do not perceive in Perrin's testimony anything at variance with the modification of the contract and the explanation of it just quoted.

[4] Nor, if there were, in the absence of fraud, coercion, or mutual mistake, nothing of which is here asserted, could a witness be permitted, by a mere declaration of his concept of a written contract, to overthrow its plain, unmistakable, and unambiguous language.

It necessarily follows herefrom that under his contract with Perrin Law was responsible only for the contract price of the marble set and measured in the building, and it was the duty of the trial court to have so instructed the jury as matter of law. It was error for the court to leave to the jury, under the circumstances here shown, the determination of the question as to whether or not plaintiff could recover under the original square foot contract unmodified by the letter of February 23d.

Under the conclusion thus reached, no other propositions advanced by appellant require consideration.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

1. TAXATION (§ 49*)—TAX SALES—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

A proceeding by which an owner is divested of title through a sale by the state for $166 of land bought by the state for delinquent taxes, that amount being $149.81 in excess of the amount of taxes, interest, and costs on payment of which the owner might have redeemed, does not infringe Const. art. 13, which requires all property to be taxed in proportion to its value.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by William Chapman against George Zobelein. From an order in defendant's favor, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles Lantz, for appellant. Edward F. Wehrle, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to quiet title. The complaint is in the usual form, alleging ownership in plaintiff. Defendant's title is based upon a tax sale to the state, followed by a deed to the state and a conveyance to him from the state. All the points raised appear to have been determined adversely to appellant on a former appeal as herein entitled, reported in 152 Cal. 216, 92 Pac. 188.

As we understand appellant, he admits that all the proceedings whereby title to the property was vested in defendant were duly had and taken pursuant to the laws of California. His contention is that, conceding the lot was sold to the state for the delinquent tax of 1898, and no redemption thereof made within the time fixed therefor by law, by reason whereof the legal title to the lot was conveyed to the state, nevertheless the state had no power to sell and convey title to the entire lot for an amount in excess of that upon payment of which the owner of the lot was entitled to redeem the same before such sale made by the state. At the date of the sale to defendant, the amount of the taxes, interest, and penalties against the lot was $16.19. The state, however, in the manner provided by law, sold the entire lot for $166, and the sum of $149.81 in excess of the $16.19 accrued for taxes, interest, and costs, and upon payment of which at any time before the sale plaintiff might have redeemed the lot (section 3785a, Pol. Code), was paid into the public treasury, and the owner of the lot received no compensation for that part of his lot which it is claimed was unnecessary to be sold in order to collect the amount due on the property. Plaintiff alleged, and at the trial offered evidence tending to prove, that, on the date of the sale made by the state to defendant, the lot was reasonably worth $500, and that the witness would willingly have paid the $16.19, covering interest, penalties, and taxes thereon, for a part thereof consisting of the easterly or northerly 10 feet thereof, thus leaving the remainder of the lot to the owner. This evidence was excluded, and the ruling is assigned as error.

The points now presented are: (1) That the proceeding under which the owner of the lot was divested of title thereto, and which resulted in a sale of the whole property for $166, when the proceeds from a sale of a less quantity would have sufficed to pay the amount of $16.19 due to the state, is unconstitutional by reason of being obnoxious to section 1 of article 13 of the Constitution of the state of California, which provides that "all property in the state * * * shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law." (2) That the proceeding constituted a taking of plaintiff's property without due process of law, in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States which provides that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person * * * of property without due process of law." (3) That the sale of the whole property to the person who would pay the largest sum of money therefor was in violation of that portion of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States which provides that no state shall make or enforce any law which shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; and likewise in violation of that portion of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States which provides that "no person shall * * * be deprived of * * * property without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation," and also in violation of the provision of section 14 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state of California which provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation having been first made to or paid into court for the owner.

On the former appeal of this case, reported in 152 Cal., at page 221, 92 Pac., at page 190, the Supreme Court said: "The question of the power of the state to provide that the sale of its title, after the expiration of the redemption period of five years, shall be made for the highest price offered regardless of the amount that may have accrued against the property for taxes, penalties, interest, and costs, was fully considered in the case of Fox v. Wright, 152 Cal. 60, 91 Pac. 1005, and it was there held that the state had such power." In the case of Young v. Patterson, 9 Cal. App. 471, 99 Pac. 553, this court said: "The sale vests the equitable, and the deed the legal, title of the land in the state. Santa Barbara v. Savings Socy., 137 Cal. 463 [70 Pac. 457]. As against the state, the property owner at the end of five years has forfeited all rights in the property, except the privilege accorded him by the statute, of redeeming it at any time before the state actually enters, sells, or disposes of it. Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 560 [89 Pac. 352]." Section 3785a, Pol. Code. In discussing the constitutionality of the statutory proceedings under consideration, the Supreme Court, in Fox v. Wright, supra, says: "We are unable to discover any constitutional objection which interposes and invalidates the state's title, and none has been pointed out. We are unable to see why the state may not obtain a title free from all equities in the former owner at the expiration of five years as may a private citizen after foreclosure upon the mortgage when the period of redemption following such foreclosure has passed."

Whatever conclusion the higher courts may reach in considering the matter, this court deems itself bound by the authorities cited, and it is therefore unnecessary to enter upon any extended discussion of the constitutional question presented by appellant. So holding, it follows there was no error in the ruling of the trial court in excluding the evidence offered.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, May 11, 1912. On Petition for Rehearing, June 10, 1912. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 10, 1912.)

1. TRIAL (§ 356*)—SPECIAL VERDICT—ANSWERS TO SPECIAL QUESTIONS.

Where the court in the exercise of its discretionary power under Code Civ. Proc. § 625, as amended by St. 1909, p. 193, submits particular questions of fact to the jury, it is its duty to require answers to such questions, or, if the jury cannot agree on answers, to refuse to accept a general verdict if it cannot stand without proof of the facts submitted.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 250*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—COMPLAINT—CAUSE OF ACTION.

In an action by the plaintiff, who was injured by a fall from a car on which he was trolley tender, the complaint charged that plaintiff was employed by defendant as a messenger boy, and was directed by his superior to board a construction car and act under the orders of the motorman, that the trolley pole used on the car was defective, and the defect might have been discovered by defendant by reasonable care, that plaintiff was instructed to do hazardous work, which was known to defendant and unknown to plaintiff, that plaintiff was unfamiliar with the operation of cars and machinery, and that, pursuant to the orders of the motorman, he attempted to pull down the trolley pole which broke, and caused him to lose his balance, and fall in front of the car where he was injured. Held, that the theory of the complaint was not that the injury solely resulted from the company's negligence in failing to discover the defect in the trolley pole, but was also based on the company's negligence in ordering plaintiff into a dangerous situation without warning, and the recovery might be had on that ground, though the injury would not have resulted if the trolley pole had not been defective.

3. TRIAL (§ 356*)—SPECIAL VERDICT—ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

In the above case, where the jury rendered a general verdict for plaintiff their disagreement as to answers to special questions, whether the trolley pole was out of repair, and whether the condition of the pole was known to plaintiff, or might have been discovered by reasonable care, did not invalidate the general verdict, which could be supported on the theory of defendant's negligence in failing to warn plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 849-854; Dec. Dig. § 356.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 153*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—WARNING.

Where the master employs a servant in dangerous work or on dangerous machinery, and the servant, from youth or inexperience, fails to appreciate the danger, the master must give him suitable warning and complete instructions, even though the servant consents to the employment; and so a master who failed to warn a young boy, who was ordered to act as a trolley tender and to handle dangerous appliances, is guilty of negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 314-317; Dec. Dig. § 153.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 297*)—VERDICT—CONFLICT WITH INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against a master for injuries received by plaintiff, a trolley tender, whose complaint relied, not only on the master's negligence in furnishing a defective trolley pole, but on its negligence in ordering him to undertake that hazardous employment without warning, a general verdict in favor of plaintiff will not be set aside as in conflict with an instruction that the defendant would not be liable for any injury to plaintiff by reason of the defective condition of a pole, if it did not know, or could not have known by reasonable care, of such defect, even though the jury failed to agree on the question of the negligence as regards the pole.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1195-1198; Dec. Dig. § 297.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REFUSAL OF REQUEST.

A request covered by the charge as given is properly refused.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

In an action against a master, where the plaintiff relied, not only on the master's negligence in furnishing a defective appliance, but on its negligence in failing to warn him, and the jury, while returning the general verdict for plaintiff, failed to agree on a special question as to the master's negligence in furnishing the appliance, the refusal of an instruction that there could be no recovery for the master's negligence, unless it was a probable cause of the injury, was harmless, in so far as it referred to the furnishing of the defective appliance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4225-4228, 4230; Dec. Dig. § 1068.*]

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 189*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—FELLOW SERVANTS—WHO ARE.

Where the general foreman of construction of a street railway company ordered a messenger boy who had been sent to him to act under his orders to serve as a trolley tender, and told him to act under the orders of the motorman, not only was the foreman a vice principal as to the boy, but so was the motorman, and in neither case would his right to recover for injuries be lost because of the negligence of either of those; their negligence being that of the master.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 427-435, 437-448; Dec. Dig. § 189.*]

9. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Instructions should not be submitted on issues not raised by the evidence, and hence, in a personal injury action by a servant who had been ordered to act under the orders of another servant, an instruction that if he had two ways to perform his duties, one safe and the other hazardous, he would be guilty of contributory negligence if he adopted the hazardous method, was properly refused.

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1056*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

In a personal injury action by a servant who relied, not only on the master's furnishing a defective appliance, but on its negligence in failing to warn him of dangers where the verdict eliminated from consideration the negligence in regard to the appliance, the exclusion of evidence showing the master's care in the selection of appliances was not prejudicial to the master.

On Petition for Rehearing.

11. STATUTES (§ 255*)—ENACTMENT—TIME OF EFFECT.

As the amendment (St. 1909, p. 193) to Code Civ. Proc. § 625, which was approved on March 6, 1909, fixed no time for its going into effect, it did not, under the provisions of Pol. Code, § 323, go into effect until the sixtieth day after its passage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 336; Dec. Dig. § 255.*]

12. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 129*)—PROXIMATE CAUSE OF INJURY—INDEPENDENT INTERVENING CAUSE.

One originally negligent cannot escape liability for the proximate results of his negligence merely because of the manner of the accident, and hence where a master negligently failed to warn a servant of the dangers incident to acting as a trolley tender, and the servant because of his ignorance was injured by the breaking of a trolley pole, the master cannot escape because the accident was caused by the defective pole or because the servant, without knowledge of the dangers, consented to act in that capacity; neither being an independent intervening cause.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by John O. O'Connell by Lawrence O'Connell, his guardian ad litem, against the United Railroads of San Francisco. From judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. A. Moore, Stanley Moore, and Wm. M. Cannon, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action for personal injuries. The cause was tried by a jury and a verdict returned in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $6,000; the plaintiff having asked for $30,000. Judgment was given and entered in accordance with the terms of the verdict so returned, and this appeal is by the defendant from said judgment and the order denying it a new trial.

There is no dispute as to the circumstances under which the accident and consequent injuries to the plaintiff occurred. The principal point of controversy is whether, under the averments of the complaint, the general verdict may be sustained in view of the failure of the jury to return answers to certain particular questions of fact submitted to them by the court on motion of the defendant. There are other points made on the instructions and the rulings of the court on the evidence, but the disposition of these will hinge largely upon the result reached as to the main point above referred to. The defendant, a corporation, is engaged in the business of "running and maintaining and operating certain lines of street railway in the city and county of San Francisco over and upon certain streets" in said city, and at the time the plaintiff sustained the injuries complained of, and from time to time prior thereto, was engaged in constructing, altering, and repairing certain portions of its railway system. For that purpose it operated, by means of electricity and trolley poles, cars for carrying dirt from certain points on its said lines of railway to other points on said lines.

It appears that in the year 1902, when the plaintiff was a lad of about the age of 14 years, he left school for the purpose of seeking and procuring work, and that he was given employment by the defendant. At first he was put to work carrying and distributing drinking water to and among the workmen engaged in construction work on the defendant's railway lines. He performed this service for a period of about six months, when the defendant put him to work as a messenger, whose duties were to carry letters and requests for tools between the construction points and the railroad office. In the last-mentioned capacity he acted for about six months, having then been continuously in the employment of the company for about a year. He was discharged from the service of the company in May, 1903. Up to this time the plaintiff had never had any experience with or in the use of machinery of any kind or character, and had no knowledge of the manner of manipulating cars operated by electricity, nor did he know anything about the appliances or machinery by means of which such cars are operated. After his discharge from the service of the defendant, he obtained employment with the Key Route Railway Company in Oakland. While employed with that company he was put to "drilling holes in rails with a ratchet for the purpose of putting in bond wires between the rails." He continued in the service of the Key Route Company for about six months, when he secured employment involving the performance of similar duties with the Belt Railroad in the city of San Francisco, remaining with the latter until August 7, 1903, on which date he was again given employment by the defendant as a carrier of drinking water, as the same was required from time to time, to the laborers employed in construction work for the defendant. He was thus employed up to the noon hour of that day, after which, and on the same day, one Montague Graham, then general foreman of construction for the defendant, ordered him to take the position of "trolley tender" on one of the construction cars, and, in obedience to the order so given, he boarded said car, and proceeded to discharge the duties of the position to which he was thus assigned. Prior and up to the time he was put to work on said car as trolley tender, the plaintiff was still without experience in the use or manipulation of trolley poles, and possessed no knowledge of the manner of handling the mechanical appliances ordinarily employed in propelling cars operated by electricity by the trolley system. The car upon which he was assigned to duty was then in charge of one Kleupfer, the motorman, it being shown and admitted that construction cars were always in control of the motormen, and that the trolley tenders were subject to the orders of the former.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The plaintiff made several trips on the car prior to the time at which the accident occurred. It appears that the car was engaged in hauling dirt to a point on the defendant's railway system in the neighborhood of Golden Gate Park. Just before the accident, the car was standing on a bridge, where the dirt was being dumped from the car. There was but one track on the bridge. At either end of the bridge two tracks merged into the single track on the bridge. While the dirt from the car was being dumped therefrom on the afternoon of the 8th day of August—the day succeeding that on which the plaintiff was inducted into the position of trolley tender—two passenger cars, coming in opposite directions, approached either end of the bridge. It was the duty of the construction car to clear the track to enable the passenger cars to pass over the bridge, and, in order to do this, the motorman first ran his car to the south side of the bridge to let the north-bound car cross, after which he started across the bridge to the north side thereof to let the south-bound car cross. After the north-bound car had passed, the plaintiff jumped from the work car to the ground for the purpose of switching the trolley, and, as he was in the act of doing so, the motorman ordered him to jump on the "bumper" of the car. The plaintiff obeyed this order, took a position on the "bumper" in the front end of the car, and put the trolley back on the wire. The car then started across the bridge; the trolley being in the wrong direction. While the car was in motion and still on the bridge, the motorman, so the plaintiff testified, ordered him to "pull down the trolley," and, in pursuance of the order so given, he started to pull the trolley down when the trolley pole snapped about a foot from its base, with the result that plaintiff lost his balance, fell to the ground in front of the car, and received the injuries for which he is seeking damages through this action. The body of the plaintiff was jammed under the car in such manner as to require the use of a "jack" to raise the car in order to extricate him from his position. He sustained a number of bodily injuries, the most serious of which were a fractured leg, the break extending obliquely from a point just above the knee to a point on the thigh, a cut on the back part of his head, and a broken nose. He was confined to a hospital for over three months, the injured leg was left somewhat shorter than the other, the muscles on the outside of the foot had become atrophied and entirely lost their power, and the physician testified that the plaintiff would always suffer more or less pain from the injury to that limb.

The plaintiff testified that, when ordered by Graham to take the position of trolley tender, the latter made no inquiry of him as to whether he (plaintiff) had ever had any experience in that line of employment; that Graham did not explain to him at that or at any other time the character of the duties he was thus required to perform, nor did he warn plaintiff of any dangers that might be involved in the discharge of those duties.

Kleupfer, the motorman, testified that previously to the assignment of the plaintiff to the performance of the duties of trolley tender he said to Graham that he "would like to have a man tend this trolley, somebody that knows the wires and switches," as he could not do anything with the man who was then acting in that capacity. "With that," continued Kleupfer, "he [Graham] sent a boy over to me, and I looked at the boy [referring to plaintiff] when he climbed on the car, and I said: 'Mr. Graham, I don't want this boy. Can't you give me a man? * * *' He said: 'He knew all about the switches and the trolley, and is well enough versed. He has worked for the company before.' I said: 'I would like to have a man, because I don't know what will happen to this lad.' And he said, 'Go on and take him'; and I took the boy on the car and went away."

Graham, testifying for the defendant, admitted that previously to putting the plaintiff to work as a "trolley tender" he did not ask the boy whether he had ever acted in that capacity before, or whether he had ever had any experience in or with the operation of a car. He admitted that he did not even know the extent of Kleupfer's experience as a motorman or what Kleupfer's ability was as a motorman, although he testified, all that he said to the plaintiff when ordering him to take the position of conductor or "trolley tender" was that the motorman would tell him what to do, and where to go, and what switches to take. Graham further admitted that at no time did he explain to the plaintiff the performance of the duties of a "trolley tender" or give plaintiff any warning that the trolley might fall or be pulled down. And upon this point the plaintiff testified that the motorman, prior to the accident, gave him no instructions as to his duties with the exception of telling him how to open and close the switches and to adjust the trolley to the wire; that he did not at any time warn the plaintiff of the dangerous character of the work to which he (plaintiff) had been assigned by Graham. There was evidence received to the effect that, when the plaintiff entered upon the discharge of the duties of "trolley tender" the trolley pole was in a defective condition, and that plaintiff had discovered and knew that the pole was bent or not in perfect condition after he had operated it for a short time.

As previously stated, there is practically no disagreement between counsel with respect to the circumstances under which the plaintiff was put to work as a conductor on the work car or of the circumstances attending the accident. But we have given a brief résumé of the facts as developed by the evidence in order to facilitate a clear apprehension of the principal point urged here against the soundness of the general verdict. But, to obtain a clear understanding of the main proposition contended for by the defendant with reference to the issues tendered by the complaint, it will also be necessary and at this time the more orderly to refer to and reproduce some of the averments of plaintiff's pleading.

Paragraph 7 of the complaint charges that the plaintiff, while employed as a messenger boy by the defendant, was ordered and directed by the latter to board the construction car heretofore referred to for the purpose of acting as conductor thereon, and that he was ordered and directed by the defendant, while so acting as conductor, to obey all orders given him by the motorman in charge of said car.

Paragraph 8 alleges that the trolley pole used on said car was, at the time the plaintiff was put to work as indicated, defective and out of repair, and that such condition of said pole was known to the defendant, "or, in the exercise of reasonable care, would have become known to said defendant, and was unknown to plaintiff."

Paragraphs 10, 11, 12, and 13 read as follows:

"(10) That at the time said plaintiff was given said instruction last aforesaid said work which plaintiff was instructed to do was dangerous and hazardous, all of which was known to said defendant and unknown to said plaintiff.

"(11) That at all of said times said plaintiff was unfamiliar with and inexperienced in the operation of said cars and the handling of said trolley poles, and at all of said times was unaware of the dangerous and hazardous character of the work which he was ordered to do, all of which was known to said defendant.

"(12) That pursuant to said order aforesaid, and while said car was proceeding in a northerly direction as aforesaid, and under the circumstances aforesaid, said trolley pole was pulled down by plaintiff, by means of said rope, for the purpose of switching it from said overhead wire, with which it was in contact, to said other wire. That as plaintiff pulled said trolley pole as aforesaid, by means of which said rope, below said wire, with which said trolley was in contact, said trolley pole, by reason of its being out of repair, and by reason of its being in a defective condition, suddenly broke, thereby causing plaintiff to lose his balance and fall from the place where he was standing, to wit, on said bumper located on the front of said car, to the ground.

"(13) Then and there, by reason of plaintiff's fall to the ground in front of said car, said car (then in motion) came into violent collision with plaintiff, and ran over him, then and there inflicting upon him the following injuries."

The complaint, as counsel for plaintiff contend, proceeds upon the theory that the defendant was guilty of two different and distinct acts of negligence, upon either of which, singly, or both operating concurrently to produce the injuries complained of, a recovery may be predicated.

On the other hand, the defendant first contends that (to use the language of its counsel) "although it is stated in paragraphs 10 and 11 of the complaint that this work which the plaintiff had been instructed to do was dangerous and hazardous, which was known to the defendant, but unknown to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff had never been warned nor instructed concerning this danger, but was inexperienced in the operation of cars, and the knowledge of trolley poles, and unaware of the dangerous character of the work, all of which was known to the defendant, the plaintiff cannot recover on the basis of any of these allegations because it is not stated in the complaint that any of these matters caused or were responsible for the injuries received by the plaintiff. Having alleged what caused his injuries, the plaintiff is limited to that basis of recovery. Having stated that he was injured by reason of the trolley pole being out of repair and in a defective condition, and not having alleged that he was injured by reason of any other act or omission, he cannot predicate liability on any such act or omission, but is confined to the one theory that the defective condition of the trolley pole was the cause of his injuries, and his recovery must be based solely upon that ground."

The court submitted to the jury a number of special questions of fact involved in the issue of negligence attributed to the alleged omission of the defendant to maintain a trolley pole in perfectly sound and safe condition, and likewise submitted a number of particular questions of fact involved in the alleged act of negligence of the defendant in failing to properly instruct and warn the plaintiff that the duties to which it had assigned him were dangerous and hazardous.

The jury returned affirmative answers to the questions whether the trolley pole was out of repair at the time of the accident to plaintiff, and whether, at the same time, such condition of said pole was known to plaintiff. Upon the several other questions relating to the condition of the pole, calling for a direct decision of the propositions whether the pole was defective, whether such condition was known to the defendant at the time of the accident, and of whether the defendant, by the exercise of reasonable care, could have known of the condition of the pole as found by the jury, the jury could not agree, or, to be more explicit, the three-fourths of the number of the jury requisite to form and return answers, could not agree upon responses to said questions and so reported to the court. It is therefore contended by the defendant that, the jury having thus failed to return answers to the particular questions of fact involved in what it conceives to be the only and single issue of negligence submitted by the complaint, such failure was tantamount to a failure of the jury to agree upon the general verdict. In other words, it is the contention that the negligence alleged in paragraph 12 of the complaint being the only negligence upon which the plaintiff relies for a recovery, unless such negligence was proved, the general verdict could not stand, and that the failure of the jury to answer the particular questions of fact involved in that issue of negligence proved that the jury could not agree upon the facts essential to the support of the general verdict. Under these circumstances, it is further urged, it was the duty of the court not to accept the general verdict.

[1] At the time of the trial of this action, under the terms of section 625 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as said section was amended by the Legislature of 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 193), it rested, as it does now, entirely in the discretion of the trial court whether particular questions of fact should be submitted to the jury in certain classes of cases. Prior to said amendment and under an amendment of said section by the Legislature of 1905 (Stats. 1905, p. 56), it was compulsory upon the court to submit such questions to the jury where they were requested and so framed as that answers thereto would have the effect of testing the validity of the general verdict; that is to say, of determining whether all the facts essential to the support of the general verdict were established to the satisfaction of the jury by the evidence. But it is no doubt the settled rule that where the court submits such particular questions to the jury and they in form and substance comply with the conditions laid down by the Chief Justice in Plyler v. Pac., etc., Cement Co., 152 Cal. 125, 134, 92 Pac. 56, it is as well the duty of the court where the matter of the submission of such questions rests solely in its discretion as it is or would be where such submission is compulsory to require answers to such questions, or, if the jury cannot agree upon answers thereto, to refuse to accept the general verdict. See Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 379, 113 Pac. 663; Clementson on Special Verdicts, p. 107. And it is, of course, very evident that, if, as in the Stein Case, supra, the unanswered questions above referred to called for answers as to facts without the proof of which the plaintiff could not support his action or a recovery, the effect of the failure by the jury to answer said questions would be to vitiate the general verdict.

[2] We are, however, not in accord with the defendant's construction of the complaint or of the scope and effect of the averments thereof, or, in other words, with its conception of the theory as to negligence upon which the complaint has proceeded, and are, therefore, of the opinion that the failure of the jury to return replies to the particular questions bearing upon the issue as to the defective condition of the trolley pole cannot justly be held to constitute or amount to a disagreement by the jury upon the general verdict. In other words, we do not assent to the proposition as contended for by the defendant that the plaintiff has in his pleading predicated his claim to relief solely upon the negligence involved in the alleged act of the defendant in suffering the trolley pole to be and to remain in a defective condition. Indeed, scrutinizing that pleading, in its entirety and viewing and construing the charging parts of its allegations together and as a whole, it cannot, with reason, be held that the plaintiff relies any more upon the negligence to be inferred from the averments concerning the defective condition of the pole than upon the negligence implied from the averments as to the omission of the defendant to instruct and warn the plaintiff respecting the dangerous and hazardous character of the work in which he was ordered by the defendant to engage. It will readily be perceived that neither the averments involving the charge that the pole was defective and out of repair, nor those setting out the failure of the defendant to warn the plaintiff of the dangerous character of the duties imposed upon him directly charge negligence. As to the alleged defectiveness of the trolley pole, the complaint, it will be noted, merely avers that "said trolley pole, by reason of its being in a defective condition, suddenly broke, thereby causing the plaintiff to lose his balance and fall from the place where he was standing," etc. This averment could and perhaps did speak the truth—that is, that plaintiff fell to the ground and sustained his injuries by the breaking of a defective trolley pole—yet it cannot in any degree impair or detract from the force of the averment from which it is to be inferred that the defendant was primarily at fault by its failure to do the very first duty it owed to the plaintiff, viz., to warn him of the fact, of which it possessed knowledge, that the work which it had directed him to perform was usually attended by hazard and danger to him who performed it. It may be suggested that, if the complaint had directly charged that the injuries to plaintiff were proximately occasioned by the negligence of the defendant in maintaining the defective trolley pole and no special or direct charge of negligence were alleged in connection with the averment that the defendant omitted to warn the plaintiff of the dangerous character of the duties to which it had assigned him, then, perhaps, some ground for the defendant's position might exist, and a different question might, consequently, confront us. But, as we have shown, the complaint nowhere by direct language specifically charges negligence to the defendant, but relies solely upon a description of certain acts from either of which negligence must necessarily be inferred. It must be kept in mind that this is not one of those cases in which the question arises as to which of two distinct causes, produced by two separate persons, proximately occasioned the injuries. The two alleged wrongful acts here are laid at the door of the same person. It can make no difference which of those acts caused the injuries, or whether both, operating together, caused them. The result is the same, so far as fixing the liability upon the defendant is concerned. And clearly neither of said acts rests or is dependent upon the other for the statement of a case of culpable negligence.

[3] The real and only issues tendered by the complaint, then, are: Did the plaintiff receive the injuries as alleged in the complaint? If so, was it by and through the negligence of the defendant that such injuries were proximately produced? Manifestly, it was for the jury to decide these issues, and it was within their right and province under the issues as thus submitted, having found that the injuries had been received, to determine from the evidence whether the negligence of the defendant in producing them was in the alleged act of maintaining a defective trolley pole or in its alleged failure to properly or at all warn and instruct the plaintiff as to the danger and hazard lurking in the duties which it required him to perform and in the execution of which he sustained such injuries, or in both the alleged wrongful acts operating together. It follows, therefore, that, although the jury might have conceived themselves justified by the evidence in acquitting the defendant of culpability as to the matter of the alleged defective trolley pole, still they were authorized, if the evidence warranted such conclusion, in basing their verdict upon the negligence of the defendant in omitting to warn and instruct the plaintiff as to the hazards of the undertaking which it had directed him to assume. And this it is clearly manifest from the general verdict and the answers returned to certain of the particular questions of fact submitted to them is precisely what the jury did.

We have already seen that the jury could not agree upon responses to some of the essentially material particular questions of fact involved in the issue as to the alleged defect in the trolley pole. But, as before stated, they did agree upon and return answers to all the particular questions involved in the issue as to the negligence of the defendant in failing to instruct the plaintiff that the duties of trolley tender involved hazard and danger to an inexperienced person undertaking to discharge them. The answers so given involved express findings by the jury of these facts: That the defendant, as alleged in the complaint, ordered the plaintiff to take the position of conductor on one of its work cars; that the plaintiff was ordered by the defendant while on said car to obey all orders given by the motorman in charge of said car; that a short time before the accident the said motorman directed plaintiff to stand upon the bumper of said car, and that the danger of plaintiff's position on the bumper was not obvious to a person of his age, experience, and capacity; that the work of trolley tender upon the car upon which plaintiff was put to work was dangerous and hazardous; that the danger of such employment was unknown to plaintiff; that, before the accident, plaintiff was not given by the defendant sufficient instructions with regard to the performance of his duties as trolley tender; that, prior to the accident, the defendant did not warn the plaintiff concerning the danger or hazard of his work as trolley tender; that at the time of the accident the plaintiff was unfamiliar with, and inexperienced in, the operation of said car; that at that time plaintiff was unfamiliar with, and inexperienced in, the handling of said trolley pole; that the plaintiff, at the time of the accident, was not aware of the danger and hazard involved in the work which he was engaged in at that time. These findings, when considered in connection with the failure of the jury to return express findings upon the other issue of negligence made by the complaint, clearly show this: That while reaching the conclusion that the fact of plaintiff's admitted knowledge of the defective condition of the pole constituted contributory negligence, or, perhaps, more strictly, an assumption of risk on his part upon that issue, and that, therefore, the defendant should be held blameless for consequences flowing from the defectiveness of the pole, the jury were, nevertheless, satisfied from the evidence that the defendant negligently failed to instruct and warn the plaintiff—a mere boy, having no previous experience whatsoever in such employment—as to the hazardous nature of the duties which it had thus imposed upon him, and that, by reason of such negligence on the part of the defendant, the plaintiff was injured. And it cannot for a moment be doubted that the general verdict is consistent with and supported by the findings last referred to, and that, as before shown, the attitude of the jury on the other issue of negligence, as evidenced by its report to the court on the particular questions submitted to them thereon, does not conflict with nor in any manner or measure invalidate the general verdict.

[4] It will, of course, not be disputed that the settled rule is that, where the master employs a servant to do dangerous work or to do work necessarily requiring him to handle or move about machinery of a dangerous character, "who, from youth, inexperience, ignorance or want of capacity, may fail to appreciate the danger surrounding him, at such work, it is a breach of duty for the master to expose such servant, even with his own consent, to such danger, or to place him in a position where it shall become necessary for him to encounter the same without first giving him such full and complete instructions as will enable him to fully and completely comprehend them, and to do the work safely, and with proper care on the servant's part." From an instruction approved in Clark v. Tulare Lake Dredging Co., 14 Cal. App. 439, 112 Pac. 564, and founded upon the rule as laid down in Foley v. Cal. Horseshoe Co., 115 Cal. 184, 47 Pac. 42, 56 Am. St. Rep. 87.

In the last-mentioned case the court points out certain conditions upon which a minor, employed about dangerous machinery, may himself be held responsible for any accident and consequent injury that might happen to him while engaged about or in operating such machinery, but, on the other hand, it unreservedly approves the general rule as to the employment of minors as it is thus enunciated in Turner v. Norfolk, etc., Ry. Co., 40 W. Va. 675, 22 S. E. 83: "A minor cannot be expected to set up his opinion, however mature, against the judgment and experience of those maturer and older to whom he is given in charge, but he is taught the lesson of obedience from his cradle, and he is required to respect the commands, and to pay deference to the judgment of his elders, until legally emancipated at the age of 21 years. And it would be an extreme case in which a minor should be guilty of contributory negligence in obeying the orders of his foreman, representing his master."

The brief reference we have made to the evidence is, we think, sufficient to disclose that the case here comes clearly within the doctrine invoked and applied in the cases above cited. Here we have a lad scarcely beyond the age of 14 years, who, when called to the employment in the execution of which he was injured, was acting as a mere messenger boy, without the slightest experience in the manipulation of the mechanical appliances usually used in the operation of trolley cars, and, without warning or instruction as to the character or hazard of such employment by the defendant or its agent, put to work as a trolley tender, and thus compelled to assume the responsibility of performing duties as to the performance of which, we are justified in saying, even an adult, for his own protection as well as that of the public, should first be given specific, clear, and definite instructions before he should be permitted to assume the responsibility of performing them. But, whether because of youth, inexperience, and ignorance the plaintiff was altogether unfitted for the performance of such duties, and unable to realize or appreciate the danger or hazard involved therein, and whether, under all the circumstances appearing, the defendant was guilty of that remissness, in the discharge of the duty it owed to the plaintiff, censurable in law, by failing to instruct the latter how to perform the duties to which it had assigned him and to warn him as to the hazards involved therein before he was put upon their performance, constituted questions whose solution was peculiarly a matter for the jury, and, as previously stated, we perceive no reason for doubting that upon that issue alone the jury founded their verdict and that their conclusion as thus expressed and as evidenced by their answers to the particular questions of fact involved in said issue, is amply supported by the proofs.

The defendant complains of a number of errors, which it claims were prejudicial to its rights, in the action of the court involving its charge to the jury. It will not be necessary to give all these assignments special notice. It may be remarked generally that the court instructed the jury clearly and fully upon all the issues upon which enlightenment as to principles of law pertinent thereto was essential to a just determination of the case as made by the pleadings and proof.

[5] What we have heretofore had to say concerning the issues as to negligence tendered by the complaint is substantially a reply to the contention that the general verdict is against law because it is in conflict with instruction No. 32, given by the court at the request of the defendant, and declaring that the defendant would not be liable for any injury suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the defective condition of the trolley if, finding said pole to be defective and out of repair, the defendant, at the time of the accident, did not know, and by the exercise of reasonable care could not have discovered, such condition of said pole. We need not, therefore, give the point thus advanced further consideration.

The above observation is equally pertinent to instructions Nos. 3 and 10, submitted to the jury on the motion of the plaintiff; the questions involved therein having already been examined and decided against the contention of the defendant with regard thereto. The first of these instructions merely announced to the jury that the plaintiff, in his complaint, relies, as to negligence, upon two separate and distinct theories. This we have held to be true, and therefore the second of said instructions pertinently, and we may add correctly, declared to the jury the rule as to the duty of the master toward his servant where the latter is required or directed by the former to perform duties of a dangerous character or in a dangerous place and such servant from youth, inexperience, ignorance, or want of general capacity may fail to appreciate the dangers of such duties or place.

[6, 7] Error is further predicated upon the court's refusal to allow some of the defendant's instructions, among which is instruction No. 50, which reads as follows: "Even if you find that the defendant was negligent, such negligence was not the proximate cause of the injury, unless the defendant, in the exercise of ordinary care, ought reasonably to have foreseen that injury might result therefrom, or unless such injury was the natural and probable consequence of the master's negligence." This instruction is so general in form that it is difficult to say to which theory of negligence relied on in the complaint it was intended that it should apply. If, however, it was addressed to the alleged negligence involved in the act of maintaining a defective trolley pole, the reply to the exceptions to the court's action in refusing it is twofold: (1) That the court in its charge fully covered the law as to such alleged negligence; (2) that, even if it were error to disallow it, the error is without prejudice, since the jury practically found in favor of the defendant on the issue of negligence as to the trolley pole, or, at any rate, eliminated that theory of negligence as an issue in the case by their failure to return answers to the particular questions of fact involved therein. If, on the other hand, the instruction was designed to bear upon the other theory of negligence, the failure to allow it was also without prejudice in view of the full exposition of the law upon that question embodied in the court's charge.

Instruction No. 51, relating to the issue as to the condition of the trolley pole, proposed by the defendant, was rejected and the action of the court in that respect, even if erroneous, which we do not decide, turned out to be without prejudice because (as suggested in the above observations on defendant's proposed instruction No. 50) the issue to which it was addressed became immaterial by reason of the action of the jury thereon. Lightner Mining Co. v. Lane et al. (Sup.) 120 Pac. 771; Lowe v. San Francisco, etc., Ry. Co., 154 Cal. 573, 578, 98 Pac. 678.

[8] It is next contended that the court erred in declining to allow certain instructions proposed by the defendant on the subject of negligence of a fellow servant. The court was, in our opinion, justified in rejecting said instructions. While the answer, as one of the defenses, pleads that the injuries of the plaintiff were occasioned solely through the negligence of a fellow servant, there was not offered by the defendant, nor is there in the record, any evidence supporting that defense. The undisputed evidence, on the contrary, shows that the plaintiff was ordered by the general foreman of construction of the defendant to take the position of conductor or trolley tender on one of its work or construction cars, that said car was in the immediate control of the motorman, and that the foreman of construction directed the plaintiff to take orders as to the manner of discharging his duties as trolley tender from the motorman, saying to plaintiff that the former would show him what to do and how to do the work to which he was assigned.

It is very clear from these facts that the motorman in his relation to the plaintiff as an employé of the defendant was more than a mere fellow servant in the sense that an employer is not legally liable for injuries sustained by one servant through the negligence of a fellow servant. Under the circumstances as revealed by the evidence, he was the agent of the defendant or its vice principal. It may be said to be true that in a general sense, or generally speaking, the motorman and conductor of an electric work car are fellow servants, but the books are full of cases showing where one fellow servant, in the discharge of a particular duty for his employer, may become, by reason of the peculiar nature of such duty, the master's agent so as to bind the latter for any damage resulting from its negligent execution. The rule is that, where the master owes a duty to his employé, he cannot escape responsibility for its proper performance, or liability for an injury to one servant occasioned by a failure to perform such duty, by delegating its performance to another servant. Tedford v. Los Angeles Elec. Co., 124 Cal. 79, 66 Pac. 76, 54 L. R. A. 85. It is said in that case "that the fellow servant to whom the performance of such duties is assigned becomes, with respect to that particular duty, the special representative of the employer—sometimes called a vice principal. In such case negligence of the servant is the negligence of the principal, for which the latter must answer. See Daves v. Southern Pac. Co., 98 Cal. 19 [32 Pac. 708, 35 Am. St. Rep. 133]; Callan v. Bull, 113 Cal. 593 [45 Pac. 1017]; Elledge v. National R. R. Co., 100 Cal. 282, [34 Pac. 720, 852, 38 Am. St. Rep. 290]; Nixon v. Selby, etc., Co., 102 Cal. 458 [36 Pac. 803]. * * *

It is also one of these duties to give careful instructions, directions, and warnings to a youthful or inexperienced servant of unusual and hidden dangers, of which the employer is aware, and of which the servant, to the employer's knowledge, is ignorant." But there can be absolutely no doubt that the general foreman of construction, who ordered the boy to assume and discharge the duties of conductor, was in no sense a fellow servant of the plaintiff. The respective general duties of the two were altogether dissimilar. He exercised authority, in the service of the defendant, superior to that of the plaintiff. He in point of fact, among other duties, had the authority, if not to employ laborers, to assign them to particular duties in the work of construction, etc. Within the scope of his duties, he was, therefore, strictly a vice principal or agent of the defendant, and upon him rested the duty which the defendant owed to the plaintiff of so instructing and warning the latter as to the dangers of the duties of conductor as to enable him to fully realize and appreciate such dangers. Ingerman v. Moore, 90 Cal. 410, 27 Pac. 306, 25 Am. St. Rep. 138, and authorities cited; Ryan v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 112 Cal. 244, 44 Pac. 471, 32 L. R. A. 524; Gibson v. Sterling Furniture Co., 113 Cal. 1, 45 Pac. 5; Verdelli v. Gray's Harbor, etc., Co., 115 Cal. 517, 47 Pac. 364, 778; Higgins v. Williams, 114 Cal. 176, 45 Pac. 1041; Mullin v. Cal. Horseshoe Co., 105 Cal. 77, 38 Pac. 535; Hanley v. California, etc., Co., 127 Cal. 232, 59 Pac. 577, 47 L. R. A. 597; Shea v. Pac. Power Co., 145 Cal. 680, 79 Pac. 373. His failure, therefore, to warn and instruct the plaintiff as to the hazards of the employment in which he was thus required to engage—hazards unusual to a youth without previous experience in such work—constituted the act of omission and consequent negligence of the defendant.

As before indicated, it is clear that all the evidence upon that question plainly and unmistakably shows that both the motorman and the general foreman of construction, in their transactions with the plaintiff as shown by such evidence, sustained the relation of vice principals to the defendant, and that, there having been introduced into the record no evidence showing or tending to show that they were fellow servants of the plaintiff in the sense that the defendant could not be held responsible for any act or acts of theirs resulting in injury to plaintiff, it follows that the rejection of the instructions here referred to did not constitute error.

[9] It is a proposition too obvious to require reference to authorities to prove it that a trial court is never required to submit to a jury the law upon an uncontroverted question of fact. However, the following cases expound the rule as thus stated: McNamara v. MacDonough, 102 Cal. 581, 583, 36 Pac. 941; Tompkins v. Mahoney, 32 Cal. 235; Terry v. Sickles, 13 Cal. 429; Caulfield v. Sanders, 17 Cal. 573; Pico v. Stevens, 18 Cal. 376; Robinson v. W. P. R. R. Co., 48 Cal. 424; Watson v. Damon, 54 Cal. 279; State v. Osborne, 45 Iowa, 425, 428; Brickwood-Sackett on Instructions, § 199.

The rejection of defendant's proposed instruction No. 55 cannot, under the circumstances, be held to have been prejudicial to the defendant. This instruction would have told the jury that if there were two ways, one safe and the other dangerous, by which the plaintiff could have performed the duties of conductor, and that plaintiff, having knowledge of those two ways, undertook to perform those duties in the dangerous rather than the safe way, and was thereby injured, he would be guilty of contributory negligence and the defendant absolved from liability. The sole act of negligence of the defendant, according to the jury's findings, was that of failing to warn the plaintiff of the dangerous character of his duties. The plaintiff was, according to an express finding of the jury, educed from sufficient evidence, ignorant of the manner of performing the duties of trolley tender, and was ordered by the general foreman of construction to obey the directions of the motorman with regard to the performance of those duties, and, in obedience to the order thus given, was only doing what the motorman told him to do when he met with the accident. "He had," as counsel for the respondent aptly suggest "no choice of two ways in performing his duty. His duty, as he saw it, and as he had been instructed by Graham, was to obey Kleupfer." The instruction would, therefore, have had no application to the particular act of negligence upon which the jury manifestly founded their verdict.

[10] There is discussed in the briefs but one of the rulings on the evidence to which exceptions were reserved. The defendant, for the purpose of showing reasonable care in the selection of the mechanical appliances used upon its cars, sought to prove the "advertised test" of the manufacturers of the trolley poles used by it. The court, under an objection, refused to permit the defendant to show by one of its witnesses what such advertised test disclosed in that respect. The court excluded the testimony on the ground that it was hearsay. But, without deciding whether the exclusion of the testimony on that ground was or was not erroneous, it is very clear that, since the issue as to the alleged negligence of the defendant by reason of the alleged defectiveness of the trolley pole was eliminated from the case by the jury, and therefore formed no part of the basis of the general verdict, the ruling was harmless.

We have now specially noticed all the principal points which we have felt required such consideration in this opinion, and our final conclusion is, as must be apparent from the foregoing discussion, that there has been shown to exist no just reason why the judgment and order should not stand.

Accordingly, the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

HART, J. There are three propositions upon which a rehearing of this cause is asked of this court, viz.: (1) That we felt into error in the statement that the amendment by the Legislature of 1909 of section 625 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the matter of the submission of particular questions of fact and special issues to juries, by which amendment trial courts are given discretion as to the matter of the submission of such questions and issues, was in force at the time of the trial of this action; (2) that this court is mistaken in the declaration "that there was no evidence which would warrant the submission to the jury of the defense as to negligence of a fellow servant"; (3) that this court ignored the proposition contended for by the defendant, that there is "no evidence sufficient to show any causal connection between the negligence found by the jury to exist and the plaintiff's injuries," the contention being urged in the petition that the evidence affirmatively showed that there was no such causal connection.

[11] 1. As to the first point, we confess that we were in error in the declaration that section 625 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1909, had taken effect and was in force at the time of the trial of this action. We now find, upon a closer examination, that the amendment was approved on the 6th day of March, 1909, but, as no other time was fixed in the act amending the section, the amendment, under the terms of section 323 of the Political Code, did not go into effect until the sixtieth day after its passage. The trial of this action was commenced and completed before the expiration of that period, and the amendment was, therefore, not in force at that time.

But it is plainly manifest, if our conception of the issues presented by the complaint and of the effect of the answers returned by the jury to certain particular questions of fact, considered in connection with their failure to answer certain other questions, as explained in the original opinion, be sound, then it became immaterial whether the section as it stood prior to the amendment or as it stands as amended was in force and applicable at the time of the trial of this action. In our original opinion, although mistaken as to the fact of the force of the amendment at that time, we tried to make this proposition clear. At any rate, the necessary effect of our views upon this point was that it was a matter of indifference, under the circumstances of the case, whether the original or amended section was applicable. If the jury had answered favorably to the defendant all the particular questions of fact bearing upon the issue as to the defective trolley pole, there would have been no inconsistency between such answers and the general verdict, since, as is conclusively shown by the record, the general verdict was founded solely on another and different issue of negligence tendered by the complaint. After the return of the general verdict, with the answers to the particular questions of fact involved in the last-mentioned issue of negligence, said answers fully supporting the general verdict on that issue, it became wholly unnecessary to further consider the action of the jury on the particular questions of fact involved in the issue to which the general verdict could obviously have no relation. That issue was entirely eliminated from the case by the jury, and thus, figuratively yet truly speaking, it became a cadaver into whose lifeless veins no amount of blood could be injected by means of answers to interrogatories bearing thereon that could restore to it the power of respiration; hence, as stated, it became wholly immaterial whether the questions to which the jury were unable to formulate and return answers were answered or not answered, or how answered, so far as is concerned any effect any answers which might have been given might have upon the verdict as returned. See Pigeon v. Fuller, 156 Cal. 696, 701, 105 Pac. 976, where this question is exhaustively considered.

2. After a careful re-examination of the record, we are satisfied with the conclusion heretofore arrived at that there was no evidence to which the requested but rejected instructions relating to the fellow servant defense pleaded in the answer are applicable. Counsel do not claim that testimony addressed to that defense was offered by the defendant, but the contention is that whether the motorman, whose instructions as to the manner of performing his duties the plaintiff was ordered by the general foreman to obey, was a fellow servant of the plaintiff in the technical sense of that term or a vice principal of defendant in his relation to the plaintiff, "depends upon the proper construction of the evidence relating to plaintiff's age and experience, and whether he received sufficient warning or instruction," and that, therefore, it was for the jury to determine from the evidence addressed to that fact whether his age and intelligence "were sufficient to give him the discretion necessary to the discharge of his duties as trolley tender," or, "being inexperienced, he had received sufficient warning and instruction." It is argued that these facts proved, if at all, by evidence produced by the plaintiff, were reasonably susceptible of deduction from the evidence so received, and it is further argued, had the jury found that the plaintiff either had sufficient intelligence and experience and warned as to his duties and the hazardous character thereof, the defense of fellow servant would have been unquestionably established. Therefore, it is insisted, the court seriously erred by refusing to submit to the jury the question whether Kleupfer, the motorman, was a fellow servant of the plaintiff. We think that no question can arise from the evidence that the motorman, having been delegated by the general foreman of construction, of whose authority as an agent or vice principal of the defendant in the transaction with the plaintiff we entertain no doubt, to direct the plaintiff in the matter of the performance of his duties, thus became and stood toward the plaintiff as more than a mere fellow servant. In other words, we think the evidence fairly shows that, as to his relation to the plaintiff, the motorman was placed squarely in the shoes of the defendant by one having the authority to put him in that position.

But, in the light of the action of the jury as shown by their general verdict and their answers to the interrogatories relative to the issue of negligence involved in the omission of the defendant to warn the plaintiff of the hazardous nature of his employment, we are unable to perceive in the question whether the motorman was a fellow servant of the plaintiff any very great importance, so far as any influence it might exercise or effect it might have upon the particular act of negligence which the jury found was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries. Graham, who ordered the plaintiff to take the position of trolley tender and to obey the directions of the motorman, was in no sense a fellow servant. This proposition the court was at liberty to assume as a matter of law from the undisputed testimony. He was a general foreman of construction, or in fact, a deputy under the general superintendent of construction for the defendant. In his capacity as general foreman Graham had the authority to assign employés to the various employments involved in railroad construction for the defendant, or, if this is stating his authority too broadly under the evidence, he was at any rate undoubtedly given power by the superintendent of construction to assign the plaintiff to whatever employment he conceived the boy to be fitted for, or his own discretion might suggest. In the exercise of this authority, Graham clearly and unmistakably acted as the agent or vice principal of the defendant. It was, therefore, his duty, acting for the defendant in this matter, to do that which it was incumbent upon his principal to do, viz., warn the plaintiff of the dangerous character of the duties of a trolley tender. If he failed in this duty, then the fault or culpable negligence of the defendant and to which the cause of plaintiff's injuries must be traced lies, primarily, in such failure, and as it is this act of negligence which the jury found had caused the injuries, and as the act of negligence so found involves, essentially, the elements of youth, want of experience, incapacity in the plaintiff, and the duty of obedience on his part to his superiors in years, in experience and in authority, the very failure to warn him of the hazards of the duties to which he was assigned constituted the gist of the offending by the defendant. Therefore it seems to us, as already suggested, that it must be true that it can make little material difference, so far as sustaining this act of negligence is concerned, whether the legal relation existing between the plaintiff and the motorman, as coemployés of the defendant, was that of fellow servants or of employé and vice principal. In other words, the negligence of the defendant which it was found directly caused the injuries to plaintiff originated in and relates solely to the failure of the defendant to discharge the first duty it owed to a youth of inexperience and want of capacity assigned to the performance of duties beset by danger and peril to life and limb, and it seems to us that, under these circumstances, it must compel the laying down of not only an unreasonable but a barbarous rule to hold that the boy, ordered and expected, as to the manner of performing duties to which he was a stranger, to obey the person under whose immediate directions he was placed, should be held responsible for the mistakes or negligence of such person, even though the latter might have been a fellow servant within the legal meaning of that expression; for, how could this inexperienced youth, lacking in that degree of judgment necessary to be exercised in the prosecution of occupations requiring some measure of skill and which can ordinarily come only through experience, know when the directions given him by the motorman, and which he was ordered to follow, were erroneous or the result of mistaken judgment or of negligence? Most assuredly, it may be remarked, if the negligence charged against the defendant were based solely upon the alleged defective condition of the trolley pole, or if the jury had ignored or found against the plaintiff upon the issues of negligence involved in the alleged omission of the defendant to warn the plaintiff of the dangerous character of the services which it required him to perform and founded its verdict solely upon the alleged negligent maintenance of a defective trolley pole, then the question whether Kleupfer was a fellow servant would be of vital and supreme importance. But, as has been shown, the situation here represents the very reverse of the supposititious case thus stated.

But let us now see, by a brief examination of the proofs, if it is not true that the court was justified in holding, as a matter of law, that the evidence incontrovertibly established the proposition that both Graham and Kleupfer were, in the transaction of which this action is the outgrowth, acting as vice principals of the defendant, and that, therefore, the rejection of the "fellow servant" instructions was clearly warranted.

The testimony shows without contradiction that the plaintiff was without previous experience in the line of duty to which he was put; that, in fact, he had never had any experience with or in the use of the mechanical appliances employed in the operation of trolley cars; that he was warned by no one of the hazards of the occupation to which he was assigned on the car. The plaintiff testified that, when he went to work on the car, he had had no experience in the manipulation of the mechanical appliances employed in the operation of trolley cars, and that by no one was he given any warning as to the dangers involved in the discharge of the duties of trolley tender. The motorman, it will be recalled, remonstrated with Graham against putting a boy of the tender years and inexperience of plaintiff in the position of trolley tender, saying, in effect, that a boy of plaintiff's age, wanting in experience in that line of duty, might meet with an accident. Upon these points, the plaintiff and the motorman were not contradicted. Indeed, the testimony of Graham, testifying for the defendant, corroborates that of the plaintiff. He testified that he ordered the boy to take the position and to discharge the duties of trolley tender, and admitted that at no time did he warn or explain to the plaintiff the dangerous character of the duties which he had been ordered to perform. He further testified, as we have seen, that the superintendent of construction of the defendant sent the plaintiff to him (Graham) with instructions to put the lad to work at some employment, without designating the nature thereof, thus leaving to Graham, as the defendant's foreman of construction, the discretion of determining the character of the employment to which he might put the plaintiff. He admitted, and the fact is nowhere disputed, that he placed the boy as trolley tender under the direct control of the motorman, and gave the lad explicit directions to obey the orders of said motorman in the performance of his duties. Thus, it will be observed, the motorman was as to the plaintiff as employé of the defendant in the capacity of trolley tender, placed by the general foreman in the latter's position; that is, he thus became agent or vice principal of the defendant. It is therefore very clear that the court was fully justified in holding as a matter of law that the evidence showed that both Graham and the motorman, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, were vice principals of the defendant.

[12] 3. It is stated in the petition, as we have already shown, that this court in its former opinion ignored or failed to consider the contention that there is no evidence disclosing causal connection between the negligence found by the jury and the injuries sustained by the plaintiff. The negligence which the jury found had proximately caused plaintiff's injuries was fully considered in the original opinion, and it was there held, as we now hold, that the evidence was sufficient to support the finding of the jury that the direct cause of the plaintiff's injuries lay in the negligence of the defendant to warn him of hazards, connected with the discharge of his duties as trolley tender, which were not obvious to a person of his age, understanding, and want of experience.

The theory upon which the defendant appears to insist that there is no causal connection shown between the negligence of which the jury found the defendant guilty and the injuries received by the plaintiff is that, in point of fact, the immediate cause of the injuries was the breaking of the trolley pole.

But the important proposition here is not as to the particular manner in which or the immediate means by which the plaintiff received his injuries, but it is the fact that the defendant negligently put him to work in a dangerous place or where it was hazardous for a youth without experience and general capacity or proper warning to be employed in. These facts proved and the causal connection between the act of omission of the defendant and the injuries was at once established unless some efficient, independent cause operating to arrest the said first or primary causation intervened. The means by which the plaintiff sustained the injuries—that is, the immediate circumstance that precipitated the injuries—cannot in a case of this character be said to have been an independent cause, so interrupting the operation of the original cause or wrong as to have destroyed causal connection between the latter and the injuries. By this we mean to be understood as saying that, unless the plaintiff here were shown to possess experience, judgment, and capacity, or, deficient in these qualifications, had been properly warned as to the hazards of the employment into which the defendant required him to enter, the mere manner in which he may have received his injuries would not constitute an independent cause which in law would have the effect of arresting the primary cause originating in the negligence of the defendant in properly warning him of the hazards of the employment or of the place in which he was directed to work. It is, of course, to be readily conceded that but for the breaking of the trolley pole the plaintiff would not have been injured at all, but the negligent act which made possible the accident to the trolley pole and the consequent injuries to the plaintiff had already been committed. In brief, the circumstance of the breaking of the pole constituted only a concurrent cause of the injuries, and it can argue nothing against the position, sustained by the undisputed testimony in this case, that the original wrongful act of omission on the part of the defendant was the primary act of negligence producing the injuries and ceased not in its operation from its inception until its lamentable culmination. "The original act of negligence, the primary causation," says Mr. Justice Henshaw, in the case of Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co., 158 Cal. 499, 111 Pac. 534, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134, wherein the precise question in hand is very learnedly considered and discussed, "may be in its nature so continuous that the concurrent wrongful act precipitating the disaster will in law be regarded not as independent, but as conjoining with the original act to create the disastrous result." The primary causation here could not, by its very nature, be otherwise than continuous, for it was the very germ from which the ultimate damage developed and without which there would perhaps have been no damage. Its wrongfulness followed, permeated, and inhered in every subsequent act of the plaintiff in discharging his duties as a trolley tender, and the breaking of the pole was only a necessary ally in the production of the disastrous result which, in all reasonable probability, it was, from its very inception, destined to bring about.

But much stress is laid upon the fact, as to which there is some evidence, that the plaintiff was unusually bright and intelligent and apt at acquiring knowledge, that as a messenger and a water carrier he had had opportunity to observe the manner of operating trolley cars, and that, being bright and intelligent, thus he must have acquired sufficient knowledge of operating such cars to qualify him to intelligently perform the duties of trolley tender. It may be conceded that the plaintiff was of unusual intelligence for one of his years and quick to grasp ideas, but there is no evidence, other than that showing ability to readily learn, that he did acquire any knowledge of the manner of handling with any skill the mechanical appliances used in propelling trolley cars. Indeed, the only testimony that can even be construed into the statement of a fact justifying the theory that the plaintiff was, in the absence of specific instructions and warning on those lines, intelligent enough to exercise sound or mature judgment in the discharge of the duties of trolley tender or to appreciate and realize the hazards thereof, is that portion of Graham's testimony wherein he stated that he first asked the boy if he thought he "could fill the job," and to which question the plaintiff answered affirmatively. But this testimony falls far short of showing, or even tending to show, that the boy appreciated or could appreciate without warning or instruction from older heads the great danger and hazards attending the discharge of the duties of trolley tender on a work car. Indeed, in our opinion, if the answer of the boy tends to show anything of importance at all, it is that he did not realize the difficulties and hazards of the position, otherwise he would not have so readily expressed confidence in his ability to perform duties, obviously more or less difficult, even with an inexperienced adult, with which he had had no previous experience, and thus much more strongly is the reason emphasized for the necessity for giving him proper warning and instructions before he entered upon the performance of the work. But, in any event, the statement of the plaintiff that he could perform the service did not absolve the defendant from the duty of fully and clearly instructing and warning him as to the hazards of the new duties which it had ordered the boy to perform. The plaintiff's youth was apparent and his want of experience known to the defendant, and the law will not permit it to excuse its negligent failure to perform its duty by the plea that the boy said or thought he was fully capable of discharging the duties of a trolley tender. It is, in other words, the imperative duty of a master, when employing a youth of inexperience in the particular line of work upon which he proposes to place him, if such employment necessarily involves hazards to him who engages in it, to warn such youth of such hazards before the latter enters upon its exercise so that he may be fully able to appreciate and realize the hazards to limb and life he is thus to be put up against, and a failure to perform this duty under the circumstances indicated constitutes culpable and actionable negligence.

We have thus considered the petition for a rehearing in extenso because of the importance of the legal questions involved in this record, and, furthermore, because we desired to express our views upon those questions as fully and as clearly as we conceived to be necessary and possible.

We are firmly of the conviction, for the reasons stated in the former opinion as well as those herein ventured, that no substantial reason has been shown or exists for a reversal of the judgment and order, and therefore the petition for a rehearing is denied.

1. TRIAL (§ 396*)—FINDINGS—CONFORMITY TO PLEADINGS AND ISSUES.

2. COURTS (§ 122*)—JURISDICTION—AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY—HOW DETERMINED.

In claim and delivery, the amount in controversy is to be determined from the pleadings, and where the complaint alleges the value of the property to be $300 or more, and asks judgment in the alternative for the recovery of the property or of its value, the superior court has jurisdiction although it finds that the value is less than $300.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the J. Dewing Company against W. B. Thompson. From an order denying a motion to vacate a judgment for plaintiff and enter judgment dismissing the action, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Knight & Heggerty, for appellant. F. A. Berlin, for respondent.

HALL, J. In this action plaintiff brought suit in the superior court in claim and delivery to recover a piano. The piano is alleged in the complaint to be of the value of $500. Plaintiff also alleges damages in the sum of $100 expended in an effort to recover the piano, and prays for judgment for the possession of the piano or the sum of $500, the value thereof, in case a delivery thereof cannot be had, and for $100 as damages on account of costs incurred in the effort to recover the piano. The court found the value of the piano to be $200, and gave judgment that plaintiff recover from defendant the piano, and, in case recovery thereof cannot be had, that plaintiff recover from defendant the sum of $200, the value thereof. Defendant subsequently moved the court, under sections 663 and 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure, to vacate and set aside said judgment, and to enter a judgment dismissing said action for want of jurisdiction of the superior court over said action. The motion was denied, and the appeal is by defendant from this order.

The attack upon the jurisdiction of the court over the action is predicated solely upon the fact that the court found the value of the piano sued for to be $200. Counsel for appellant have devoted their energies to discussing the question as to whether or not the jurisdiction of the superior court in an action in claim and delivery depends upon the allegations of the complaint or the finding made by the court as to the value of the property in suit. While the answer to this question is not difficult, the correctness of the ruling of the court does not in our opinion depend upon such answer.

[1] The finding as to the value of the piano is entirely without the issues made by the pleadings. The complaint alleges in apt language the value of the piano to be $500, and there is no issue raised by the answer upon the allegations as to value. Defendant denied the ownership and right of possession of plaintiff and the allegations concerning the expenditure of $100 in the effort to recover the piano, and set up a claim to the ownership and right of possession in the piano under a certain contract with plaintiff. But there is not one word in the answer in the record before us raising, or attempting to raise, any issue as to the value of the piano not being as alleged in the complaint. The pleadings were verified. The allegation of value not being denied, it was admitted to be as alleged, and the finding, contrary to such admission, should be disregarded. The fact upon which appellant claims the jurisdiction of the superior court depends was admitted by the answer to be such as to unquestionably support the original jurisdiction of the superior court to try and determine the action upon its merits.

[2] Turning now to the question discussed by appellant in his brief, we have no doubt that the court had jurisdiction of the cause, even if it be conceded that the finding of the court as to the value of the piano is controlling as against the admission in the pleadings.

The only case that lends any support to the contention of appellant is the case of Ballerino v. Bigelow, 90 Cal. 500, 27 Pac. 372, where it was held that a plaintiff could not invest a justice court with jurisdiction to try a case of forcible entry and detainer by alleging that the rental value of the property in suit did not exceed $25 per month, although the proof clearly showed that it did. This case cannot be made to apply to any case other than one in forcible entry and unlawful detainer. It has no application to a case of claim and delivery, where the plaintiff seeks an alternative judgment for the recovery of specific personal property, or, in case such recovery cannot be had, a stated sum of money as the value thereof. In such a case, if the value be alleged to be $300, or in excess thereof, the prayer for judgment contains a demand for such stated sum. Such was the prayer and demand in this case.

An action in claim and delivery has two aspects. In one it is a suit to recover specific personal property. In the other it is a suit to recover a money demand, and, as such, the amount demanded, exclusive of interest, is the test of jurisdiction. In this aspect the suit is within the rule laid down in such cases as Dashiell v. Slingerland, 60 Cal. 655, and Lord v. Goldberg, 81 Cal. 596, 22 Pac. 1126, 15 Am. St. Rep. 82, to the effect that the amount of money sued for is the test of jurisdiction of the court to try and determine the action.

The case of Shealor v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. 564, 11 Pac. 653, was a case of claim and delivery, and it was held that the allegation of value, as made in the complaint, determined the jurisdiction of the court.

The case of Pratt v. Welcome, 6 Cal. App. 475, 92 Pac. 500, was also a case of claim and delivery, and, while what is there said is dictum, it is so apt and logical that we cannot refrain from quoting a paragraph: "It is the demand and not the finding of value which fixes the jurisdiction of the court. Dashiell v. Slingerland, 60 Cal. 655; Lord v. Goldberg, 81 Cal. 596 [22 Pac. 1126, 15 Am. St. Rep. 82]. The jurisdiction of the court, where the amount involved is the question to be considered, must be determined on the pleadings. Any other rule would be fraught with uncertainties and mischiefs beyond the power of anticipation. Rodney v. Curry, 120 Cal. 541 [52 Pac. 999]. Where no question is made of the good faith of the plaintiff in bringing the suit for a sum exceeding $300, the only penalty for the recovery of less than the jurisdictional amount is the loss of the costs." See, also, Greenbaum v. Martinez, 86 Cal. 460, 25 Pac. 12, Becker v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. 313, 90 Pac. 689, and Mannix v. Tryon, 152 Cal. 31, 91 Pac. 983, to the effect generally that, where the allegations of the complaint make a case within the jurisdiction of the superior court, relief not contemplated as within such jurisdiction may be given where the plaintiff fails to prove his whole case.

In conclusion it may be said that the argument of appellant is self-destructive, for if the superior court did not have jurisdiction to try and determine this case upon its merits, because the value of the property involved as found by the court was less than $300, this court has no appellate jurisdiction of the case. The original jurisdiction of the superior court and the appellate jurisdiction of this court, so far as they relate to the subject-matter of this action, are given in precisely the same words by the Constitution. Article 6, § 5, Const., and article 6, § 4.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabañiss, Judge.

Petition by Rebecca Cohn for writ of mandate against P. L. Henderson and others, as the Board of Police Commissioners, and the Board of Trustees of the Police Relief and Pension Fund of the City and County of San Francisco. From a judgment granting the writ, defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Percy V. Long and J. F. English, for appellants. J. C. B. Hebbard and T. J. Crowley, for respondent.

HALL, J. [1] This is an appeal from a judgment granting to petitioner a writ of mandate against defendants, directing them to pay her the sum of $1,000 out of the police relief and pension fund. The matter was determined in the lower court upon demurrer to respondent's petition.

Edward Cohn was appointed a policeman of the city and county of San Francisco in 1868. He was retired from active service in 1895 upon a pension as then provided by the general police pension law of 1889. He continued to draw said pension until his death, which occurred in 1909 from natural causes. Petitioner is the widow of said Edward Cohn, and claims to be entitled to the sum of $1,000 under the provisions of section 7 of the act of the Legislature of March 4, 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 57), as amended in 1891. Stats. 1891, p. 287.

The present charter of the city and county of San Francisco went into effect on the 1st day of January, 1900, which was prior to the death of said Edward Cohn. The charter contains a complete scheme for the pensioning of police officers, their widows, and other dependents, and we have no doubt was intended to supersede and repeal, so far as the city and county of San Francisco was concerned, the general law upon the same subject. That such was its effect was held by this court in Burke v. Trustees, etc., 4 Cal. App. 236, 87 Pac. 421, which was a proceeding in mandamus by the widow of a police officer who had died since the taking effect of the charter. There is no provision of the charter under which petitioner can or does claim to be entitled to anything as the widow of the deceased officer.

Respondent relies upon the case of Kavanagh v. Board, etc., 134 Cal. 50, 66 Pac. 36, as sustaining her right to the $1,000; but Kavanagh not only died, but his widow presented her demand and procured the issuance of the writ before the taking effect of the charter. The case is not in point.

[2] That a law providing pensions for officers and their dependents may be repealed or altered at any time before the happening of the contingency upon which the right to the pension vests is not and cannot be denied. Pennie v. Reis, 80 Cal. 266, 22 Pac. 176; Pennie v. Reis, 132 U. S. 464, 10 Sup. Ct. 149, 33 L. Ed. 426.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to sustain defendants' demurrer to the petition, and to enter judgment thereon for defendants.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Petition by Daniel O'Connell and others for writ of mandate against John E. Behan, Clerk of the Board of Supervisors. Judgment for respondent, and petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

Daniel O'Connell, for appellants. Percy V. Long, City Atty., and John T. Nourse, Asst. City Atty. (Thos. V. Cator, of counsel), for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. The preamble of article 12 of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco declares that it is "the purpose and intention of the people of the city and county of San Francisco that its public utilities shall be gradually acquired and ultimately owned by the city and county"; and with this purpose in view it is provided by section 1 of the same article that "whenever the board of supervisors by ordinance * * * shall determine that the public interest or necessity demands the acquisition, construction or completion of any public utility or utilities by the city and county, or whenever electors shall petition the board of supervisors, as provided by section 3 of this article, for the acquisition of any public utility or utilities, the board of supervisors must procure from the board of works, through the city engineer, plans and estimates of the cost of original construction and completion by the city and county of such public utilities."

Section 3 of the same article, and which is specifically referred to in section 1, provides that "whenever a petition or petitions, each signed by electors of the city and county equal in number to fifteen per centum of all the votes cast in the city and county at the last preceding general election, shall be presented to the board of supervisors, setting forth that the signers of each petition or petitions favor the acquisition of the public utilities therein named, it shall be the duty of the clerk of the board of supervisors to immediately proceed to examine and verify the signatures to such petition or petitions, and to certify the result of such examination to the board of supervisors. If the required number of signatures be found genuine, the clerk shall transmit to the mayor an authentic copy of such petition or petitions without the signatures thereto. Upon receiving a certificate of the clerk that the petition or petitions contain the required number of genuine signatures, it shall be the duty of the board of supervisors to procure, in the manner specified in section 1 of this article, plans and estimates of the cost of original construction and completion of such public utility or utilities named in such petition or petitions. Thereafter the board of supervisors shall formulate for submission to the electors of the city and county, at a special election called for the purpose, a separate proposition for the acquisition of each public utility named in such petition or petitions."

The section and article of the charter just quoted further provides and directs that the signatures to a petition for the acquisition of public utilities shall be examined and verified, and propositions formulated thereunder completed, within six months after the filing of said petition with the board of supervisors.

On February 15, 1908, Daniel O'Connell et al., the appellants herein, presented to the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco a petition, purporting to be signed by 14,616 registered electors of the said city and county, which specified in each instance the residence address of each signer, and prayed that the franchises and the real and personal property of several separate and distinct public utility corporations be acquired by said city and county.

On March 2, 1908, and on April 8, 1908, supplemental petitions to the same effect, containing 4,790 additional signatures of purported electors, were presented to the board of supervisors. These several petitions, in effect, constituted but one petition, wherein the signers declared in favor of the acquisition of the specified public utilities, and prayed that the board of supervisors proceed to ascertain the cost of such acquisition, and then submit to the registered electors of the municipality, at a special election to be called for that purpose, separate propositions for the acquisition of each of said public utilities, and the amount of a bonded indebtedness, if any, to be incurred therefor.

The existing public utilities sought to be acquired by the petitioners were specified in the petition to be: (1) The franchises and real and personal property owned, controlled, and operated by the United Railroads of San Francisco and necessary for the successful operation of its street railway system on streets and avenues of said city and county of San Francisco. (2) The franchises and real and personal property owned, controlled, and operated by the California Street Cable Railway Company on the streets of the city and county of San Francisco and necessary for the successful operation of the street railway system of said company. (3) The franchises and real and personal property of the Pacific States Telephone & Telegraph Company in said city and county of San Francisco, necessary for the successful operation of its telephone system in said city and county of San Francisco. (4) The franchises and real and personal property of the Home Telephone Company in said city and county of San Francisco, necessary for the successful operation of its telephone system in said city and county of San Francisco.

The petition in question was by the board of supervisors referred to its clerk, the respondent herein, and he in due time made and filed the following report: "In accordance with the mandate of the charter, I have proceeded to examine the signatures to the foregoing petition, and as the result of said examination report as follows: The petition is not verified in any manner by the oath of any person or of any signer thereto. There are no means by which I can verify and ascertain whether such signatures are genuine, and by reason of that fact it is not possible for me to make a certificate as required by the charter, that such petition contains the required number of genuine signatures."

Respondent's report and action upon the petition were subsequently approved and adopted by the board of supervisors, whereupon, with substantially the facts herein stated as a basis for the application, the appellants herein instituted mandamus proceedings in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco to compel the respondent, as the clerk of the board of supervisors, to immediately proceed to examine and verify the signatures to said petition in accordance with the charter provisions, and certify the result to the board of supervisors. An alternative writ of mandate was issued, and for answer thereto the respondent, in addition to practically denying all of the material allegations of the petition, pleaded as a separate defense thereto that neither the charter of the city and county of San Francisco nor any other law provided any adequate or effective means by which respondent could verify the genuineness of the purported signatures to the petition presented to the board of supervisors for the acquisition of the several specified public utilities; that no adequate or effective means existed whereby respondent could verify the genuineness of the signatures appended to said petition; and that therefore he could not truthfully and with knowledge of the fact make a certificate that said petition contained the number of genuine signatures required by the provisions of the charter.

Respondent Behan further averred in justification of his refusal to certify to the genuineness of the signatures that the petition did not conform to the requirements of section 3 of article 12 of the charter, under which section and article, as alleged in the petition for mandate, the petition for the acquisition of the several public utilities was prepared and presented to the board of supervisors.

A trial was had upon the issues thus raised, which resulted in a judgment for the respondent, from which an appeal has been taken upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions, which does not purport to set out any of the evidence taken upon the trial.

[1] Counsel for appellants in his closing brief asserts that the case was tried upon the verified petition for the writ of mandate, respondent's answer thereto, and the admission of counsel that the parties would testify to the matters as stated in the said verified pleadings, and that there was no other evidence offered. The record before us does not sustain counsel's assertion in this behalf. On the contrary, it is expressly stated in the trial court's findings of fact that this proceeding came on for trial and final hearing upon the pleadings "and testimony given at the trial." If it be a fact, as counsel for appellant insists, that the findings of fact were based upon stipulated evidence, then he should have taken the pains to make the record show, not only the stipulation, but the facts as well which were stipulated to be in evidence. In the absence of such a showing, we must take the record as we find it. Presumably the findings speak the truth when they recite that the case was tried "upon the pleadings and testimony given at the trial"; and, inasmuch as the bill of exceptions does not even pretend to set out in any manner or form all or any part of the testimony adduced at the trial, obviously we cannot pass upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment. In the absence of a bill of exceptions showing the evidence offered and received at the trial, we must assume that the evidence fully supports the findings of the trial court in every essential particular, and therefore upon the record before us, we are limited to a consideration of the single question of whether or not the findings of fact support the conclusions of law adduced therefrom, and the judgment subsequently rendered and entered thereon.

It is conceded by respondent that 15 per centum of all the votes cast at the general election held in the city and county of San Francisco, preceding the filing of the petition would be 8,712, and that, in so far as the mere number of signers was concerned, the petition was in conformity with the requirements of the charter. It is disputed, however, that all or any of the signers of the petition were electors of the city and county, and it is further insisted, upon behalf of the respondent, that the petition in other respects, which will be adverted to later, was so insufficient in matters of form and substance as to render it radically defective and utterly useless for the accomplishment of the purpose for which it was intended.

[2] The trial court in its findings of fact found in favor of appellants upon all of the preliminary matters and things put in issue by the pleadings, such as the preparation and filing of the petition for the acquisition of the several specified public utilities, the requisite number of signers thereto, the refusal of respondent to verify and certify the same, etc., but found against the appellants upon the matters and things which constituted the vital issues of the case. Among other things, the court in substance found that the allegation of the petition for mandate, which recited that the petition presented to the board of supervisors for the acquisition of the specified public utilities was signed by electors of the city and county of San Francisco, was not proven as a fact; that no matter or thing appearing upon the face of said last-mentioned petition constituted any proof of the genuineness of the signatures thereto; that there does not exist any adequate or effective means by which the respondent, as clerk of the board of supervisors, or otherwise, might ascertain, so as to have personal knowledge thereof, that the signatures to the said petition, or a sufficient number thereof, are the genuine handwriting of the persons purporting to have made the same; that respondent could not with personal knowledge of the truth thereof make the certificate required by section 3 of article 12 of the charter.

With these latter findings primarily as the basis thereof, the trial court drew the conclusions of law that the petition which was presented by the plaintiffs in this proceeding to the board of supervisors was and is insufficient under section 3 of article 12 of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco; and that, as no adequate or effective means existed by which respondent, as clerk of the said board, could verify the genuineness of the signatures to the petition in question, he was not and could not be required to make the certificate called for by the charter provisions. We are of the opinion that the conclusions of the trial court are correct.

Section 3 of article 12 of the charter clearly provides and requires that a petition favoring the acquisition of public utilities must be signed by "electors" of the city and county of San Francisco. If the petition for the writ of mandate in the present case had failed to allege that the petition presented to the board of supervisors was signed by "electors" of the city and county, no cause of action would have been stated for the relief demanded; and respondent herein, in the absence of amendment of the pleadings, would have been entitled to judgment upon demurrer or upon the pleadings. Although the petition in question purported to be signed by electors, nevertheless, if it was not in fact so signed, as the trial court found, there was a failure of proof which was necessarily fatal to the plaintiffs' action, and the finding of the trial court upon this issue alone was sufficient in itself to justify and support a judgment against the plaintiffs.

[3] The remaining points presented upon this appeal require an interpretation of the scope and effect of section 3 of article 12 of the charter, and relate also to the apparent defect in the charter itself in so far as it fails to provide an adequate method whereby the clerk of the board of supervisors may verify the genuineness of the signatures appended to a petition for the acquisition of public utilities.

Upon this phase of the case the learned judge of the trial court expressed his views in support of the judgment in a written opinion, which is incorporated in and in effect constitutes the whole of the bill of exceptions which accompanies the judgment roll upon this appeal. Ordinarily the trial judge's opinion in rendering judgment has no proper place in a record on appeal, and the purpose of presenting to us, in this instance, a bill of exceptions which, aside from a mere recital that judgment was rendered for the respondent, is made up entirely of the trial judge's opinion, is not readily apparent. But, whatever the purpose may have been, the opinion is before us in a duly authenticated bill of exceptions; and, inasmuch as it is in entire accord with our views of the law and the interpretation which we think should be placed upon the charter provisions under consideration, the views and conclusions of the trial judge are hereby adopted as the views and conclusions of this court. In so far as it is pertinent to the particular subjects immediately in discussion, the opinion of the trial court is as follows:

[4] "The ground upon which the defendant clerk has refused to proceed to examine and verify the signatures to the petition is that the charter has not prescribed any procedure for ascertaining the genuineness of the signatures, and that he cannot be required to certify to a fact as to which he has no knowledge or means of knowledge.

"In the case of a petition for the submission of a proposed ordinance to a popular vote, the charter has provided that the signers must be voters, that the signatures need not all be appended to one paper, that each signer shall add to his signature his place of residence, giving the street and number, and that one of the signers of each paper shall make oath that each signature to the paper is genuine.

"In the case of a petition for acquiring a public utility, section 3 above cited does not require it to be signed by voters but only by electors, and there is no requirement that the signers append to their signatures their respective places of residence. A citizen may be an elector without being a voter. If he is a male citizen of the United States, 21 years of age, and has resided in the state one year, in the county 90 days, and in the precinct 30 days, he is an elector. In order to be a voter he must be a registered elector.

"If the petitioners in this case had merely stated that they were electors of the city and county, and omitted a statement of their respective places of residence, it would have been impossible for the clerk to verify their signatures. The only means suggested for verifying the signatures in the present case is a comparison with those in the great register; it being stated in the petitions that the signers are registered electors. Even assuming that the petitioners have the right to insert in the petitions matters not required by the charter, and that the clerk might be able, by comparison of hands, to form an opinion as to the genuineness of the signatures, he could not be required to do more than certify such opinion. The section under consideration requires him to certify that the signatures are in fact genuine, and the board of supervisors can act only 'upon receiving a certificate from the clerk that the petition or petitions contain the required number of genuine signatures.'

[5] "It will also be observed that by section 3 the clerk is not required to certify that the signers of the petition are electors of the city and county, but merely that their signatures are genuine. Even if the clerk had the means at hand necessary for the performance of the task required of him, it was clearly his duty to refuse to do so if the petitions themselves were not such as are prescribed by section 3 of article 12 of the charter.

"The plans and estimates of cost which the board of supervisors is directed to procure are those of original construction or completion, by the city and county, of a proposed public utility, and not those of the past construction or completion of existing utilities owned by any other corporation or person.

[6] "The term 'estimates' is not an appropriate expression to indicate the determination of the cost of past construction and completion. Such determination would be of a question of fact, and could only be made after receiving competent evidence of actual cost. Section 1 expressly provides that the plans and estimates of cost to be procured from the board of public works are those of original construction and completion by the city and county.

[7] "It is therefore clearly implied that the petitions authorized by section 3 are limited to such public utilities as are to be constructed and completed by the city and county. Section 2 provides that, before submitting propositions to electors for the acquisition by original construction or condemnation of public utilities, the board of supervisors must solicit and consider offers for the sale to the city and county of existing utilities. Although the board may in the end conclude to submit a proposition for the purchase of an existing utility, the proceedings must be inaugurated by a petition for original construction and completion by the city and county. The board is thereupon required to procure plans and estimates of cost of such original construction and completion, and, after they have been furnished, to solicit offers for the sale to the city and county of an existing utility such as is mentioned in the petition. If the price demanded is deemed too high, the board must proceed to formulate propositions in accordance with its own plans.

[8] "The petitions referred to ask not only that the real and personal property of the four corporations be purchased, but also their franchises. There is no provision of the charter which authorizes the acquisition of franchises by the city and county. If it should acquire the physical properties of the corporations, it would not need to purchase their franchises in order to operate them. The plans and estimates furnished by the engineer could not possibly include an estimate of the cost of the franchises. And yet the board of supervisors would have no power to eliminate the proposition to purchase the franchises if the petitions are otherwise sufficient."

For the reasons and in the particulars stated here and in the opinion of the trial court, the petition does not in our opinion conform to the requirements of section 3 of article 12 of the charter; and upon that ground, as well as upon the ground that no adequate means are provided, either within or without the charter, whereby the respondent herein might expeditiously, intelligently, and effectively verify the signatures to a petition for the acquisition of public utilities, he should not be required to certify to the genuineness of the signatures to the petition in the present case, and therefore the petition for a writ of mandate to compel him to do so was properly denied and dismissed. Incidentally to the main discussion, plaintiffs and appellants complain of the trial court's ruling whereby, upon motion of the respondent, certain paragraphs of the petition for mandate were stricken out.

[9] The matter stricken out merely pleaded the written opinion of the city and county attorney as to the form and sufficiency of the petition, which was given in response to a request for legal advice made by the board of supervisors. Clearly that opinion was not any more binding upon the respondent than it was upon the city attorney himself, and that respondent was justified in not following the city attorney's first views of the law and interpretation of the charter provisions is best evidenced by the fact that, upon more mature consideration of the subject, the latter arrived at a different conclusion, and then strenuously and successfully opposed the plaintiffs' suit upon an interpretation of the law and the charter which the trial court approved and which accords with our own views. In any event, the city and county attorney's opinion of the law was not conclusive upon the trial court, and, as matter of pleading, it could serve no useful purpose. It was therefore properly stricken out of plaintiffs' petition for mandate.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

CRAYCROFT v. SUPERIOR COURT OF KERN COUNTY et al. (Civ. 1,119.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 3, 1912. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 2, 1912.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 144*)—STATE LANDS—EFFECT OF CONTEST—PRESUMPTIONS.

A certificate of purchase of state lands is prima facie evidence of title in the holder because of the presumption which attaches that the state land official has properly performed his duty, which presumption can only be overthrown by the initiation of a contest, the making of a reference, and a hearing before a court with jurisdiction.

to determine a contest of any location or application to purchase state school lands, or of any order of approval or certificate of purchase made or issued by the surveyor general or register of the state land office, unless the contest shall have been filed, heard, determined, referred, or allowed within five years from and after the issuance of the certificate of purchase. Held, that the statute not only restricts the right of contest to be determined by the superior court to a period of five years from the issuance of a certificate of purchase, but limits the determination of the questions presented to contests commenced within such period, so that a clear intention to make it retroactive is expressed, and it will apply to divest the superior court of jurisdiction already acquired of a case within its terms.

Pol. Code, § 3499, as amended by St. 1911, p. 345, which divests the superior court of jurisdiction to try land contest cases, unless commenced within five years after the issuance of a certificate of purchase, is not unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of a contract or destroying a vested right or interest, as the application to purchase without payment of money upon which a contest is founded vests no rights in the applicant.

Application by Frank Craycroft, Jr., for a writ of prohibition against the Superior Court of Kern County and another. Writ granted.

Miles Wallace and L. L. Cory, for petitioner. F. A. Stephenson, Alfred Daggett, and Frank Kauke (T. M. McNamara, of counsel), for respondents. J. R. Dorsey, for Robert L. Perry, party in interest. Hatch, Lloyd & Hunt, amici curiæ.

ALLEN, P. J. It appears from the verified petition filed herein that on the 3d day of October, 1901, the register of the state land office at Visalia, upon the payment of 20 per cent. of the purchase price and interest, issued to one Samuel Brown a certificate of purchase for a certain section of school land then owned by the state and subject to sale; that, on the day ensuing, Brown transferred and set over said certificate to petitioner; that said certificate was duly recorded; that petitioner has made payment in full to the state for said land and all interest, taxes, and costs of every kind, nature, and description; that thereafter on October 6, 1910, one Kerr filed his application with the surveyor general, contesting the application of said Brown to purchase the said land, with a demand that the conflicting claims be referred for adjudication; that on the same day an order was entered by the surveyor general referring the contest of Kerr and Brown to the superior court of Kern county for trial and adjudication; that on November 3d Robert L. Perry made application to purchase the north half of said section, contesting also the purchase rights of Brown; that on November 10th one Spencer made application to purchase the north half of said section. That neither said Kerr nor said Brown, within 60 days after the order of reference, commenced any action in the superior court of Kern county with reference to said adjudication; that on December 7, 1910, one Chittenden filed his application for the purchase of the whole of said section, contesting the rights of all the parties before named, and asking that the conflicting claims be referred to the superior court; that on December 7, 1910, after the filing of such application by said Chittenden, Kerr filed his application to purchase all of said section, together, also, with another contest and protest against the application of Brown; that on December 31, 1910, one Charles Smithwick filed his application for the purchase of the south half of said section. That on the 13th day of January, 1911, an order was made by the said state surveyor general and the register of the state land office as follows: "It is therefore ordered and directed that the contest as set forth between the above-named R. D. Chittenden and Samuel Brown be and the same is hereby referred, together with the conflicting claims of John P. Kerr, Robert L. Perry, Richard V. Dorsey, Charles Smithwick and Emmet L. Spencer, and of each of them, to the superior court in and for the county of Kern, state of California, for adjudication." That none of the applications of contesting claimants have ever been allowed or approved in any manner by the surveyor general, and that neither of said parties has paid any portion of the purchase price of the land referred to; that thereafter, on February 21, 1911, an action was commenced in the superior court of Kern county by Emmet L. Spencer against Brown and the other claimants, based upon the order of reference above referred to, praying for an adjudication that the application of said Brown be held illegal and void, and that the certificate of purchase so assigned and held by petitioner be likewise held illegal and void, and that Spencer's application be adjudged and declared a valid application for the purchase of said land; that thereafter petitioner demurred to the complaint and moved to dismiss said action upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the same, which said demurrer and motion to dismiss were overruled and denied. It is averred that the said superior court intends to and will, unless restrained by this writ of prohibition, proceed to the trial of said action and thus impose upon petitioner great costs and expense in the defense thereof; that the court has been divested of jurisdiction to hear and determine said action; that petitioner is a laboring man without means, and in order to properly present his defense it will be necessary, at great expense, to bring witnesses from a distance; that such trial will occupy many days or weeks, at much expense; that said land is of little value, except for the oil which it contains, and such value is problematical; and accordingly this writ of prohibition is prayed for.

It is contended by petitioner that, notwithstanding the provisions of the Constitution of this state, which provides that "lands belonging to this state, which are suitable for cultivation, shall be granted only to actual settlers, and in quantities not exceeding three hundred and twenty acres to each settler, under such conditions as shall be prescribed by law," the issuance of the certificate to Brown for 640 acres was an adjudication by a competent authority that the lands involved were not suitable for cultivation. This upon the assumption that a public officer performs his duty, and prima facie the lands were subject to sale in quantities exceeding 320 acres in area, and further that the action sought to be maintained upon the order of reference was not brought within the time provided by statute, and further that under section 3499 of the Political Code, as amended March 13, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 345), the court is divested of jurisdiction to hear and determine the contest or adjudicate with reference to said lands. This section, as amended, in terms provides that contests of the character here mentioned, or made under any section of the Code, "of any location or application to purchase any state school lands which have heretofore been, or shall hereafter be made and filed with the surveyor general or register of the state land office, or of any order of approval made thereof, or of any certificate of purchase issued thereon or pursuant thereto by such surveyor general or register, shall be filed, heard, determined, referred or allowed, unless such contest shall have been or shall be so filed, heard, determined, referred or allowed as provided in said sections of this Code, within five years from and after the date on which such certificate of purchase may have been issued." Section 3495 of the Political Code specifies the matters and things which must be set forth and established by one desiring to purchase lands of the state, as a condition precedent to the issuance of a certificate of purchase, among which it is required that it must be made to appear whether or not the land is suitable for cultivation, upon the filing of which proof depends the right of the officers to issue the certificate of purchase for an amount of land in excess of 320 acres.

[1] "The presumptions that the law has been obeyed, that the first applicant is innocent of the crime of perjury, and that official duty has been properly performed, come to the aid of the defendant. In the absence of controverting proof, these presumptions will prevail. The certificate is made prima facie evidence of title in the holder." Bieber v. Lambert, 152 Cal. 564, 93 Pac. 97. While these presumptions may be overcome by proving that the facts are otherwise, it is nevertheless necessary, in order to admit such proof, that a contest must be initiated, a reference made, and a court with jurisdiction to hear and determine the controversy. Prior to the act of 1911 above referred to, it was not necessary that a contestant should show any right in himself to purchase nor connect himself with any claim to the land. Garfield v. Wilson, 74 Cal. 175, 15 Pac. 620. Nor was there a limitation of time within which the contest should be inaugurated or the action tried and determined. "The jurisdiction of the superior court in actions begun in pursuance to a reference to it of a contest arising in the surveyor general's office over the right to purchase state land is special and limited. It is derived solely from the provisions of the Political Code relating to such contests. The sole object to be achieved by the trial before the superior court is a determination of the question of the rights of the two parties between whom the contest arose in the surveyor general's office to purchase the particular tract of land in question." Youle v. Thomas, 146 Cal. 541, 80 Pac. 715.

[2] This right of contest is by the plain terms of section 3499, as amended, restricted to a period of five years after the issuance of the certificate, and by said section the determination of the questions presented under the order of reference is restricted to contests commenced within such period. If, then, section 3499 is to be construed as operating retroactively, the court was by force of such act divested of jurisdiction to further hear or determine the contest so sought to be initiated.

[3] As said by our Supreme Court in Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 565, 89 Pac. 354, in construing the retroactive character of a statute under the rule that such effect should not be given unless the legislative intention that it shall so operate is clearly apparent: "It is impossible to read carefully the statute in question, however, without coming to the conclusion that it was intended to so operate." It will be observed that the section here under consideration not only restricts the right of contest, the filing thereof, and the reference, but makes the same applicable to all cases, unless such contest shall have been or shall be "determined within five years from and after the date on which such certificate of purchase may have been issued." We think that here is a clearly expressed intention that this section should act retroactively, and the effect of which in the case at bar could only be to divest the superior court of Kern county of all jurisdiction to hear and determine the controversy between the parties. This statute was intended to settle all disputes as to the validity of the purchase after the expiration of five years, and to render as conclusive the presumption attaching to the issuance of the certificate in the first instance.

[4] The mere application to purchase, with out payment of money, vests no rights in such applicant, and such section cannot be said to impair the obligations of any contract or to be destructive of any vested rights or interests.

[5] It is insisted, however, by respondents that, assuming everything hereinbefore said to be the law, nevertheless prohibition will not lie because the right of appeal from any decision made by the court is speedy and adequate. The solution of this question is not without difficulty. An apparent conflict seems to exist in this state as to the right to the writ where an appeal will lie, and it has been determined in Lindley v. Superior Court, 141 Cal. 220, 74 Pac. 765, that it is not sufficient ground for intervention by prohibition that the trial be expensive and troublesome. This rule, however, to a certain extent, has been modified in instances where costs necessary in the prosecution of the case would have to be incurred which could not be included in a bill therefor, and in Hayne v. Justice's Court, 82 Cal. 284, 23 Pac. 125, 16 Am. St. Rep. 114, it is said: "A court that proceeds in the trial of a cause against the express prohibition of a statute is exceeding its jurisdiction, and may be prevented from doing so by prohibition from this court." This authority is approved in Glide v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 28, 81 Pac. 225, and it seems to us that it is proper to grant the writ in instances where it is evident from the record that any order or judgment made by the court would be ineffective. Mr. Justice Shaw, in his concurring opinion in the case last cited, says: "The question whether or not the remedy by appeal is adequate is, even in cases where jurisdiction is plainly lacking, a matter resting in the sound discretion of this court upon the particular circumstances of each case." The authority, then, to grant the writ in this case seems to us to be warranted under such discretionary power. It were idle for this petitioner to be required, at large costs and expense upon a trial, to establish that which must be conclusively presumed. That the trial court in this instance has overruled the demurrer, has denied the motion to dismiss, and has assumed jurisdiction in a case wherein we think it has been divested of jurisdiction, we regard as presenting a proper case in which, in the exercise of our discretion, to direct the issuance of the writ of prohibition.

The writ is therefore ordered as prayed for.

We concur: JAMES, J.; SHAW, J.

GUTHRIE v. CARNEY. (Civ. 966.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 21, 1912.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 147*)—SALE BEFORE LEVY—VALIDITY.

In an action against an officer for conversion of liquors levied on as the property of a debtor, proof of the debtor's prior execution and record of a bill of sale of the liquors to plaintiff and delivery at the time of the executing and recording of the bill of sale of the key to a barn in which the liquors were stored, that 10 days thereafter the debtor took plaintiff to the barn and pointed out the property, and at that time informed the owner of the barn that plaintiff was the owner of the liquors, was insufficient to show immediate delivery and an actual, continued change of possession under Civ. Code, § 3440, providing that every transfer of personal property is conclusively presumed to be fraudulent and void against the seller's creditors while he remains in possession, etc., and if made by a person in possession, not accompanied by immediate delivery and followed by an actual, continued change of possession of the property transferred.

The execution and record of a bill of sale of personal property, while prima facie proof of the rights of the parties as between themselves, is not material in a determination, as between the buyer and the seller's execution creditors, of the question whether there had been an immediate delivery and an actual change of possession.

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 150*)—PERSONAL PROPERTY—"ACTUAL."

Civ. Code, § 3440, provides that a sale of personal property shall be conclusively presumed to be fraudulent as against the seller's creditors, where there is no immediate delivery and actual and continued change of possession. Held that, where liquor stored in a barn was sold by a debtor to plaintiff, the delivery of a key to the barn was mere evidence of a constructive delivery and possession, and was not an actual change of possession required by such section, the word "actual," as so used, meaning "existing in act, and truly and absolutely so; really acted or acting; carried out; as opposed to potential, possible, visual or theoretical."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 464; Dec. Dig. § 150.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, p. 151.]

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 149*)—PERSONAL PROPERTY—SALES—"IMMEDIATE DELIVERY."

"Immediate delivery," as used in such section, while not requiring a delivery instantan, requires delivery within a reasonable time according to the character of the property, its situation, and all the attending circumstances, so that the fact that the seller took the buyer to the barn 10 days after the sale and pointed out the property to him did not constitute an "immediate delivery" within such requirement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 462-463½; Dec. Dig. § 149.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, pp. 3395-3396; vol. 8, p. 7681.]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 271*)—CONCLUSIONS—SELF-SERVING DECLARATIONS.

Where a debtor sold liquors which were stored in a barn to plaintiff, his assertion to the owner of the barn that he had purchased the property when negotiating for the continued use of the barn as a place of storage was a mere conclusion and self-serving declaration, which had no tendency to prove a delivery as against the seller's creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1068-1079, 1081-1104; Dec. Dig. § 271.*]

6. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 309*)—PERSONAL PROPERTY—IMMEDIATE DELIVERY.

Under Civ. Code, § 3440, providing that a sale unaccompanied by immediate delivery and an actual and continued change of possession shall be conclusively presumed to be fraudulent as against the seller's creditors, instructions that, if the property was so situated that the buyer was entitled to and could rightfully take possession of it at his pleasure, he would be considered as having actually received it, and that it was not necessary that he should actually take the property into his possession, that when a valuable consideration is paid for the purchase of property the purchase is presumed to be in good faith, and that fraud is never presumed but must be affirmatively proven by the party alleging the same, were erroneous as ignoring the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 941, 944-958; Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

7. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 132*)—PROOF OF FRAUD—STATUTORY PRESUMPTION.

Ordinarily, the burden of proof, where it is not shifted by statute, is on the party assailing a transfer of property on the ground of fraud, yet, where facts appear which prima facie tend to create a statutory presumption of fraud as against the seller's creditors, the burden of proof not only shifts to the buyer, but the presumption, if established, renders the transaction absolutely void as provided by Civ. Code, § 3440.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 285, 286; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

8. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 309*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONTRADICTION.

Where defendant claimed that a sale of a debtor's goods to plaintiff before levy was fraudulent, instructions that, if the property was so situated that the buyer could rightfully take possession at his pleasure, it was not necessary that he actually take the property into his possession, but that the sale was conclusively presumed to be fraudulent if it was not followed by an actual change of possession, and that such actual change meant "existing in fact," excluding the idea of a mere formal possession, were irreconcilably in conflict, and therefore erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 941, 944-958; Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 702*)—REVIEW—RECORD—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where each of the requested instructions was indorsed as "given" by the trial judge, the fact that the record did not show an independent charge by the court was insufficient to show that the record did not contain all the instructions given so as to preclude review of a conflict between requested instructions; it being presumed that the instructions contained in the record were the only ones given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2936-2938; Dec. Dig. § 702.*]

10. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 129*)—JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

Where plaintiff sued an officer for conversion of property levied on under a justice's judgment in favor of D., the validity of the justice's judgment and execution could not be collaterally attacked in that action by proof that D.'s claim had been settled before the rendition of the judgment, and that he was therefore not a creditor at the time of the levy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by Joseph G. Guthrie against James H. Carney. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Benj. K. Knight, for appellant. Netherton & Torchiana, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. In this action the plaintiff recovered a judgment against the defendant in the sum of $600, as damages for the alleged conversion of personal property which the defendant, as constable of Santa Cruz township, took into his possession and sold at public auction under and by virtue of a writ of execution issued out of the justice's court of said township, in an action therein pending wherein G. A. Deiter was plaintiff and the firm of Hedgpath Bros. was defendant. The present case was tried by the court with a jury, and verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff. From the judgment entered thereon, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed upon the judgment roll and a statement of the case, which purports to contain all of the evidence and proceedings had and taken upon the trial in the lower court.

The plaintiff's complaint is in the usual and ordinary form of actions in conversion. Defendant's answer denied plaintiff's ownership of the property claimed to have been converted, and alleged ownership in the co-partnership consisting of M. Hedgpeth and N. Hedgpeth. As a further defense to the action, defendant pleaded that, with intent to cheat and defraud one G. A. Deiter, a creditor of Hedgpeth Bros., and while an action brought by Deiter was pending in the justice's court, the Hedgpeths pretended to sell to Guthrie, the plaintiff here, the property in question, which consisted of a small stock of wines and liquors. In his answer the defendant further averred that the pretended sale was not accompanied by an immediate delivery, nor followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the property.

The facts of the case upon which the verdict and judgment were founded are, in their essential features, practically without conflict, and in substance are as follows:

In the month of November, 1907, and for some time prior thereto, Hedgpeth Bros. were engaged in carrying on the hotel and saloon business of the Pacific Ocean House in the city of Santa Cruz. On November 3, 1907, the hotel and bar were destroyed by fire. At the time of the fire Hedgpeth Bros. were indebted to numerous creditors; and immediately after the fire they made an assignment to their creditors, among whom were Guthrie, the plaintiff in this action, and Deiter, the plaintiff in the justice's court action, out of which issued the writ of execution hereinbefore referred to. Before any settlement with the creditors of Hedgpeth Bros. had been actually consummated, the trustees appointed by the creditors, in disposing of the assigned assets of Hedgpeth Bros., resold to them for the sum of $100 the entire stock of wines and liquors in question. Some time thereafter Hedgpeth Bros. moved the stock of wines and liquors from the cellar of the Pacific Ocean House, where they had remained since the fire, to a barn situated immediately in the rear of and appurtenant to the Metropole Hotel in the city of Santa Cruz, which hotel was also conducted by Hedgpeth Bros. On November 17, 1907, which was after the fire and after a settlement with the creditors of Hedgpeth Bros. had been made, the plaintiff Guthrie loaned them the sum of $300 on an unsecured promissory note; and on March 26, 1908, Guthrie entered into an agreement with Hedgpeth Bros. to buy the stock of wines and liquors for the sum of $600. In payment therefor the promissory note previously executed by Hedgpeth Bros. was canceled and returned. The balance of the purchase price was to be paid in cash, but no time was specified within which it was to be paid. However, $150 in cash was paid on April 23, 1908, and on May 23, 1908, the remaining $150 was paid in cash. At the time of the alleged sale to Guthrie and before a cash payment had been made by him, Hedgpeth Bros. executed a bill of sale of the stock of wines and liquors to Guthrie, which was recorded shortly thereafter. Simultaneously with the execution of the bill of sale Hedgpeth Bros. delivered to plaintiff the key to the barn in which the property was stored. Ten days thereafter Hedgpeth Bros. took Guthrie to the barn where the property was stored, and pointed it out. An inventory of the property was not attached to the bill of sale, and Guthrie did not at the time the property was shown to him, or at any other time, prior to the levy of the execution, make an inventory of the same. Mr. Rhein, the owner of the Hotel Metropole building and of the barn appurtenant thereto, was present when Hedgpeth Bros. and Guthrie visited the barn to view the property; and upon that occasion Rhein was informed by Guthrie that he had purchased the property from Hedgpeth Bros. and would thereafter pay the rent for the use of the barn. Hedgpeth Bros., however, had been using the barn free of rent, and Rhein consented that Guthrie might also use it free of rent.

From March 26, 1908, the date of the alleged sale to Guthrie, the property remained in the barn under the conditions stated until it was levied upon and sold by the defendant Carney on the 26th day of May, 1908.

Aside from receiving the keys to the barn and viewing the property 10 days later, Guthrie exercised no acts of ownership over the property, and several times after the alleged sale Hedgpeth Bros. endeavored to sell the property to as many as four different persons in Santa Cruz and to others in Watsonville. Hedgpeth Bros., however, claimed that in offering the property for sale they were merely acting as the agents of Guthrie.

[1] The points urged by appellant for a reversal of the judgment and order are (1) insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or support the judgment; (2) erroneous instructions of the trial court; and (3) error occurring at the trial in the admission of certain testimony.

It is appellant's contention that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict and support the judgment, in this: that it affirmatively appears that the alleged transfer was not accompanied by an immediate and actual delivery of the property, nor followed by an actual and continued change of possession, as is imperatively required by section 3440 of the Civil Code. The finding of the jury, implied from the verdict, that the sale in question was accompanied by an actual and immediate delivery of the property, in the sense contemplated by the statute, must stand or fall upon the salient features of the transaction, which may be epitomized as follows: (1) The execution and recordation of the bill of sale at the time of the alleged sale; (2) the delivery at the time of the execution and recordation of the bill of sale of the key to the barn in which the property was stored; (3) that 10 days after the execution of the bill of sale and the delivery of the key Hedgpeth Bros. took Guthrie to the barn and pointed out the property; and (4) that at the time of pointing out the property to Guthrie, Mr. Rhein was informed that Guthrie was the owner thereof.

In our opinion these facts, measured by the rule declared in section 3440 of the Civil Code, fall short of showing that there was an immediate delivery of the property in controversy to the plaintiff by Hedgpeth Bros., or that there was an actual and continued change of possession such as the law demands in order to validate a sale of personal property as against the claims of creditors.

[2] In an action between the parties to a transaction involving a dispute as to the title to the property claimed to have been sold, the execution and recordation of the bill of sale might suffice as prima facie proof of the respective rights of the parties; but in the present action it was of no consequence in the determination of the question as to whether or not there was an immediate delivery and an actual change of possession of the property. George v. Pierce, 123 Cal. 172, 55 Pac. 775, 56 Pac. 53.

[3] The delivery of the key to the barn where the property was stored did not in and of itself constitute an actual delivery. Viewed in its most favorable aspect, this circumstance was merely evidence of a constructive delivery and possession, whereas the law requires in every case, where the situation and nature of the property render it possible, that the change of possession must be visible, apparent, and actual, and not merely constructive. Civ. Code, § 2440; Chaffin v. Doub, 14 Cal. 386; Bunting v. Saltz, 84 Cal. 168, 24 Pac. 167; Sequeira v. Collins, 153 Cal. 430, 95 Pac. 876. The word "actual," as used in section 3440 of the Civil Code, has been defined to mean "existing in act, and truly and absolutely so; really acted or acting; carried out; opposed to potential, possible, visual or theoretical." Bunting v. Saltz, supra.

[4] Conceding that a mere pointing out of the property in conjunction with a previous constructive delivery may, in certain circumstances, constitute a sufficient delivery and change of possession, the undisputed fact remains that 10 days at least had elapsed between the constructive delivery and the actual viewing of the property. This fact in itself, under all of the circumstances of the present case, is obviously and absolutely opposed to the claim that an immediate delivery of possession followed the sale. Immediate delivery was imperatively necessary under the statute in order to constitute a sale which would be valid in the eyes of the law and protected from the claims of creditors. This is so, even though the creditors had acquired no rights by attachment or execution previous to a delivery which may have been actual, but which did not immediately follow the sale. Howe v. Johnson, 107 Cal. 75, 40 Pac. 42; Ruggles v. Cannedy, 127 Cal. 300, 53 Pac. 911, 59 Pac. 827, 46 L. R. A. 371.

We do not wish to be understood as declaring that the phrase "immediate delivery," as used in the statute, means delivery instantan. Delivery within a reasonable time, or as soon after the sale as is practicable, will satisfy the demand of the statute; and in determining what is a reasonable time the character of the property, its situation, and all of the circumstances of the transaction must be considered. Samuels v. Gorham, 5 Cal. 226; Carpenter v. Clark, 2 Nev. 246; Bassinger v. Spangler, 9 Colo. 189, 10 Pac. 809. In the case of Howe v. Johnson, supra, the property in controversy was capable of immediate delivery; and in that case it was squarely held that a delivery of the property about two weeks after the sale was not an immediate delivery as required by section 3440 of the Civil Code, and that, as a consequence, the sale must be conclusively presumed to be fraudulent and void as against the claims of creditors existing at the time of the sale.

We are not unmindful of the suggestion of counsel for the plaintiff that the statutory rule under discussion must be reasonably applied to the facts of each particular case, and that, therefore, the determination of the question as to whether or not there has been in any given case an immediate delivery and actual possession of the thing sold depends, in a measure, upon the character of the thing sold, the nature of the transaction, the position of the parties, and the intended use of the property. Porter v. Butcher, 98 Cal. 458, 33 Pac. 335. Thus in cases where actual delivery and immediate possession are, by reason of the peculiar situation and bulky nature of the thing sold, impossible by ordinary means and methods, the strictness of the rule is relaxed to meet the exigencies of the case. Chaffin v. Doub, supra, was such a case; and there the court, in construing and applying the rule, declared that: "It may be said in general that a delivery must be a transfer of possession and control made by the seller with the purpose and effect of putting the goods out of his hands. This is a sufficient delivery, whatever its form. Hence it may be constructive, as by delivering the key of a warehouse, or making an entry in the books of a warehouse keeper, or delivery with an indorsement of a bill of lading, or even a receipt, or without even such, when the goods are bulky and difficult of access, as a quantity of lumber floating in boom, or a mass of granite, or a large stock of hay." In the present case the property consisted solely of wines and liquors, some of which was in barrels, some in demijohns, and the balance in bottles. There was no apparent reason—and none has been attempted to be shown—why Guthrie could not have taken actual possession of the property at the time of or immediately following the sale. The present case, therefore, does not fall within the category of those cases wherein it has been held that an actual and immediate delivery is not necessary where, by reason of the situation of the property or its character, such delivery is impracticable or impossible.

[5] The fact that Rhein, the owner of the barn in which the property was stored, had been informed some 10 days after the alleged sale that Guthrie was then the owner of the property, was of no importance in determining whether or not there had been a valid sale as against the creditors of Hedgpeth Bros. Verbal or written notice of a sale of personal property given to an individual or to any number of individuals unaccompanied by an immediate and actual change in the status of the property is not equivalent to delivery of possession; and Guthrie's assertion that he had purchased the property in question was but a mere conclusion and a self-serving declaration, which had no legitimate tendency to prove a delivery. Sequeira v. Collins, 153 Cal. 426, 95 Pac. 876. See opinion of Beatty, C. J., in Hunt v. Hammel, 142 Cal. 461, 76 Pac. 378.

In concluding this phase of the case, it will suffice to say that for the reasons stated the facts hereinbefore enumerated, taken singly or all together, were not, under the particular circumstances of the case, sufficient to support the finding of the jury that the alleged sale of the property in question was accompanied by an immediate delivery and an actual and continued change of possession within the purview of the statute.

[6] The erroneous finding of the jury doubtless was inspired by the erroneous instructions of the trial court, wherein the jury were in effect charged (1) that, if the property was so situated that the vendee was entitled to and could rightfully take possession of it at his pleasure, he is considered as having actually received it, and that it was not necessary under the law and the circumstances of this case that he should actually take the property into his possession; (2) that, when a valuable consideration is paid for the purchase of property, the purchase is presumed to be in good faith; (3) that fraud is never presumed, but must be affirmatively proven by the party alleging the same. The language of the first instruction just referred to is almost identical with that of an instruction which in the case of Pearce v. Boggs, 99 Cal. 340, 33 Pac. 906, was held to be prejudicial error. To charge the jury, as in effect the trial court did in the present case, that the right of the vendee to take the property at his pleasure was the equivalent of an actual delivery was held, in the case last cited, to be in direct conflict with section 3440, Civil Code, for the reason that "if the property is so situated that the vendee can take possession thereof at his pleasure, his failure to take such possession constitutes the very fraud which the statute is intended to prevent, and renders the previous transfer to him void as against the creditors of his vendor." See, also, Hesthal v. Myles, 53 Cal. 623.

The averment of the defendant's answer that there was no immediate delivery and no actual and continued change of possession of the property presented the paramount issue in the present case. Notwithstanding the presence of proof which tended strongly to support the averment, and bring the facts of the case within the presumption provided for by section 3440, Civil Code, the trial court charged the jury that "fraud is never to be presumed, but must be affirmatively proven by the parties alleging the same. The law presumes that all men are fair and honest, that their dealings are in good faith and without intention to disturb, cheat, hinder, delay, or defraud others. And where a transaction called into question is equally capable of two constructions—one that it is fair and honest, and one that it is dishonest—then the law is that the fair and honest construction must prevail, and the transaction called in question must be determined to be fair and honest; and in this connection I instruct you that the law presumes the transaction between Hedgpeth Bros. and Guthrie to have been fair and honest, and you must so consider it until the contrary has been proven by a preponderance of evidence." The vice of the quoted instruction lies in the fact that it ignores the provisions of section 3440, Civil Code, which, in effect, declares that a sale of personal property under the circumstances therein enumerated is conclusively presumed to be fraudulent, and therefore void against those who are the creditors of the vendor while he remains in possession of the property.

[7] Ordinarily the burden of proof, where it is not shifted by statutory provisions, is on the party assailing a transfer of property upon the ground of fraud; but where, as here, facts appear which prima facie create or tend to create a statutory presumption of fraud as against the vendors' creditors, the burden of proof not only shifts to the party claiming under the vendor, but the presumption, if established, renders the transaction absolutely void, under our statute. While it is true generally that fraud must be established like any other fact in a case, and that as a matter of law, in the absence of proof, it is never to be presumed, nevertheless, in actions of the kind under consideration, if the facts appearing in evidence tend to create the statutory presumption of fraud, this in itself would be a complete defense to the action; and of necessity the defendant here was entitled to have the jury fully and clearly instructed upon the law appertaining to that phase of the case. Cooper v. Friedman, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 585, 57 S. W. 581.

Upon the question of fraud the trial court further charged the jury that, "when a valuable consideration is paid for the purchase of property, the purchase is presumed to be in good faith," and that, before a finding could be made against the plaintiff in the present case on the question of fraud, the jury "must be satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence not only that Hedgpeth Bros. transferred the property to plaintiff with the intention to defraud their creditors, but that plaintiff himself either knew of such intention, and was a party thereto, or as a reasonable person ought to have known thereof." This instruction, not only eliminates, but nullifies, the provisions of section 3440, Civil Code, and clearly, under the authorities cited, the giving of it was prejudicial error. We express no opinion as to whether or not the evidence upon the whole case, as claimed by defendant, shows that Hedgpeth Bros. transferred the property in question to the plaintiff in fraud of creditors, and that plaintiff was aware of such intention and was willfully a party thereto. Assuming, however, that defendant failed in his proof to support that issue, still it was the duty of the jury to find against the plaintiff, and the trial court should have so charged, if the evidence was otherwise sufficient to warrant a finding that the transfer of the property was not accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by an actual and continued change of possession. The error of these instructions was not cured by anything which the trial court said elsewhere in its charge to the jury. True, the trial court did in another part of its charge correctly state the law as applied to the invalidity of a transfer of personal property which was not accompanied by an immediate delivery nor followed by an actual and continued change of possession.

[8] The charge of the court, however, was in its entirety so hopelessly contradictory and inconsistent in its application of the law to the vital issues of the case as to make it impossible to determine which of the trial court's conflicting views of the law the jury adopted as the basis for their verdict. For instance, in one part of its charge, the trial court told the jury that the sale in question was conclusively presumed to be fraudulent if it was not followed by an actual change of possession, and that "an 'actual change' of possession means existing in fact. * * * The word 'actual' as used in the law is intended to exclude the idea of a mere formal change of possession. * * * On the other hand, the jury in a preceding instruction were erroneously told that, "if the property was so situated that Guthrie was entitled to and could rightfully take possession of it at his pleasure, it was not necessary under the law that Guthrie should take the property into his possession. A delivery thus made will satisfy the requirements of the law."

Clearly these two instructions are irreconcilable and confusing. They are fair examples of the conflict of ideas which runs throughout the charge of the court; and doubtless so confused the jury that they were unable from the instructions as a whole to fully, fairly, and intelligently appreciate and apply the law of the case. It being impossible to tell which of the several conflicting instructions controlled the verdict of the jury, a material error in any one of them must be deemed to be prejudicial. Sapenfield v. Main St., etc., R. R. Co., 91 Cal. 48, 27 Pac. 590; Stephenson v. S. P. Co., 102 Cal. 150, 34 Pac. 618, 36 Pac. 407; Rathbun v. White, 157 Cal. 253, 107 Pac. 309; Ryan v. Oakland Gas, etc., Co., 10 Cal. App. 492, 102 Pac. 558.

[9] The point is made that the record shows only the requested instructions of the respective parties, and not the charge of the court itself. Because of this it is insisted that the record does not affirmatively show all of the instructions given by the court, and that therefore the error and conflict in the requested instructions cannot be considered. The point is without merit. Each of the requested instructions was indorsed as "given" by the trial judge; and, although the record does not show an independent charge by the court, it is evident that the court adopted the several requested instructions as the law of the case, and gave them without modification or reconciliation as its charge to the jury.

[10] The trial court erred in its ruling admitting in evidence, over the objection of the defendant, the testimony of the witnesses Rittenhouse and Moore. The evident purpose of the testimony was to show that Deiter had made a settlement in full of his claims as a creditor of Hedgpeth Bros. prior to the rendition of the judgment in his favor in the justice's court, and therefore was not a creditor at the time of the levy of the execution by the defendant Carney.

It does not appear from the record before us that the subject-matter of Deiter's claim, whether adjusted or not by Messrs. Rittenhouse and Moore, constituted the cause of action in the justice's court wherein Deiter recovered a judgment against Hedgpeth Bros.; and therefore the testimony in question did not show or tend to show that the claim sued on in the justice's court had been settled in full prior to the judgment rendered therein. But, apart from this, the judgment and execution in the justice's court action of Deiter v. Hedgpeth Bros. was offered and admitted in evidence in the present case without objection. The judgment and execution were prima facie valid. The testimony of the witnesses Rittenhouse and Moore was offered and admitted apparently for the purpose of impeaching collaterally the validity of the justice's court judgment and execution. This could not be done without violating the settled rules of evidence in actions of this character; and to permit it was clearly error. Brush v. Smith, 141 Cal. 466, 75 Pac. 55; Gregory v. Bovier, 77 Cal. 121, 19 Pac. 232; Norcross v. Nunan, 61 Cal. 642; 2 Jones on Ev. (1st Ed.) § 601.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: KERRIGAN, J.; HALL, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by C. D. Hudson against the Seeley Specialties Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Gilbert F. Wyvell, for appellant. Tom C. Thornton and Tobias R. Archer, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment for the sum of $1,955.77 and interest entered against it. The facts upon which plaintiff based his cause of action, and as determined by the findings of the court, were these: On or about May 9, 1910, plaintiff held a certain contract theretofore made with a corporation called the High Frequency Ignition Coil Company, and at the time mentioned he was approached by defendant and informed that defendant had acquired a majority of the stock and the control of said High Frequency Ignition Coil Company, and that it desired to secure a cancellation of the contract held by plaintiff. Defendant offered to pay plaintiff for the cancellation and surrender of the contract $1,700, this amount to be paid on the 21st of November following, which offer was accepted. The transaction, however, for the payment of this money took the following form: Defendant agreed to have issued to plaintiff 1,700 shares of the capital stock of the High Frequency Ignition Coil Company, which plaintiff was to hold until the money provided to be paid for the surrender of his contract became due, when, upon the redelivery of the certificates for the 1,700 shares of stock to defendant, he was to receive the $1,700. The following writing was made and executed by defendant as evidencing the latter agreement:

"Los Angeles, Cal., May 21, 1910.

"Six months after date hereof, we, the Seeley Specialties Co., a corporation, doing business under the laws of the state of California, hereby agree to purchase of C. D. Hudson, of Los Angeles, seventeen hundred shares of the capital stock of the High Frequency Ignition Coil Co., represented by certificate No. 100, dated the ninth day of May, 1910, for the sum of seventeen hundred dollars ($1,700) providing this agreement is presented within ten days after maturity; otherwise the said Seeley Specialties Co. is released from any and all obligations to purchase said stock. Seeley Specialties Company, by Henry Fleetwood, Pres., by Geo. Howard, Sec. [Seal.]"

Immediately upon the maturity of this contract, plaintiff tendered to the Seeley Specialties Company the certificates of shares of stock in the other corporation mentioned and demanded payment of the $1,700, which was refused him. At the date of this tender, an assessment had been levied against the stock of the High Frequency Ignition Coil Company, the amount which was due as a charge against the 1,700 shares of stock held by plaintiff, being the sum of $255.77. After the commencement of this action, and in order to prevent a sale of the stock on account of that assessment, which had become delinquent, plaintiff paid the sum required to satisfy that demand and filed a supplemental complaint, setting up an additional cause of action for the amount of the assessment. The court found in favor of plaintiff on all of the issues tendered by the complaint and supplemental complaint, and its findings were made upon sufficient evidence. The complaint set forth all of the facts constituting the cause of action in narrative form, and the court did not err in overruling the demurrer of defendant interposed thereto.

[1] It was contended that the action must be treated as one for damages, and that the complaint nowhere set out facts from which it could be determined plaintiff had suffered any damage. The facts, as alleged by the complaint, were so closely parallel to those involved in the case of Gay v. Dare, 103 Cal. 454, 37 Pac. 466, as to make the decision in that action applicable to this upon all of the chief points of objection raised by defendant. The court there says that in cases of this kind the contract will be construed as not amounting in law to a contract to repurchase, but that it is one whereby an option to rescind is reserved to the vendee; and that upon the exercise of such option title to the property at once vests in the original vendor. The obligation of the defendant in this case was to pay plaintiff the sum of $1,700 on or within 10 days after the 21st day of November, 1910, which it refused to do. In order to protect the stock from forced sale to satisfy the assessment levied thereon, payment of which was then due, plaintiff was compelled to pay an additional sum of $255.77. This amount constituted an account for special damages accruing to him by reason of the refusal of defendant to fulfill its obligation, and which, in our opinion, and under the decision in Gay v. Dare, he was entitled to recover. We do not think that the fact that this assessment became a lien before the day of the maturity of the written contract affected either the sufficiency of the tender made by plaintiff, or his right to recover the additional amount paid to satisfy the assessment, as damages. When he offered back to the defendant the stock which they had agreed he might surrender to them, it was their duty to receive it and pay him the amount agreed upon. When they did not do this, plaintiff continued to own the stock for their benefit; and he rightfully assumed the duty of protecting it from forced sale while it remained in his hands, or subject to any control on his part.

[2] The further point is made that the contract was not shown to be the contract of defendant corporation, because it was not made to appear that the board of directors had expressly authorized its execution; and, further, that no consideration had been received by defendant for the making of it. The contract, as executed, was made in the name of the defendant company; it had the corporate seal attached, together with the names of the president and secretary. It appeared by the evidence that there were only three directors; the president and secretary being two of the number, and the third director being one who took no active part in the management of the corporation. It was testified to by the secretary, who signed the contract, that the president managed the affairs of the corporation. At any rate, and further than this, it did appear clearly that the contract as made was within the corporate powers of defendant corporation; that it was deemed to be of benefit to the corporation; and that the corporation received it, and whatever benefits may have accrued on that account, without disclaiming the authority of its officers to make a binding contract in that behalf. Plaintiff, when he surrendered his contract with the High Frequency Ignition Coil Company to defendant, surrendered rights which admittedly were of considerable value, and the corporation receiving the benefit of such surrender certainly could not afterwards be heard to say that no benefit was received by it, and thus escape any liability on account of its obligation to compensate plaintiff for his property.

[3,4] It is very clear to us that there was ample consideration to support the making of the contract here sued upon, and also that the president, in his capacity as manager of the corporation, had authority to make the contract in its name; further, that, even conceding that the officers of the corporation did not possess authority to enter into the contract, by receiving whatever benefits may have flowed therefrom and remaining silent until the maturing day of the contract had arrived, the corporation is estopped from disclaiming its liability. Brown v. Crown Gold M. Co., 150 Cal. 376, 89 Pac. 86.

The judgment is affirmed.

HARLAN DOUGLAS CO. v. MONCUR,
Superior Judge. (Civ. 1,155.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District,
California. May 27, 1912.)

ASSIGNMENTS (§ 123*)—CONTROL OF LITIGATION.

A contract, transferring all the capital stock of plaintiff corporation, reserved to H., among other things, the right to prosecute to final judgment, at his own cost and for his own benefit, any suit to which the corporation was then a party. Held that, under Code Civ. Proc. § 385, providing that, in case of transfer of interest, the action or proceeding may be continued in the name of the original party, or the court may allow the person to whom the transfer is made to be substituted in the action or proceeding, the corporation, after the transfer and after the purchaser had become president thereof, was not entitled to control a pending suit brought by the corporation, nor to demand a substitution of attorneys therein.

Application for a writ of mandamus to compel a substitution of attorneys. Denied.

Schweitzer & Hutton, for petitioner. E. A. Meserve and Hanson, Hackler & Heath, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Proceeding in mandamus to compel defendant, as judge of the superior court, to make an order of substitution of attorneys in an action entitled Harlan Douglas Company, a Corporation, v. Dean Drug Company, a Corporation, now pending in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles. An alternative writ was issued herein, and a hearing has been had after return made thereto. It appears that on or about the 12th day of January, 1912, a motion was made before the defendant, sitting as judge of the superior court, by Schweitzer & Hutton, Esqs., representing the Harlan Douglas Company, by which motion an order was requested that the attorneys mentioned be substituted as attorneys for plaintiff in the action referred to. The motion came on to be heard and was resisted by the counsel, who appeared as attorneys of record for the plaintiff in that action, and evidence by affidavits was received which established the following state of facts: On or about the 16th day of June, 1911, John Harlan, who then owned or controlled all of the capital stock of the Harlan Douglas Company, made a contract in writing with one C. P. V. Watson, whereby the said Harlan agreed to sell to Watson all of the capital stock of the Harlan Douglas Company. By that contract it was agreed that there should be reserved to Harlan, among other things, the right to prosecute, at his own cost and charge, and for his own benefit, to final judgment any suit at law to which the said company was then a party, and that Watson should be relieved by Harlan from any liability for the payment of charges or costs by reason of such litigation; that this contract so made by Harlan was made with the knowledge of the stockholders of the Harlan Douglas Company; that Watson, having so acquired all of the stock of said corporation, became president thereof; and that later he distributed some of the shares of stock to other persons. The evidence heard was further sufficient to show that Harlan had acted in good faith, and had proceeded to discharge the obligations assumed by him under his contract with Watson, and that he claimed the right to and was proceeding with the prosecution of the action first mentioned, when it was sought to have a substitution of attorneys made in that suit. In this proceeding it is for us only to determine whether, upon the facts as shown to the judge of the superior court, the petitioner was entitled to have an order of substitution of attorneys made, as demanded by its motion. In our opinion, it was clearly not so entitled. By section 385 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is provided as follows: "An action or proceeding does not abate by the death or any disability of a party, or by the transfer of any interest therein, if the cause of action survive or continue. In case of the death or any disability of a party, the court, on motion, may allow the action or proceeding to be continued by or against his representative or successor in interest. In case of any other transfer of interest, the action or proceeding may be continued in the name of the original party, or the court may allow the person to whom the transfer is made to be substituted in the action or proceeding."

Under the terms of the contract made between Harlan and Watson, the interest of the Harlan Douglas Company in the cause of action set up in the suit of that corporation against the Dean Drug Company passed to Harlan. Therefore the petitioner, having no further interest in the matter in litigation, had no right to interfere with the control of the suit by Harlan. The provisions of the Code which we have quoted gave to Harlan, at his option, the right to either continue the prosecution of that action in his own name, or in the name of the corporation.

Peremptory writ denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Action by Fred Nelson against H. Sumida and another. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Everts & Ewing, for appellant. S. C. St. John and Frank Kauke, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. In the month of January, 1907, the defendants sold and delivered to the Fowler Nursery & Warehouse Company of the city of Fresno some 47,000 rooted vines at the agreed price of $11 per thousand, which was finally and fully paid to the defendants. The present action arises out of that transaction, and is for damages alleged to have been sustained by the purchaser because of the alleged breach by the defendants of a covenant of warranty which, it is claimed, accompanied and was made a part of the contract of sale. In that behalf the plaintiff's complaint, in substance, alleges that at the time of the sale and as a part of the consideration for the purchase price thereof the defendants covenanted and agreed with the purchaser that the vines and all of them should be Malaga rooted vines and of no other variety; that, when delivered, they should be true to name; that defendants warranted said vines to be Malaga rooted vines and no other, and that the purchase price was paid because of such warranty; that all of the vines delivered to the purchaser were not Malaga rooted vines, but that contrary to the covenant of warranty about 20,000 of said vines were of a miscellaneous kind and of an inferior variety; that the purchaser, acting under the warranty and in the course of its business, sold all of the 47,000 vines received from the defendants to several of its customers upon the representation that they were Malaga vines; that, because of the fact that a large portion of such vines was not true to name and made up of a miscellaneous variety of vines of an inferior grade and value, the purchaser, the Fowler Nursery & Warehouse Company, to its detriment and damage in the sum of $2,500, lost many customers and much business, and was compelled to repay in money the loss resulting to those of its customers to whom it had sold such vines. The Fowler Nursery & Warehouse Company assigned its claim for damages against the defendants to the plaintiff, and upon a trial of the action judgment was rendered for the defendants. From the judgment and an order denying a new trial the plaintiff appeals upon the judgment roll and a statement of the case.

The defendants by their answer admitted the sale of the vines, but denied the making of the covenant of warranty pleaded in the plaintiff's complaint, and alleged in that behalf that the only agreement made by the parties to the sale concerning the kind of rootings sold and purchased was that they should be from the vineyard known as the "Turner Vineyard." Defendants further denied that the vines sold and delivered under the contract were of any other variety than Malaga rooted vines, and alleged affirmatively that they were in fact Malaga rooted vines and true to name, although not warranted to be such by the defendants.

[1] The trial court's findings of fact are assailed by plaintiff upon the grounds that they are inconsistent and contradictory of themselves, and that they are not supported by the evidence. The findings are claimed to be contradictory, in this: that, notwithstanding a finding that the vines were "all Malaga vines and true to name," it is also found in effect that the sale was not made upon or accompanied by a covenant that the vines were "all Malaga vines and true to name," but that the only representation and agreement made by the defendants with reference to the kind and character of the vines was that they were from the "Turner Vineyard." Because of the alleged conflict in the findings plaintiff insists that it is impossible to ascertain upon what theory the paramount issue in the case was decided.

In our opinion the conflict, if any, in the findings, is more apparent than real, and may be readily reconciled when read and construed in conjunction with the evidence adduced at the trial. Upon a close analysis of the evidence, it will be found that the findings complained of are founded upon the theory that practically all the vines in the

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes.

"Turner Vineyard" were of the Malaga variety, and that the defendants agreed to gather and deliver the vines sold from that particular vineyard. The evidence further shows that plaintiff's assignor was fully informed of the kind of vines grown in the Turner vineyard, and that it would be satisfied if the vines contracted for were gathered and delivered from that vineyard. It follows that, if in fact all the vines sold and delivered did come from the Turner vineyard, they must have been of the "Malaga variety and true to name" to the extent contemplated by the parties to the sale. This, we take it, is all that was intended to be found by the trial court; and, so construed, the findings complained of must be held to be free from conflict.

[2] As to the point that the findings are not supported by the evidence, we find upon a careful examination of the record that the testimony offered and received in support of defendants' case accords with the trial court's finding of fact to the effect that it was agreed by the parties to the contract that the vines should be from the Turner vineyard, and that no representations or agreement concerning the kind or quality of such vines were made by the defendants other than that they should come from the Turner vineyard.

The plaintiff Nelson, as a member of the Fowler Nursery & Warehouse Company, negotiated the sale; and he testified, in substance, that it was his purpose to purchase only Malaga vines, and so informed the defendants, and that the defendants represented and agreed at the time of the sale that the vines were to be gathered from the Turner vineyard and true to name. It may be safely said, however, that nowhere in the plaintiff's testimony, or elsewhere in the record, is it made to appear that the defendants, as is alleged in the complaint, expressly agreed "that said vines and all thereof should be Malaga rooted vines and nothing else." The sum and substance of Nelson's testimony upon the point under discussion was that he wanted Malaga vines; that he inquired of defendants from what vineyard they procured Malaga cuttings, and, in reply, was "assured that the cuttings were taken from the Turner vineyard and that they were true to name." On the other hand, H. Sumida, the defendant who negotiated the sale with Nelson, testified that although he did represent and agree that the vines were to come from the Turner vineyard, and stated generally that they were Malagas and not mixed vines, nevertheless nothing was said at the time of the sale or at any other time about guaranteeing the vines to be Malaga vines, and that no warranty other than that the vines were to come from the Turner vineyard was ever given or made.

It may be true that, if the trial court had accepted Nelson's testimony to the exclusion of everything else appearing in evidence, it might have justified a finding that, impliedly at least, the defendants had warranted the vines to be Malaga vines. The evidence upon the whole case, however, is in substantial conflict as to what was said and done by the parties to the sale upon the subject of a warranty. It is likewise in conflict as to whether or not the vines sold and delivered all came from the Turner vineyard, and the evidence upon the whole sufficiently supports, we think, the trial court's findings of fact that no warranty, other than that the vines were to come from the Turner vineyard, was ever given or made by the defendants, and that all the vines actually sold and delivered did come from the Turner vineyard, as was warranted by the defendants.

[3] Several rulings of the trial court in the admission and rejection of evidence are assigned as error, but the trial court's finding of fact that the vines were delivered in accordance with the warranty of the defendants was in effect a finding that there was no breach of the warranty upon which plaintiff's cause of action for damages was founded, and such finding necessarily foreclosed plaintiff of all right to recover the damages alleged and sued for. In so far, therefore, as the rulings complained of relate to the issue of damages, they are of no consequence, and may be disregarded upon this appeal.

[4] With respect to the trial court's rejection of testimony bearing upon the issue of warranty, it will suffice to say that in each instance wherein the ruling of the court is claimed to be erroneous the question objected to sought to elicit the opinion or conclusion of the witness, and for this reason, if for no other, the testimony was properly excluded.

Upon an examination of the entire record we are satisfied that the cause was fairly tried and correctly decided.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

CONTEMPT (§ 71*)—IMPRISONMENT FOR FINE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1218, authorizing a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding five days, or both as a punishment for contempt, a sentence to imprisonment for two days and to pay a fine of $200, and, in default of payment, imprisonment one day for each $2 thereof, is valid; Pen. Code, § 1205, which authorizes imprisonment for nonpayment of a fine to the extent of one day for every $2 of the fine unpaid, not to exceed the term for which defendant has been sentenced being inapplicable to contempt cases.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. §§ 247, 248; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

Application by H. P. Jorgensen for writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded to custody.

Peck, Bunker & Cole, for petitioner. F. G. Ostrander, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. On the 9th day of May, 1912, by an order duly given and made by the superior court of Merced county, petitioner was adjudged guilty of contempt of the said superior court for the violation of its decree in an injunction case, and was sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail for the period of two days and to pay a fine of $200, and, in default of the payment of said fine to be confined in the county jail for one day for every two dollars of said fine. Petitioner was taken into custody and imprisoned on May 9th, and so remained until May 16th, when the petition for the writ herein was filed.

There is but one question presented, namely: Is that part of the sentence imprisoning petitioner one day for each $2 of the fine remaining unpaid void? The claim of petitioner is that the sentence was imposed under section 1218 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which authorizes the infliction of a fine not to exceed $500 or imprisonment not to exceed five days, or both; that section 1205 of the Penal Code, which authorizes the imposition of imprisonment for nonpayment of fine to the extent of one day for every two dollars of the fine unpaid, expressly provides that such imprisonment must not "extend in any case beyond the term for which defendant has been sentenced." It is hence contended that, the extent of the imprisonment being limited by section 1218 of the Code of Civil Procedure to five days, the imprisonment could not be prolonged under section 1205 of the Penal Code and that its infliction is double punishment.

People v. Brown, 113 Cal. 35, 45 Pac. 181, is cited in support of petitioner's contention. That was the case where the defendant had been convicted of crime for which the statute authorized a sentence of imprisonment for a limited period. So, also, are all the other cases cited by petitioner. In Ex parte Abbott, 94 Cal. 333, 29 Pac. 622, the question arose in a contempt proceedings, and it was there held that a superior court imposing a fine for contempt has the power to make and enforce a judgment that in default of payment the party in contempt be imprisoned in satisfaction of the fine until the fine is satisfied, at the rate of one day for every $2 of the fine unpaid. It was also held that section 1205 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1891, does not apply to cases of contempt. The point was involved to some extent in Ex parte Krouse, 148 Cal. 232, 82 Pac. 1043, although the fine there was $100, and the order was that in default of payment "he be imprisoned in the county jail * * * until the said fine is paid, such imprisonment not to exceed one day for each twenty dollars of said fine that shall so remain unpaid." Inasmuch as section 1205 of the Penal Code has no application to contempt cases, the principle decided in the Krouse Case seems to have been the same as decided in the Abbott Case, supra. Petitioner contends that the Abbott Case differs from the case here, in this, that here a judgment of imprisonment and fine was imposed, while in the Abbott Case a fine only was imposed. We cannot see that this difference affects the principle decided.

That the court imposed punishment by imprisonment and also imposed a fine would not take from the court the power to enforce the payment of the fine as was exercised in the Abbott Case.

The writ is discharged and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

LENNON, P. J. Plaintiff's complaint in this action consists of two counts. The first count in effect alleges that plaintiff's assignor entered into a contract with the defendant for the purchase and sale of certain live stock for the sum of $5,170.46, which was to be paid upon the delivery of the cattle; that $500 thereof was deposited with the defendant as payment in part; that the sum so paid was to be returned to plaintiff's assignor if defendant failed to deliver the cattle as per the terms and conditions of the contract; that the cattle contracted for were subsequently delivered and accepted as agreed, and that, in addition to the $500 previously paid on account, the full purchase price was paid to the defendant; that, although demand had been made upon the defendant for the said $500, he had failed and refused to return the same. The second count of plaintiff's complaint stated a cause of action in the nature of a claim for moneys had and received, based upon the theory that the $500 paid on account was to be returned, unless the defendant delivered to plaintiff's assignor sufficient of the cattle contracted for to equal in value, quality, and quantity, the sum of $500. The answer of the defendant denied all of the material allegations of the complaint, and, in addition, pleaded in abatement of the action the non-joinder of a necessary party defendant. Upon the issues thus raised, the trial court rendered and entered judgment for the defendant, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff has appealed upon the judgment roll and a statement of the case.

By the terms of the contract, a written memorandum of which was offered and received in evidence, the defendant agreed to deliver the cattle in a specified condition to the plaintiff's assignor at King City, in the county of Monterey. They were to be delivered in two herds—one on May 20, 1909, and the other on June 1st of the same year.

With reference to the number of cattle purchased and the price to be paid therefor, the written memorandum of the contract recited merely that plaintiff's assignor had bought from the defendant "all fat cows and heifers at 6½¢," and that the sum of $500 had been paid on account of the purchase. It is apparent, therefore, that the exact number of cattle sold and to be delivered under the contract was left to be subsequently determined by the parties to the contract; and that the price ultimately to be paid was a matter of calculation to be made upon delivery.

The trial court in effect found as facts that on May 24, 1909, the defendant delivered to plaintiff's assignor a portion of the cattle contracted for, and that the defendant received in payment therefor the sum of $5,170.46; that it was not agreed between the parties to the sale that $5,170.46 was the total purchase price of the two herds of cattle, but, on the contrary, that the said sum, estimated in accordance with the terms of the contract, was only the value and purchase price of the first herd sold and actually delivered to plaintiff's assignor; that the $500 in dispute was intended and agreed by the parties to be applied as part payment only on the purchase price of the cattle agreed to be delivered on June 1, 1909; that, although the defendant, on said last-mentioned date, had offered to make delivery, and was at all times ready, able, and willing to make delivery, of the second herd of cattle in accord with the conditions specified in the contract of sale, plaintiff's assignor refused to accept delivery of the same then, or at any time since then.

That these findings are amply supported by the evidence is not disputed by plaintiff; but it is insisted that the defendant should not have been permitted to show a breach of the contract, or have judgment under an answer which, by general denials only, puts in issue the facts constituting plaintiff's cause of action; and that, unless a breach of the contract was specifically pleaded as a defense to the action, and damages for the breach sought by way of cross-complaint or counterclaim, no relief could be afforded defendant in the present action.

[1] A general denial puts in issue the material allegations of the complaint. Code Civ. Proc. § 437. In the present case the plaintiff's complaint was not verified; and the general denial of the defendant's answer put in issue all of the material allegations of the complaint, and placed the burden upon plaintiff of showing facts sufficient to constitute the particular cause of action alleged in the complaint. One of the allegations of plaintiff's complaint was "that on or about the 24th day of May, 1909, the Oakland Meat & Packing Company [plaintiff's assignor] accepted the quantity of cattle * * * agreed to be purchased by it." The evidence complained of was addressed to the issue raised by the denial of this averment; and, as it tended to show a breach of the contract by plaintiff's assignor in refusing to accept the cattle, such evidence was clearly admissible.

[2, 3] In the present case the evidence is more than sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the defendant was at all times ready, able, and willing to make delivery of the cattle contracted for; and that such delivery was prevented solely by the neglect and default of the plaintiff's assignor. The burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show the defendant's breach of the contract; and if, as the trial court found, plaintiff's assignor itself first breached the contract, without fault or failure of the defendant, no cause of action for the return of the money paid on account of the contract existed in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant was properly permitted to avail himself of such defense under the general issue. Civ. Code, § 1439; Wood Curtis Co. v. Seurich, 5 Cal. App. 252, 90 Pac. 51.

The findings of the trial court upon the issues of price, payment, and delivery were, in themselves, sufficient to warrant and support a judgment in favor of the defendant; and those findings necessarily defeat and dispose of plaintiff's right to recover on the contract, whether it be an individual or partnership obligation. It is unnecessary, therefore, to pass upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support the issue and finding of nonjoinder, or to decide the question as to whether or not parol evidence was admissible to prove that issue.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

RANDALL et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (Civ. 1,197.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 27, 1912.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 381*)—BOND—JUSTIFICATION OF SURETIES—TIME.

Notice of the justification of sureties on an appeal bond, and the time set therefor, being more than five days after notice of exception to the sureties, was ineffectual to preserve the rights of the parties on appeal.

Application for writ of review by Monroe Randall and others against the Superior Court of Los Angeles County. Denied.

Randall & Gaines, for petitioners. Edwin Judson Brown, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. It appears from the record, files, and papers herein that the notice of exception to the sufficiency of the sureties was duly given and made on the 22d of March, 1912; that the notice for the justification of the sureties and the time set therefor was the 29th day of March, more than five days after service of the notice of exception. This was beyond the time authorized by the statute, and such notice was ineffectual to preserve the rights of the parties upon the appeal.

It is therefore ordered that the writ be denied.

18, 1912, the judgment appealed from herein is therefore reversed, with directions to the trial court to overrule the general demurrer.

CO. (Sac. 1,847.)

For former opinion, see 124 Pac. 692.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing of this cause, and from the judgment of the court, upon the ground that the district attorney of Solano county had no authority to institute the action in the name of the people of the state. The statute, in my opinion, authorizes but one action in the name of the people, and that is an action to be instituted by the district attorney of the one county where the nuisance exists—where, in other words, it has its situs—or perhaps by the Attorney General in a case where the district attorney neglects his duty. Within the meaning of this statute the smelting works in Contra Costa county was the nuisance, if there was any nuisance, and not the fumes and gases in Solano county. The works have a situs; the gases have none. To hold that every place to which they may be carried by the wind is the place where the nuisance exists is to hold that the statute authorizes, not merely one action in the name of the people of the state, but an indefinite number of actions. If this view was essential to the protection of the residents of Benicia, or any part of Solano county, there would be much to commend it; but it is not essential. They can commence and maintain actions in their own name for the abatement of the nuisance, if it is a nuisance. It is in such an action that, in my opinion, the issue should be tried. This difference as to parties would in many cases be determinative of the place of trial, and in causes involving local interests and affected by local feeling the place of trial is not a trifling consideration.

In re DOMBROWSKI'S ESTATE. (L. A. 3,117.)

1. WILLS (§ 111*)—VALIDITY—EXECUTION.

Under Civ. Code, § 1276, providing that all wills other than an holographic will must be subscribed at the end by the testator himself, or by some person in his presence and by his direction, and section 1278, providing that the person who subscribes the testator's name must write his own name as a witness to the will, but that a failure will not affect the will's validity, the subscription of the tessons named as executors. Walter, Elsa, and Flora Dombrowski, the children and sole heirs of the decedent, filed a contest, opposing probate on the ground that the papers had not been executed as required by the statutes governing the execution of wills. Studer dismissed his petition, and a hearing was had on the contest to the petition of Lovett and Maple. The findings were in favor of the petitioners, and the court, on June 16, 1911, made its judgment and order, admitting the alleged will and codicil to probate, and granting letters testamentary as prayed. The contestants appeal from such judgment and order, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. There is also an appeal from an order made June 14, 1911, dismissing the contest; but the substantial questions involved are presented by the other appeals, and this one need not be separately considered.

The will was dated January 13, 1908, the codicil April 2, 1908. Upon these dates the decedent, Fannie Dombrowski, was a resident of Peoria, Ill., where all of the acts which, as respondents claim, constituted an execution of the papers as testamentary writings took place. Thereafter Mrs. Dombrowski moved to the county of Los Angeles, in this state. She was a resident of that county at the date of her death, March 31, 1911, and left considerable property in this state.

Except for a minor point, to be mentioned later, the due execution of the papers was and is the only question in controversy between the parties. It is conceded on all sides that this question must be decided by reference to the requirements of the laws of California. Civ. Code, §§ 1285, 1376.

The evidence shows that the manner of the attempted execution was substantially the same in the case of the will as of the codicil. It will suffice, therefore, to outline the facts surrounding the making of the will.

There were three subscribing witnesses, each of whom gave testimony by deposition. The document, which was in typewritten form, was declared by Mrs. Dombrowski to be her will, and she asked the three witnesses to sign as subscribing witnesses, which they did. Her own signature (if it was a signature) had been affixed, in the presence of the witnesses, as follows: She was, by reason of illness, unable at the time to write her name, and requested Mr. Maple, her legal adviser, and one of the persons named as executors, to write her name. This he did, adding the words "her mark," as follows:

"Fannie Dombrowski," mark

Mrs. Dombrowski made a cross (X) in the space left between her given name and her surname, and the three witnesses signed the attestation clause, and also signed their names under the words "Witnesses to mark," which had also been written by Mr. Maple.

Mr. Maple did not, however, write his own name on the paper as witness or otherwise. There was testimony that the decedent requested the subscribing witnesses to sign as witnesses to her mark, as well as to become attesting witnesses to the will.

[1-3] Section 1276 of the Civil Code provides, among other requisites to the execution of a written will, other than holographic, that "it must be subscribed at the end thereof by the testator himself, or some person in his presence and by his direction must subscribe his name thereto." Section 1278 provides that "a person who subscribes the testator's name, by his direction, must write his own name as a witness to the will. But a violation of this section does not affect the validity of the will." Since the testimony shows beyond all question that the name of the testatrix was subscribed by Mr. Maple in her presence and at her direction, it would seem that the requirements of the sections quoted had been fully met.

But the appellants argue that the decedent did not intend to perform the testamentary act by having her name written by another person; that what she in fact undertook to do was to sign her name by mark; that such signing was incomplete and ineffectual for want of compliance with the requirement of section 14 of the Civil Code; that, where a subscription is by mark, the name of the person so signing is to be written near the mark, by a person "who writes his own name as a witness." Here, as has been stated, the person (Maple), who wrote the name of Mrs. Dombrowski, did not write his own name as witness. While, accordingly, the writing of the testatrix's name by Maple would have been sufficient, if nothing more had been contemplated or done, yet, where such writing was merely a step in an ineffectual attempt to sign by mark, there was, it is claimed, no completed subscription by either method. The subscription by mark was defective for want of the signing as witness by the person writing the name. The execution was not sufficient under section 1276, because the decedent never intended that the writing of her name by Maple, without the making of her mark, should complete her act of formal execution.

The argument thus advanced rests upon rather refined and technical reasoning. The testatrix unquestionably intended to execute a will, and performed certain acts in order to carry out this intent. She did everything necessary, under the statute, to a valid execution. Is her act to be overthrown because, in addition, she tried to do something more? All that was done—the direction to Maple to write her name, his writing of it, the making of a mark—taken together, formed a single transaction, every part of which was influenced by the one intent of executing a will. To say that the decedent intended to sign by mark, rather than under section 1276, is to lose sight of the real nature of her acts. What she intended was to execute a will. No doubt she thought that all of the acts performed were necessary, or at least proper parts of a valid execution. But there is no good ground for saying that she intended that one of them, rather than another, should accomplish the desired end. Her intent was to carry out and authenticate her testamentary purpose by means of all these acts. The essential facts are that she did everything which she designed to do in executing her will, and that what she did included the formalities required by the statute for such execution. This being so, the validity of that which was rightly done is not affected by the circumstance that she may have entertained and acted upon the belief that something more was needed.

The cases cited by appellants are not in conflict with these views. The one which comes nearest to supporting their position is Main v. Ryder, 84 Pa. 217. There Daniel Miner, the maker of the alleged will, directed one Thorpe to write his name, which was done in the manner here employed; that is to say, by leaving a space between the words "Daniel" and "Miner," and writing the words "his" and "mark" over and under, respectively, such words. The court held that if the testator had "directed his name to be written with the view of adding his mark, and thus making his signature," and had not in fact added his mark, there would have been no sufficient execution of the will. This was put on the ground that what was done, in the case supposed, was not intended as a full execution of the will. The correctness of this holding may well be conceded without affecting the soundness of the finding in the case at bar that the will of Mrs. Dombrowski was duly executed. There the acts intended to operate as a subscription of the will were never completed. Here, however, all that was contemplated was done. The testatrix intended to complete a valid execution by means of acts all of which were in fact done. Robertson v. Hill, 127 Ga. 175, 56 S. E. 289, also cited by appellants, goes no further than Main v. Ryder.

No doubt a subscription or signing of any kind will not constitute a valid execution of a will unless made with the intention, on the part of the testator, of finally and completely authenticating the will. The principle is well applied in such cases as Everhart v. Everhart (C. C.) 34 Fed. 82, where the alleged testator attempted to sign a will, but succeeded only in making a small mark or scratch, which, apparently, he did not intend as a substitute for a complete signature, or Plate's Estate, 148 Pa. 55, 23 Atl. 1038, 33 Am. St. Rep. 805, where the decedent, undertaking to sign his name, stopped after making one stroke, saying, "I can't sign it now," or Waller v. Waller, 1 Grat. (Va.) 454, 42 Am. Dec. 564, where the name of the alleged testator was written by him in the body of the (holographic) will, but there was nothing written in a blank evidently left at the bottom for signature. But none of these cases, nor any other cited by appellants, lays down a rule that would justify the holding that the will here in question was not properly executed.

So far as authority in this state goes, the decisions, although made in cases not exactly like the one before us, are distinctly favorable to the position of the respondents. In Estate of Toomes, 54 Cal. 509, 35 Am. Rep. 83, the signature was similar to that here made; the testatrix making her mark. The person who wrote her name signed as a witness to the will, but not otherwise. This was held to be sufficient notwithstanding the objection that the party who wrote the name of the testatrix should have signed his name "as a part of the signature." Section 1278 of the Civil Code is quoted in support of the court's conclusion. In the case just cited, the party who wrote the name of the testatrix did witness the will, and to this extent the case differs in its facts from the one before us. The Toomes Case is, however, relied upon as authority in Estate of Langan, 74 Cal. 353, 16 Pac. 188, where the jury found that the name of the testatrix was signed to the will by another person in her presence and at her request, and also that the person who so signed her name did not write his own name near her signature as a witness to said signature. It was held that the latter finding was immaterial. The report of the case is brief, and does not fully disclose the facts. It appears, however, from the transcript, that the signature included a mark made by the testatrix.

We have assumed, in the foregoing discussion, that the undisputed evidence shows, as appellants contend, that the decedent contemplated making her mark when she directed the writing of her name, and that she did not intend that execution should be complete until all of the acts—the writing of her name by Maple, the making of a mark by herself, and the witnessing of her mark by the three who did witness it—should be accomplished. We have also assumed that the provision of section 14, requiring one who writes the name of a person signing by mark to write his own name, is applicable to the execution of wills. Both points are disputed by the respondents, but we think it unnecessary to express an opinion upon either. We prefer to rest our decision on the broad proposition that there is a valid execution where a person undertaking to make a will has done certain acts with the intention of thereby executing his will, leaving undone nothing which he undertook to do to carry out that intention, and the acts done include everything necessary, under our statutes, to the execution of a will.

[4] The appellants make the further point that the court was without jurisdiction to hear the petition for probate, because the petitioners had failed to make proof of mailing of notice of time appointed for probate to three persons named as coexecutors of the petitioners and not joining in the petition. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1304, 1306. But the record does not support the contention. The order admitting the will and codicil to probate recites that the petition "was duly set for the 31st day of May, 1911, and that notice of said hearing has been duly given as required by law. * * *" This recital of the giving of notice is sufficient to establish the truth of the fact recited, unless the record affirmatively shows that the recital is untrue. It does not so show.

[5] The appellants rely upon the fact that no proof of notice is contained in the bill of exceptions and that the bill states, at the outset, that "the foregoing proceedings, and none other, were had and taken." But it is apparent from the introduction and the specifications of insufficiency of evidence contained in the bill that it was designed merely to present for review the correctness of the findings of the court with respect to the issues raised by the petition for probate, the contest, and the answer thereto. The hearing was had on the merits, without any suggestion being made that the court had not acquired jurisdiction. Under these circumstances, it cannot fairly be said that the record affirmatively shows a want of proof of the notice required by the code. On the contrary, it indicates plainly that there was no question, in the court below, of the sufficiency of the steps required to give the court authority to proceed. As was said in Estate of Latour, 140 Cal. 414, 425, 73 Pac. 1070, 1074: "This court will not upon appeal review the conclusions of a trial court as to facts essential to its jurisdiction, concerning which such court was vested with the power to hear and determine, at the instance of a party who has appeared in that court in the action or proceeding, and has omitted there to in any way urge his objection, but has proceeded therein upon the theory that the court had jurisdiction."

The judgment and the orders appealed from are affirmed.

In Bank. Mandamus by the H. K. Mulford Company against C. F. Curry, Secretary of State. Mandate issued as prayed.

Hillyer, Stringham & O'Brien, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and R. C. Van Fleet, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an original petition addressed to this court for a writ of mandate, requiring the Secretary of State to receive and file a certain document tendered to him by petitioner, designating and appointing one F. L. Clark as agent of petitioner upon whom process affecting petitioner may be served. Respondent refused to accept and file the tendered document, basing his refusal upon the declination of petitioner to tender therewith for filing a certified copy of its articles of incorporation, and to pay the fee prescribed by section 409 of the Civil Code, which last-named section is as follows: "For filing and issuing a certified copy as required in section four hundred and eight of this Code, corporations formed under the laws of another state, or of a territory, or of a foreign country, must pay the same fees as are paid by corporations formed under the laws of this state."

The fees herein referred to are fixed by section 416 of the Political Code which declares: "The Secretary of State, for services performed in his office, must charge and collect the following fees: * * * 4. For filing articles of incorporation, if the capital stock amounts to twenty-five thousand dollars or less, fifteen dollars; if the capital stock amounts to over twenty-five thousand dollars, and not over seventy-five thousand dollars, twenty-five dollars; if the capital stock amounts to over seventy-five thousand dollars, and not over two hundred thousand dollars, fifty dollars; if the capital stock amounts to over two hundred thousand dollars, and not over five hundred thousand dollars, seventy-five dollars; if the capital stock is over five hundred thousand dollars, and not over one million dollars, one hundred dollars; if the capital stock is over one million dollars, fifty dollars additional for every five hundred thousand dollars or fraction thereof of capital stock over and above one million dollars," etc.

Having further relation to the matter is an act entitled "An act relating to revenue and taxation, providing for a license tax upon corporations, and making an appropriation for the purpose of carrying out the objects of this act." Section 2 of this act declares as follows: "It shall be the duty of every corporation, incorporated under the laws of this state, and of every foreign corporation now doing business, or which shall hereafter engage in business in this state, to procure annually from the Secretary of State a license authorizing the transaction of such business in this state, and shall pay therefor a license tax as follows: When the authorized capital stock of the corporation does not exceed ten thousand dollars ($10,000) the tax shall be ten dollars ($10); when the authorized capital stock exceeds ten thousand dollars ($10,000) but does not exceed twenty thousand dollars ($20,000) the tax shall be fifteen dollars ($15); when the authorized capital stock exceeds twenty thousand dollars ($20,000) but does not exceed fifty thousand dollars ($50,000) the tax shall be twenty dollars ($20); when the authorized capital stock exceeds fifty thousand dollars ($50,000) but does not exceed one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000) the tax shall be twenty-five dollars ($25); when the authorized capital stock exceeds one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000) but does not exceed two hundred and fifty thousand dollars ($250,000) the tax shall be fifty dollars ($50); when the authorized capital stock exceeds two hundred and fifty thousand dollars ($250,000) but does not exceed five hundred thousand dollars ($500,000) the tax shall be seventy-five dollars ($75); when the authorized capital stock exceeds five hundred thousand dollars ($500,000) but does not exceed two million dollars ($2,000,000) the tax shall be one hundred dollars ($100); when the authorized capital stock exceeds two million dollars ($2,000,000) but does not exceed five million dollars ($5,000,000) the tax shall be two hundred dollars ($200); when the authorized capital stock exceeds five million dollars ($5,000,000) the tax shall be two hundred and fifty dollars ($250). * * * The license tax or fee hereby provided authorizes the corporation to transact its business during the year or for any fractional part of such year in which such license tax or fee is paid." Stats. 1905, p. 493, as amended by St. 1909, p. 458, § 1.

The uncontroverted showing is that the petitioner is a foreign corporation, duly organized and existing under the laws of the state of Pennsylvania. It has an authorized and issued capital stock of $1,000,000, and was organized for and is engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling tablets, pills, triturates, fluid extracts, etc. It was so engaged within the state of California before the passage of the license law above quoted. Its principal place of business is in Philadelphia, Pa. It maintains branch houses in the principal cities of many other states, including the city of San Francisco, state of California. It maintains its plant and laboratory in Philadelphia, and sells its products in each and all of the various states and territories of the United States. It has maintained an agency in the state of California, for the purpose of receiving, and filling orders for articles of its own manufacture, at all times since the 1st day of December, 1908; and from its place of business at San Francisco, California, it ships goods upon orders received from the states of Oregon, Nevada, and Arizona. By section 405 of the Civil Code, every foreign corporation must, as this petitioner attempted to do, file in the office of the Secretary of State the "designation of some person residing within the state upon whom process issued by authority of or under any law of this state may be served." By section 406 of the same Code, no foreign corporation can "maintain or defend any action or proceeding in any court of this state until the corporation has complied with the provisions" of section 405 of the Civil Code.

By section 15 of article 12 of the Constitution of this state, it is declared that "no corporation organized outside the limits of this state shall be allowed to transact business within this state under more favorable conditions than are prescribed by law to similar corporations organized under the laws of this state." Petitioner's contention is that as to it, a foreign corporation, the exaction of these license taxes is the imposition of a direct burden upon its interstate commerce, in violation of the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, subd. 3.

ity of a sharply divided court. The decision of the case at bar was deliberately delayed to note whether any recession from the views expressed in these cases would follow from the change in the personnel of the court. No such recession, however, has followed, and, indeed, the Supreme Court of the United States as a body has acquiesced in and accepted these decisions, as is shown by Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé R. R. Co. v. Timothy O'Connor, 223 U. S. 280, 32 Sup. Ct. 216, 56 L. Ed. 436, decided February 9, 1912, where Justice Holmes, who wrote the dissenting opinions in the earlier cases, delivered the opinion of the undivided court, based upon and in affirmance of those earlier cases.

[2, 3] The principle of those decisions may be briefly stated. The admitted power of the state to regulate and prescribe terms under which a foreign corporation may engage in intrastate or domestic business is subject to this limitation that, where such foreign corporation is engaged in interstate, as well as intrastate, business, no such term, condition, or requirement will be constitutional, if it imposes any burden upon the interstate business of such corporation, whatever be its name or form. A license or privilege tax for the conduct of such intrastate business, based upon the total capital or the total capital stock of such corporation, without just relation to the proportion which the capital or the capital stock used in the state bears to the whole capital or capital stock, though in terms declared to be directed solely to the intrastate business of such corporation, is unconstitutional and void, (a) as being in violation of the commerce clause of the Constitution by the imposition of an illegal burden upon interstate commerce, and (b) because violative of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution and its equal protection and due process of law clause, as an effort to tax the property of citizens of the United States, which property is situated beyond the jurisdiction of the taxing state, and is not amenable to its revenue laws.

The minutest investigation and the most careful consideration fail to disclose any ground upon which the case here at bar may be distinguished from those cited. The legal parallelism between this case and that of Ludwig v. Western Union Telegraph Co., supra, is perfect. Both corporations were engaged in inter as well as intra state business. Both were so engaged before the passage of the excise law in question. The Arkansas law required every foreign corporation now or hereafter doing business in the state to file a copy of its articles of incorporation, etc., and to pay for the filing of such articles "a fee of $25 where the capital stock is $50,000 or under; $75 where the capital stock is over $50,000 and not more than $100,000; and $25 additional for each $100,000 of capital stock." Laws Ark. 1907, p.

746, § 3. A foreign corporation failing to comply with the provisions of the act was forbidden to do any business in the state, and was subjected to fine. The Supreme Court of the United States, first meeting the argument that the statute should be construed as applying only to the intrastate business of foreign corporations, declared, in effect, that when such a question was presented its ultimate determination would always rest with that court which would of and for itself determine the meaning of such statutes solely from what it should conclude would be their operation and effect. It construed the provision of the statute before it to mean that, upon a failure of a foreign corporation to comply with the provisions of the act, such a corporation should be forbidden to do any business within the state, interstate as well as intrastate. Then, laying this construction aside, it declared that, if the provisions of the act were held to apply solely to the intrastate business of such corporations, the provisions were unconstitutional and void for the reasons above given; the court saying: "The capital stock of the company represents, we repeat, all its business, property, and interests throughout the United States and foreign countries, and the requirement that the company, engaged in interstate business, may continue to do a local business in Arkansas, and escape the heavy penalties prescribed, must pay a given amount (in this case $25,050), based on all its capital stock, merely for filing its articles of incorporation with the Secretary of State, is, in effect, a direct burden and tax on its interstate business, as well as on its property outside of the state. The case cannot be distinguished in principle from Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Kansas, ante, 216 U. S. 1, 30 Sup. Ct. 190, 54 L. Ed. 355, and Pullman Company v. Kansas, ante, 216 U. S. 56, 30 Sup. Ct. 232, 54 L. Ed. 378, recently decided. The difference in the wording of the Kansas and Arkansas statutes cannot take the present case out of the ruling of the former cases. On the authority of the Kansas cases, and for the reasons stated in the opinions therein, we hold the statute in question to be unconstitutional and void, as illegally burdening interstate commerce and imposing a tax on property beyond the jurisdiction of the state."

The parallelism between this case and the case at bar is, we repeat, so perfect as to render futile any attempt to distinguish them, and thus to save the California laws. This court is alive to the difficulties which the Supreme Court of the United States has frequently adverted to, and which arise from the complexity of state laws that, with or without design, trespass upon the reserved rights of the United States in its control of foreign and interstate commerce. It has full appreciation of the significance of the language of Chief Justice Marshall, in Brown

v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. Ed. 678: "It may be doubted whether any of the evils proceeding from the feebleness of the federal government contributed more to that great resolution which introduced the present system than the deep and general conviction, that commerce ought to be regulated by Congress. It is not, therefore, matter of surprise that the grant should be as extensive as the mischief, and should comprehend all foreign commerce, and all commerce among the states. To construe the power so as to impair its efficacy would tend to defeat an object, in the attainment of which the American public took, and justly took, that strong interest which arose from a full conviction of its necessity." It is just and right that the Supreme Court of the United States should sit as an ever watchful Warden of the Marches to repel either unintentional trespass or deliberate invasion upon this most important domain. It is but natural, too, that in the multitude of forms in which the question arises, and in the multitude of cases through which it is presented, apparent inconsistencies of expression should be found, and minds should differ over the question whether any given state law does in effect exceed the powers of the state and invade the domain reserved exclusively to federal control. But over one question there can be no doubt that in all this multitude of cases there is an absolute unanimity in the principle declared, namely, that the state is without power to impose any burden or regulation on interstate commerce "in a relatively immediate way." Galveston, etc., Ry. Co. v. Texas, 210 U. S. 217, 28 Sup. Ct. 638, 52 L. Ed. 1031. So much we think it proper to say, in view of our further duty in pointing out for future legislative action the limitations upon the power of the state in dealing with foreign corporations.

[4-6] The limitations upon the power of the state to forbid a corporation from doing a domestic business within its borders, or to regulate the conduct of that business, may be thus summarized: A corporation, unless expressly forbidden so to do, may acquire rights of contract and property in a foreign jurisdiction. A state, however, may exclude absolutely a foreign corporation not engaged in interstate commerce, but which proposes solely to engage in domestic business, from doing such business within its limits, and so may, of course, impose terms and conditions upon which alone such business may be commenced within its limits, provided no unconstitutional condition is made a part of any actual agreement. S. P. Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202, 13 Sup. Ct. 44, 36 L. Ed. 942. When a foreign corporation has once engaged in domestic business within the state, the state may not exercise its powers of exclusion or regulation to the destruction of the property of the corporation or of its vested constitutional rights. And, finally, when such corporation is engaged both in interstate, as well as intrastate, business, no fee or regulation, though expressly directed to intrastate business, will be upheld, if, in the view of the Supreme Court of the United States, such exaction or requirement imposes a burden upon the interstate business of such corporation. Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 579, 10 L. Ed. 274; Horn Silver Mining Co. v. New York, 143 U. S. 305, 12 Sup. Ct. 403, 36 L. Ed. 164; Southern Pacific Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202, 13 Sup. Ct. 44, 36 L. Ed. 942; Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Texas, 177 U. S. 28, 20 Sup. Ct. 518, 44 L. Ed. 657; Security Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Prewitt, 202 U. S. 246, 26 Sup. Ct. 619, 50 L. Ed. 1013, 6 Ann. Cas. 317; National Council v. State Council, 203 U. S. 151, 27 Sup. Ct. 46, 51 L. Ed. 132; U. S. ex rel. Attorney General v. Delaware & Hudson Co., 213 U. S. 366, 29 Sup. Ct. 527, 53 L. Ed. 836; Home Ins. Co. v. New York, 134 U. S. 594, 10 Sup. Ct. 593, 33 L. Ed. 1025, and cases supra.

Under these principles of law, it is proper to point out that not only do these license taxes fall with respect to foreign corporations engaged in interstate, as well as intrastate, business in California, but of necessity fall as well with respect to domestic corporations engaged in such foreign business and having property without the state. Galveston, Harrisburg, etc., Ry. Co. v. Texas, 210 U. S. 217, 28 Sup. Ct. 638, 52 L. Ed. 1031. Since if a tax based on the total capital stock of a foreign corporation doing business within this state is a burden on interstate commerce, equally must it be so with a domestic corporation engaged elsewhere in interstate commerce and intrastate business and owning property without the state. The attention of the Legislature is thus directed to the fact that the law in question can apply only to domestic corporations nowhere engaged in interstate business, and to foreign corporations seeking to enter the state solely to do domestic business. For upon the right of a foreign corporation to enter the state to do an interstate business the state may impose no burden whatsoever. International Text-Book Co. v. Pigg, 217 U. S. 91, 30 Sup. Ct. 481, 54 L. Ed. 678, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 493, 18 Ann. Cas. 1103.

[7] The invalidity of these license laws, if sought to be applied to foreign corporations engaged in domestic business within the state, and so engaged (as was this petitioner) at the time the law went into effect, rests upon entirely different constitutional provisions. As has been pointed out, the Supreme Court of the United States declared the Kansas laws under review in Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Kansas and Pullman Co. v. Kansas, supra, to be unconstitutional upon two separate, distinct and wholly unrelated constitutional grounds. The first, because the law violated the "commerce clause" of the Constitution of the United States; and the second, because the law levied a tax, by requiring a fee to be paid, based upon the total capital stock of the foreign corporation, in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, its "due process of law" and its "equal protection of the law" clauses. It attempted to tax the property of a corporation without the state, and therefore beyond the jurisdiction of the taxing power of the state. It is, of course, well established that a tax law of a state can have no extraterritorial operation. State Tax on Foreign Held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300, 21 L. Ed. 179; Union Transit Co. v. Kentucky, 199 U. S. 194, 26 Sup. Ct. 36, 50 L. Ed. 150, 4 Ann. Cas. 493. It is, of course, equally apparent that, if a tax levied by a state upon all the capital stock of a foreign corporation is violative of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution and confiscatory in character, it is equally violative of such constitutional amendment, whether such foreign corporation be engaged in interstate business or purely in domestic business. For this determination is not at all dependent on, but is entirely independent of and unrelated to, the consideration whether or not such corporation is engaged in interstate commerce. It is not, in other words, because a foreign corporation is engaged in interstate commerce and has property without the state that a state tax based upon its total capital stock is unconstitutional. It is unconstitutional in the case of any corporation, solely because, in taxing property beyond the jurisdiction of the state, it is in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, an amendment which, as we have said, is in no way related to and is entirely independent of the commerce clause of the Constitution. In both the Western Union Telegraph Company Case and in the Pullman Case, the Kansas law was held to be unconstitutional upon both of these separate and distinct grounds. More attention was paid in the opinions to the consideration of the commerce clause than to a consideration of the fourteenth amendment, because, as pointed out by Mr. Justice White in his concurring opinion in the former of the two cases, "no one questions that the law which is here in dispute, imposed by the law of Kansas upon the corporation, is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States because wanting in due process, and that it is therefore confiscatory in character. The tax being thus conceded to be inherently vicious, there is, of course, no attempt to sustain its validity on its extrinsic merits." In the prevailing opinion in the same case, it is said: "We need not stop to discuss at length the specific question whether the state can by any regulation make the property of the company outside of Kansas contribute directly to the support of its schools; such being the effect of the requirement that it pay in to the state treasury, for the benefit of the state school fund, a given per cent. of all its capital stock as a condition of its doing local business in Kansas. It is firmly established that, consistently with the due process clause of the Constitution of the United States, a state cannot tax property located or existing permanently beyond its limits. Louisville, etc., v. Kentucky, 188 U. S. 385, 398 [23 Sup. Ct. 463, 47 L. Ed. 513]; Union Transit Co. v. Kentucky, 199 U. S. 209 [26 Sup. Ct. 36, 50 L. Ed. 150, 4 Ann. Cas. 493].” In the Pullman Case, the court sums up its reasons and conclusions under three heads. The first of these is that the tax is a burden upon interstate commerce. The second is that it is in violation of the fourteenth amendment; the court, in that connection, saying: “That the requirement that the company, as a condition of its right to do intrastate business in Kansas, should, in the form of a fee, pay to the state a specified per cent. of its authorized capital was a violation of the Constitution of the United States, in that such a single fee, based, as it was, on all the property, interests, and business of the company within and out of the state, was, in effect, a tax both on the interstate business of that company and on its property outside of Kansas, and compelled the company, in order that it might do local business in Kansas in connection with its interstate business, to waive its constitutional exemption from state taxation on its interstate business and on its property outside of the state and contribute from its capital to the support of the public schools of Kansas.” While in the Ludwig Case, the court states the “vital question” to be the constitutionality of the Arkansas statute, which, “under the guise of regulating intrastate business, imposes a tax upon the interstate business of such corporation, as well as a tax on its property used and permanently located outside the state.” And the court further said: “If a statute, by its necessary operation, really and substantially burdens the interstate business of a foreign corporation seeking to do business in a state or imposes a tax upon its property outside of such state, then it is unconstitutional and void, although the state Legislature may not have intended to enact an invalid statute.”

These constitutional questions thus decided are, as we have pointed out, in no way correlated, but are entirely separate and distinct. It is but the indulgence of futile and unwarranted speculation to say that the Supreme Court of the United States would call in the fourteenth amendment to the aid of a foreign corporation doing an interstate business to overthrow a state tax law, and would not invoke it in the case of a foreign corporation engaged in purely domestic business, notwithstanding that the tax upon the capital stocks of the foreign corporations (and thus the tax upon the property without the jurisdiction of the state) was, in both instances, identically the same. Nor can relief be found in a refusal to call such a license fee a tax. A state court may call it a fee or an exaction or a regulation; but the Supreme Court of the United States will call it a tax if, in its effect, it partake of the nature of a tax. As to the license fee exacted by our own statute, it has been declared to be a tax by the Supreme Court of the United States, which says the condition that the company should, “in the form of a fee, pay to the state a specified per cent. of its authorized capital was a violation of the Constitution of the United States, in that such a single fee, based, as it was, upon all the property, interests, and business of the company within and out of the state, was, in effect a tax * * * on its property outside of Kansas, and compelled the company, in order that it might do local business in Kansas, * * * to waive its constitutional exemption from state taxation * * * on its property outside of the state.”

[8] It follows from the foregoing that the requirement of section 408 of the Civil Code that petitioner file a certified copy of its articles, standing alone, is a reasonable requirement, an exaction not in restraint of interstate commerce, and therefore valid (Barron v. Burnside, 121 U. S. 186, 7 Sup. Ct. 931, 30 L. Ed. 915), but that the further requirement of the law that, as a condition of such filing, the petitioner pay the license tax prescribed is invalid.

Let the mandate issue as prayed for.

We concur: LORIGAN, J.; MELVIN, J.; SHAW, J.

ANGELLOTTI, J. (concurring). In view of the recent decisions of the United States Supreme Court referred to in the opinion, I concur in the judgment and in the opinion, except so far as it intimates that subdivision 4 of section 416 of the Political Code and our so-called Corporation License Tax Law are not valid as to all foreign corporations doing a purely domestic business in this state, and in no way engaged in interstate commerce in any other state. I can see no distinction in this regard between those foreign corporations engaged in a purely domestic business within this state at the time these laws went into effect, and those since coming into the state for the purpose of doing such business.

I am not at all satisfied that there is anything in any of the opinions of the United States Supreme Court referred to, when considered in the light of the exact questions presented for consideration therein, that compels the conclusion on this point that is declared in the opinion herein.

I concur: SLOSS, J.

UNION CONST. CO. v. WESTERN UNION
TELEGRAPH CO. (Sac. 1,732.)(Supreme Court of California. July 9, 1912.
Rehearing Denied Aug. 8, 1912.)1. EVIDENCE (§ 237*)—DECLARATIONS OF AN-OTHER—EXISTENCE OF AGENCY.

One is not bound by the declaration of another, not his agent, and expressly or impliedly authorized to make the declaration; and, unless a prima facie evidence of authority is shown, the declaration must be excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 604-613; Dec. Dig. § 237.*]

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 22*)—EXISTENCE OF RELATION—EVIDENCE.

Agency is not provable by the declarations of the agent, not made under oath or in the presence of the principal, unless communicated to and acquiesced in by the principal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 40; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 9*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE—FACTS OF COMMON KNOWLEDGE.

The courts will take notice of all inventions that have become of common and general use, and of the manner of communicating by telephone.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 69*)—PRESUMPTIONS—STAT-UTES.

Business carried on over the telephone is subject to the operation of the disputable presumptions declared by Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, providing that the ordinary course of business has been followed, and that things have happened according to the ordinary habits of life; and, where nothing unusual occurs, there is a disputable presumption that a request to the central telephone operator to connect the caller with a named number in the directory, and to call the latter by means of a signal, has been complied with by making the proper connection with the number and giving the necessary signal at the other end of the line.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 90; Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 258*)—TELEPHONIC COMMUNI-CATIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where plaintiff and defendant maintained business offices in the same city, and each had a telephone in the office connecting with the same telephone system, with their respective names in the telephone directory, and plaintiff called on the operator at the central station in the usual way for a connection with defendant's office, and a connection was made at the central office with some line, apparently in the usual manner, and some one responded at the other end of the line and answered that he was at the office of defendant, there was prima facie proof that the person answering was defendant's agent, so that a conversation between plaintiff and such person could be proved against defendant; but the weight of the evidence was for the jury.

6. EVIDENCE (§ 355*)—DOCUMENTARY EVI-DENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

A note of time of the reception of a message by a telegraph company for transmission, made by the company on a copy of the message delivered to the sendee, is evidence of the time of the reception of the message for transmission.

7. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 66*)—
DELAY IN DELIVERY OF MESSAGES—EVI-DENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Evidence held to support a finding that a telegraph company was guilty of gross negligence in delaying the delivery of a message.

8. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 67*)—
DELAY IN DELIVERY OF MESSAGES—EVI-DENCE.

Where plaintiff's agents would have exercised the option to accept a contract with a third person for construction work, if messages sent by telegraph company had been promptly delivered, and, on the failure to receive messages, the agents made an agreement with the third person for an extension of the option, subject to the right of the third person to change the contract price, and plaintiff was required to pay a substantial sum for the work in excess of the price fixed by the original contract, the damages sustained by plaintiff in consequence of the delay in the delivery of the messages were substantial.

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 927*)—QUESTIONS
REVIEWABLE—EVIDENCE.

The court on appeal, on reviewing a judgment of nonsuit, must give the evidence the construction most favorable to plaintiff.

10. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 54*)—
CONTRACT FOR TRANSMISSION OF MESSAGES —CONSTRUCTION.

A contract for the transmission of messages by a telegraph company, stipulating that, to guard "against mistakes or delays, the sender of a message should order it repeated," made by the company and printed on all its blanks provided for the use of the public, must, as required by Civ. Code, § 1654, be construed most strongly against the company; and it must be construed to provide only for delays and mistakes occurring in the forwarding of a message from the office where it is received to the office where it is written out and made ready for delivery to the addressee; and a delay in the delivery to the addressee is not excused by the failure of the sendee to order the message to be repeated.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by the Union Construction Company against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Chickering & Gregory and F. W. Street, for appellant. Beverly L. Hodghead, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment of nonsuit.

The action is to recover damages arising from the alleged negligence of the defendant in failing to deliver two telegrams sent to the plaintiff's agents in San Francisco.

The plaintiff was constructing a power plant on the Stanislaus river, in Tuolumne county. On October 10, 1906, it made an agreement with the Risdon Iron & Locomotive Works, of San Francisco, by which the plaintiff was given the option to close a contract with said Iron Works, within 90 days from said date, for the construction by said Iron Works of a part of the plant, consisting of an additional pressure line, known as the "Mine Line," at a cost of $143,000, to be paid by the plaintiff. The right to exercise this option expired at midnight of January 8, 1907. The determination whether or not plaintiff would accept said contract within that time was committed by plaintiff to its engineers, Sanderson & Porter, of New York. Plaintiff's headquarters for said construction work was at Vallecito, Tuolumne county, where H. F. Jackson, its manager, conducted the work. It also maintained an office in the Kohl building in San Francisco, in charge of H. P. Veeder. A day or two before January 8, 1907, Jackson went to San Francisco, expecting there to receive a telegram from Sanderson & Porter, accepting or rejecting the contract offered by the Iron Works, and for the purpose of at once closing the contract with the Iron Works, if it were accepted. In the afternoon of January 8th, he procured Mr. Field, the agent of the Iron Works, to come to the office of the plaintiff and remain in his company, so as to be ready to receive the acceptance for the Iron Works. In the evening, a little before 6 o'clock, no telegram having been received, Jackson and Field went out to dine together, leaving Veeder in the office. Plaintiff endeavored to prove at the trial that it was arranged between them that Veeder should remain in the office for the purpose of receiving the expected telegram, should it arrive, and bringing it to Jackson where he was dining with Field. The court refused to allow this evidence, and exception was taken to the ruling. If it appears that this evidence was material, the error would be injurious. In the consideration of the case, therefore, we must assume that such arrangement was made.

On that day Sanderson & Porter sent to plaintiff, at Vallecito, the following telegram regarding this option: "Wire Jackson that we will exercise option on mine line and header." The plaintiff's agent at Vallecito received this telegram, and thereupon wrote and delivered to the agent of the Western Union Telegraph Company at Vallecito, for transmission to Jackson at San Francisco, the following telegram:

"Vallecito, Cal., Jany. 8, 1907.

"H. F. Jackson, 909 Kohl Building, S. F. Cal.:

"Hobart Porter wires he will exercise option on mine line and header.

"[Signed] Union Construction Company."

This telegram was received by the telegraph company at its San Francisco office at 8:35 p. m. of that day. It was not delivered to Jackson, or to plaintiff, until after 9 a. m. the next day. Porter had left New York for California, and had arrived at Chicago, on January 8th. He there delivered to the defendant for transmission the following telegram:

"Chicago, Jan. 8, 1907.

"H. P. Veeder, Kohl Building, San Francisco:

"Advise Jackson that we wired him Vallecito to close option on mine line and header. [Signed] Hobart Porter."

This message was received at the San Francisco office of the defendant at 6:57 p. m. that day. It was not delivered until after 9 a. m. the next day. These are the two messages which, it is alleged, the defendant negligently failed to deliver on the day on which they were received at defendant's San Francisco office. The Vallecito message was given to the defendant, by telephone, at San Andreas, Cal., at 7:55 p. m. of January 8th. The Chicago message was given to defendant for transmission at Chicago at 7:50 p. m. Chicago time, being the same as 5:50 p. m. California time.

The complaint alleges that, after the defendant had received the dispatches at its San Francisco office, and during the evening of January 8th, the plaintiff inquired of the defendant's agent at that office to learn whether or not said telegrams had been received by defendant, and was informed by said agent that they had not been received. Jackson testified, for the plaintiff, that he went out to dine with Field that evening, and remained at the restaurant with him until nearly 10 o'clock. As stated, he was not allowed to testify that he directed Veeder to stay at the office and bring or send him any telegrams that were received while he was at the restaurant. The court also refused to permit him to testify that, during his absence at dinner, he had inquired of Veeder by telephone in regard to the telegrams. Veeder testified that he remained at the plaintiff's office after Jackson went out to dine; that Jackson left at 6 o'clock; that he was himself absent at dinner from 6:30 to 7:15; that he then stayed in the office until 10:15 that evening; that no telegrams were received or delivered there during that time; and that when he reached the office after dining he looked about to see if a notice of a telegram had been left during his absence. Finding none, he then took down the telephone and called the central telephone office to connect him with the line running to the Western Union Telegraph Company's office in the city. The connection was made, and some one responded, apparently at that office. He then inquired if that was the Western Union Telegraph office, and received through the receiver the answer, "Yes." He did not recognize the voice of the person answering, and had no means of knowing that he was connected with the defendant's office, except that he had made the call and received the response in the usual and customary manner of telephone communication. It was also shown, in effect, that the plaintiff had a telephone in its office as a part of the public telephone system then in operation in San Francisco; that the defendant's office had a like telephone connection; that the telephone company had printed and issued to its subscribers the usual directory, showing the name, address, and telephone number of each of its subscribers, among which were those of the plaintiff and defendant, respectively; and that the telephone company operated its system by means of operators at a central station to make connections between subscribers when called on to do so, and in the usual manner. The court refused to allow testimony of the conversation over the telephone between Veeder and the person answering for the defendant through the receiver. There is a sort of a suggestion in the defendant's brief that the court was not informed of the nature of the conversation sought to be produced. We do not understand, however, that it is claimed that it was not made to appear that it related to the receipt of a telegram by defendant for plaintiff at that time. In view of the allegation, above mentioned, on that subject, this must have been understood by court and counsel, and the ruling must have been made on the theory, that such a communication was not admissible to prove the allegation.

The Kohl building and the defendant's office were half a mile apart. A street car line was in operation from a point near the defendant's office to and beyond the Kohl building. The excuse offered by the defendant for failing to make delivery that evening was that it had no messengers at its office during the evening. The Kohl building was in the midst of the district destroyed by the great fire of April, 1906; and in January, 1907, there were few buildings near it that were occupied in the evenings after dark. The evidence offered, as will presently be more fully shown, would have a tendency to prove gross negligence of the defendant in relation to the delivery of the telegrams. For that purpose, it was material, and, in view of the fact that the court may be presumed to have granted the nonsuit because it believed no negligence was proven, it was very important to the plaintiff. Its exclusion is assigned as error.

[1, 2] The defendant claims that, under the circumstances we have stated, the telephone conversation was not admissible as evidence against it; that to render it admissible it should have been proven, by better evidence than was given, that the person answering the telephone call was an agent of defendant authorized to act for it in receiving and answering the communication. It is, of course, a well-settled and just principle of law that no person is bound by the declarations of another, who is not his agent, and expressly or by implication authorized by him to make the declarations. Unless at least prima facie evidence of such authority appears, such conversations are not admissible. If, in the present instance, there is no sufficient evidence of the identity of the person answering the call as the agent of the defendant at its office, the evidence was properly excluded. It may be added that the statement of that person that he was such agent was not, in and of itself, competent evidence of the agency. Agency is not provable by the mere declarations of the agent, not made under oath or in the presence of the principal, unless communicated to and acquiesced in by the principal. We are of the opinion, however, that there was sufficient circumstantial evidence to make a prima facie case of identity and authority.

[3] The courts take notice of discoveries and inventions that have become of common and general use. The telephone has been in common use for more than 30 years past. For many years its use, especially in such large cities as San Francisco, has been well-nigh universal, more so than the telegraph, and almost as much so as the mails. The system and method of communication by that means is universally known among business men. Practically every business house and office has one or more of such instruments, and uses it daily and frequently. Large establishments maintain a local system, with a special operator at their place of business, with ear to the receiver, to hear calls and answer them, or connect the local wire with the person called for, or some one authorized to act in the particular matter. The telephone companies keep a large force of operators in their central stations constantly engaged in connecting the wires of the different subscribers who wish to speak to each other. The process of making these connections is so rapid and frequent that it becomes almost mechanical. The telephone companies are engaged in public service of the same character as that of a telegraph company or a common carrier, and they are in like manner subject to regulation by law, as quasi public servants. The contrivance has been found so satisfactory in actual use that a large volume of the important business of the country is now transacted by means of it. It may, therefore, be assumed that, as compared with the whole number, the number of mistakes in connections that are not immediately discovered by both parties is very small. These considerations are matters of common knowledge, and they enter into the question of the identification of the defendant's agent.

[4] They show that the telephone and its use have become so much a part of daily life and experience that business carried on over it must be deemed to be subject to the operation of the disputable presumptions or inferences applicable to like affairs, as declared in section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We refer to the following subdivisions of that section: "That private transactions have been fair and regular." Subd. 19. "That the ordinary course of business has been followed." Subd. 20. "That things have happened according to the ordinary course of nature and the ordinary habits of life." Subd. 28. These presumptions have been recognized by the courts and applied to the cognate operations of the telegraph and the post office. If a letter or telegram is duly addressed, prepaid, and delivered in the post office receptacle, or to the telegraph company, there is a disputable presumption of fact, arising from the almost invariable result, that it has been transmitted and delivered in regular course to the person addressed. Eppinger v. Scott, 112 Cal. 371, 42 Pac. 301, 44 Pac. 723, 53 Am. St. Rep. 220; Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 24; 1 Greenl. on Ev. § 40; 1 Elliott on Ev. § 107; 1 Wigmore on Ev. § 95. For like reasons, if nothing unusual occurs in the process, there would be a disputable presumption that a request to the central telephone operator to connect the caller with a named number in the directory, and to call such subscriber by means of a bell or other signal, has been complied with by making the proper connection with the number and giving the necessary signal at the other end of the line.

[5] For these reasons, we conclude that when it appeared that plaintiff and defendant each maintained a business office in the same city, that each had a telephone in such office connecting with the same city telephone system, with their respective names and numbers in the regular telephone directory, that plaintiff called on the operator at the central station, in the usual way, for a connection with defendant's office, that a connection was thereupon made at the central station with some line, apparently in the usual manner, that some one responded at the other end of the line, and, being asked, answered that that end was the office of the Western Union Telegraph Company, there was sufficient prima facie proof that the person answering was the agent of the defendant at its said office, employed there by it to receive for it such communications as should come in that manner. All of these conditions were shown to exist upon the trial of this case, either by direct evidence, or by fair and reasonable inference, or as matters of judicial knowledge.

The question has never heretofore been considered by this court. It has frequently arisen in other states, and the decisions in the main support our conclusion. The following cases, in effect declare the rule to be as we have stated it: Wolfe v. Railway Co.

(1888) 97 Mo. 481, 11 S. W. 49, 3 L. R. A. 539, 10 Am. St. Rep. 331; Globe P. Co. v. Stahl (1886) 23 Mo. App. 451; Guest v. Hannibal, etc., Co. (1898) 77 Mo. App. 262; Kansas C. S. Co. v. Standard W. Co. (1907) 123 Mo. App. 13, 99 S. W. 765; Star B. Co. v. Cleveland F. Co. (1907) 128 Mo. App. 517, 109 S. W. 802; Rock I., etc., Co. v. Potter (1889) 36 Ill. App. 592; Rogers Grain Co. v. Tanton (1907) 136 Ill. App. 533; Godair v. Hamilton, N. B. (1907) 225 Ill. 572, 80 N. E. 407, 116 Am. St. Rep. 172, 8 Ann. Cas. 447; General H. Soc. v. New Haven Co. (1907) 79 Conn. 581, 65 Atl. 1065, 118 Am. St. Rep. 173, 9 Ann. Cas. 168; Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Gardiner Co. (1908) 107 Md. 571, 69 Atl. 405, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 746; Miller v. Leib (1909) 109 Md. 425, 72 Atl. 466; Conkling v. Standard O. Co. (1908) 138 Iowa, 596, 116 N. W. 822; Western U. T. Co. v. Rowell (1907) 153 Ala. 314, 45 South. 73; Barrett v. Magner (1908) 105 Minn. 120, 117 N. W. 245; Holzhauser v. Sheeny (1907) 127 Ky. 35, 104 S. W. 1034; Gilliland v. Southern R. Co. (1910) 85 S. C. 36, 67 S. E. 20, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1106, 137 Am. St. Rep. 861.

There are a few decisions to the contrary. Young v. Seattle T. Co. (1903) 33 Wash. 225, 74 Pac. 375, 63 L. R. A. 988, 99 Am. St. Rep. 942, Planters', etc., Co. v. Western U. T. Co. (1906) 126 Ga. 621, 55 S. E. 495, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1180, Murphy v. Jack, 142 N. Y. 215, 36 N. E. 882, 40 Am. St. Rep. 590, and Oberman B. Co. v. Adams, 35 Ill. App. 540, take the opposite view. Oberman v. Adams, so far as applicable here, is overruled by the later case in the Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court of Illinois, above cited. In Murphy v. Jack, the point received slight attention. The other two cases, as is pointed out in 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1180, in a note to the Georgia case, are contrary to the weight of authority. The respondent cites the following cases, claiming that they also are contrary to the rule we have announced: People v. McKane, 143 N. Y. 474, 38 N. E. 950; Stepp v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 349, 20 S. W. 753; People v. Strollo, 191 N. Y. 42, 83 N. E. 573; Deering Co. v. Shumpik, 67 Minn. 348, 69 N. W. 1088; Harrison G. Co. v. Penn. R. Co., 145 Mich. 712, 108 N. W. 1081; Lord Electric Co. v. Morrill, 178 Mass. 304, 59 N. E. 807. In each of these cases there was either a recognition of the voice of the other party, or other sufficient evidence of his identity; and the remarks indicating a contrary doctrine than here stated are obiter dictum. The Minnesota case, so far as it is contrary to the main current of authority, is, in effect, overruled by the later decision in Barrett v. Magner, supra.

In the application of the rule, many of the conditions we have mentioned are usually deemed matters of judicial knowledge, or as implied from other facts, and are not expressly shown. The general rule, as gathered from the foregoing decisions, is that, where it is shown that the witness called up the other party at his place of business through the central station with which both were connected, and received a response as in the usual course of business over the telephone, this is sufficient prima facie identification of the speaker at the other end of the line as the party called, or his authorized agent; and that, upon such proof, the ensuing conversation, if otherwise admissible, may be testified to by the witness. It is proper to add that the weight of such evidence depends largely upon the circumstances of each case, and is always a question for the trial court or jury. The court below erred in excluding the evidence of Veeder and Jackson relating to this subject.

Each of the messages in question were written upon a blank provided by the defendant, containing a contract purporting to exempt it from liability for damages in excess of the charges for transmission. It is claimed that this relieves the defendant from the damages here claimed. The contract is as follows: "To guard against mistakes or delays, the sender of a message should order it repeated; that is, telegraphed back to the originating office for comparison. For this, one-half the regular rate is charged in addition. It is agreed between the sender of the following message and this company, that said company shall not be liable for mistakes or delays in transmission or delivery, or for nondelivery of any unrepeated message, beyond the amount received for sending the same; nor for any mistakes or delays in the delivery of any repeated message, beyond fifty times the sum received for sending the same, unless specially insured, nor in any case for delays arising from unavoidable interruption in the working of its lines, or for errors in cipher or obscure messages. * * * Correctness in the transmission of a message to any point on the lines of this company can be insured by contract in writing, stating agreed amount of risk, and payment of premium thereon, at the following rates, in addition to the usual charges for repeated messages, viz., one per cent., for any distance not exceeding 1,000 miles, and two per cent. for any greater distance."

This contract is identical with those considered by this court in Hart v. Western U. T. Co., 66 Cal. 581, 6 Pac. 637, 56 Am. Rep. 119, Redington v. Pacific P. T. C. Co., 107 Cal. 321, 40 Pac. 432, 48 Am. St. Rep. 132, and Coit v. Western U. T. Co., 130 Cal. 661, 63 Pac. 84, 53 L. R. A. 678, 80 Am. St. Rep. 153, except that the words "whether happening by negligence of its servants or otherwise," occurred in those messages in the second paragraph immediately after the words "unrepeated message," and before the word "beyond." It was decided in those cases that the taking of such contract was a reasonable precaution by the company; that it was lawful and binding upon all senders of messages who assented to it; and that it exempted the telegraph company from liability, except as stated, for any cause except willful misconduct or gross negligence.

It is admitted that the usual tolls for such messages were in each instance paid to the defendant, and that each was an unrepeated message. Upon the trial, however, the plaintiff expressly waived any claim for the amount of the tolls paid as damages. For this reason, if no further damage appeared, the court below was justified in granting the nonsuit.

[6, 7] The message from Porter at Chicago to Veeder at the Kohl building in San Francisco was received at the main office of the defendant in the Ferry building in San Francisco at 6:57 p. m. of January 8th. The defendant claims that this was not proven. The evidence shows, however, that a note of that time was made by the defendant upon the copy of the message delivered by it to Veeder; and, from what was said at the trial, concerning this fact, by the court and counsel, it is a fair inference that these figures were intended by the defendant as a note of the hour and minute of the arrival of the message at its office in the Ferry building. It therefore constitutes evidence of that effect. Street cars were then running frequently from a point near the Ferry building, along California street, and directly in front of the Kohl building, to which the message was directed. According to the evidence offered and improperly excluded, we must assume that the plaintiff would have been able to prove thereby that, within half an hour after defendant had received this message, and while the copy for delivery was lying among the messages in its possession at the Ferry building office, and then awaiting delivery, Veeder inquired of defendant's agent at said office to learn if such message had been received by the defendant, and that he was informed by defendant's agent that none such had been received. After receiving this information that the telegram was important, and that Veeder could be communicated with by telephone, the defendant failed to deliver either this telegram, or the one received later from Jackson, apparently on the same subject, on that evening, and, so far as appears, made no effort to do so, or to inform Veeder thereof. If these facts had been proven, they would have tended to prove gross neglect on the part of the defendant in failing to deliver the Veeder message on that day, or to inform Veeder of its arrival. Such evidence would support a finding of gross negligence. It is fully as strong as that held sufficient in Redington v. Pacific P. T. C. Co., supra. It follows, therefore, that, under any tenable theory of the effect of the contract, the plaintiff was deprived of the opportunity of proving such gross negligence.

[8, 9] The respondent contends that the evidence does not show that the plaintiff has sustained any damage, except to the amount of the charges, which, as above stated, the plaintiff waived. Taking the evidence as a whole, it is plain that, if either message had been received by the plaintiff's agents during the evening of January 8th, the option would have been exercised by them on behalf of the plaintiff. In that event the Iron Works would have been bound to furnish the pipe and construct the mine line for \$143,000. After waiting until late that evening for the expected telegram, Jackson and Field agreed that the option should be extended for an additional period of 15 days, but that the Iron Works should be entitled to change the price mentioned in said contract. Within the 15 days thus allowed, the plaintiff and the Risdon Iron Works agreed to and executed a modification of the contract. The evidence shows that this was the best contract the plaintiff could obtain for the mine line. By its provisions the price for the mine line, instead of being fixed at \$143,000, was to be at the rate of 8 cents per pound for the weight of metal furnished for the mine line. Jackson testified that this change added to the price of the mine line the sum of \$21,252 in excess of the sum of \$143,000 fixed by the first contract. He further testified that the price of steel had raised in the interval between the making of the first contract and the 8th day of January about one-quarter to one-half a cent. There was a provision in the first contract that, if the price of steel rose before the option was exercised, the price fixed should be increased accordingly. Jackson stated that he was not sure that the increase was no more than half a cent per pound. From this respondent argues that the actual advance may have been enough to cover the difference in price between the two contracts, and hence that no loss was shown. It is apparent, however, from all of the evidence that Jackson did not intend to suggest that so great an advance was made as would be necessary to cover this difference. It would have required a raise of $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound to have had that effect. His remark was evidently intended as a mere suggestion that there was some raise in the price of steel, which would have increased somewhat the stated price in the original contract. Such is the fair inference from the whole testimony, and, upon a motion for nonsuit, all reasonable inferences must be resolved in favor of the plaintiff. We add that in stating the effect of the evidence we have kept in mind the rule in motions for nonsuit, and have accordingly given it the construction most favorable to the plaintiff. We think a substantial loss and damage from the failure to exercise the option on January 8th was sufficiently shown.

The California decisions, above cited, are all cases of mistakes made in the words of the message in transmitting it through the wires, or in receiving it at the office of its destination. The negligence complained of in the present case is a delay in the delivery of the message after it had been correctly transmitted. The plaintiff contends that there is an obvious distinction between errors or delays in transmission and a delay in the delivery of a message after its arrival. It is argued that, since the repeating of a message would have no tendency to prevent a delay in delivery, but merely secures accuracy in transmission, it has no logical relation to any other object; that, as the provision for insurance applies only to accuracy of transmission, and the contract as a whole affords the sender no means of protection against a delay in the subsequent delivery, the question of the reasonableness of such a contract, and its accordance with public policy, is not settled by said decisions. Able and exhaustive arguments are presented on each side of this question.

The question whether the restriction of liability for errors in transmission is void, because contrary to public policy, has produced an unusual conflict in the authorities. In a comparatively few jurisdictions outside of California, the contract is declared to be valid, unless there is gross negligence or willful misconduct. These are as follows: Maryland, in U. S. Telegraph Co. v. Gildersleeve, 29 Md. 232, 96 Am. Dec. 519; Massachusetts, in Wheelock v. Postal, etc., Co., 197 Mass. 125, 83 N. E. 313, 14 Ann. Cas. 188; Michigan, in Birkett v. W. U. T. Co., 103 Mich. 361, 61 N. W. 645, 33 L. R. A. 404, 50 Am. St. Rep. 374; New York, in Halsted v. Postal, etc., Co., 193 N. Y. 303, 85 N. E. 1078, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1021, 127 Am. St. Rep. 952; Rhode Island, in Stone v. Postal, etc., Co., 31 R. I. 180, 76 Atl. 762; Texas, in Womack v. W. U. T. Co., 58 Tex. 176, 44 Am. Rep. 614; the United States Supreme Court, in Primrose v. W. U. T. Co., 154 U. S. 1, 14 Sup. Ct. 1098, 38 L. Ed. 883; and in England, McAndrew v. Telegraph Co., 17 Com. B. 3, 25 L. J. C. B. 26. In South Dakota and Kansas, there are decisions which concede its validity for the purposes of the case, but affirm the judgment against the company, on the ground that gross negligence was proved. Lothian v. W. U. T. Co., 25 S. D. 319, 126 N. W. 621; W. U. T. Co. v. Crall, 38 Kan. 683, 17 Pac. 309, 5 Am. St. Rep. 795. Pennsylvania decisions seem to conflict with each other. Passmore v. W. U. T. Co., 78 Pa. 238, treats the case as an action in tort, and seems to hold such contract valid as a rule of business, the violation of which by the sender will exonerate the company, as in a case of contributory negligence. In the later case of Bailey v. W. U. T. Co., 227 Pa. 529, 76 Atl. 739, 19 Ann. Cas. 895, the court states the rule to be settled that a telegraph company "cannot stipulate for exemption from liability caused by its own negligence."

For the opposite side, the following states declare such contracts to be against public policy and void as a protection to the company against its own ordinary negligence. We cite but one case from each state: Alabama, in American, etc., Co. v. Daugherty, 89 Ala. 196, 7 South. 660; Arkansas, in W. U. T. Co. v. Short, 53 Ark. 440, 14 S. W. 649, 9 L. R. A. 744; Florida, in W. U. T. Co. v. Milton, 53 Fla. 496, 43 South. 495, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 560, 125 Am. St. Rep. 1077; Georgia, in W. U. T. Co. v. Blanchard, 68 Ga. 299, 45 Am. Rep. 480; Illinois, in W. U. T. Co. v. Tyler, 74 Ill. 168, 24 Am. Rep. 279; Indiana, in W. U. T. Co. v. Meredith, 95 Ind. 94; Idaho, in Strong v. W. U. T. Co., 18 Idaho, 389, 109 Pac. 910, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 409, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 55; Iowa, in Harkness v. W. U. T. Co., 73 Iowa, 193, 34 N. W. 811, 5 Am. St. Rep. 672; Kentucky, in W. U. T. Co. v. Eubanks, 100 Ky. 601, 38 S. W. 1068, 36 L. R. A. 711, 66 Am. St. Rep. 361; Maine, in Ayer v. W. U. T. Co., 79 Me. 497, 10 Atl. 495, 1 Am. St. Rep. 353; Mississippi, in Postal, etc., Co. v. Wells, 82 Miss. 740, 35 South. 190; Missouri, in Reed v. W. U. T. Co., 135 Mo. 668, 37 S. W. 904, 34 L. R. A. 492, 58 Am. St. Rep. 609; New Mexico, in W. U. T. Co. v. Longwill, 5 N. M. 308, 21 Pac. 339; North Carolina, in Williamson v. Postal, etc., Co., 151 N. C. 228, 65 S. E. 974, overruling Lassiter v. Telegraph Co., 89 N. C. 334, on this point; Ohio, in Telegraph Co. v. Griswold, 37 Ohio St. 313, 41 Am. Rep. 500; Oklahoma, in Blackwell v. W. U. T. Co., 17 Okl. 381, 89 Pac. 235, 10 Ann. Cas. 855; Tennessee, in Pepper v. Telegraph Co., 87 Tenn. 559, 11 S. W. 783, 4 L. R. A. 660, 10 Am. St. Rep. 699; Utah, in Wertz v. W. U. T. Co., 7 Utah, 449, 27 Pac. 172, 13 L. R. A. 510; Vermont, in Gillis v. W. U. T. Co., 61 Vt. 466, 17 Atl. 736, 4 L. R. A. 611, 15 Am. St. Rep. 917; Wisconsin, in Fox v. Postal, etc., Co., 138 Wis. 648, 120 N. W. 399, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 490.

In this connection it may be observed that it is somewhat difficult to reconcile the California decisions with our Civil Code. Section 2162 provides that "a carrier of messages for reward must use great care and diligence in the transmission and delivery of messages." Section 1667 declares that a contract which is contrary to an express provision of law, or to the policy of express law, is unlawful. Section 1668 declares that "all contracts which have for their object, directly or indirectly, to exempt any one from responsibility for his own * * * violation of law, whether willful or negligent, are against the policy of the law." It is essential to the legal existence of a contract—that is, to its recognition by the law as a contract—that it shall have a lawful object. Section 1550. Where the object of a contract is unlawful, the contract is void. Section 1598. It seems clear that if the law requires the telegraph company to use great care and diligence in the transmission and delivery of messages, and the object of this contract, directly or indirectly, is to relieve it from responsibility for the damages caused by its failure to use great care and diligence in so doing, or, in other words, by its negligent violation of section 2162, then, by the express provision of section 1668, the contract is against the policy of the law. If that be the case, section 1667 makes it unlawful, and section 1598 declares that it is void. A person guilty of ordinary negligence has certainly failed to use great care and diligence. It appears logically to follow that a decision that such a contract will exempt the company from everything, except gross negligence or willful misconduct, is directly in the teeth of these statutory provisions. There is much force in the statement which Justice Ross, the author of the opinion in Hart v. W. U. T. Co., supra, afterwards made, as Judge of the United States Circuit Court, in W. U. T. Co. v. Cook, 61 Fed. 629, 9 C. C. A. 684, declaring a contrary doctrine, as follows: "It would be against reason and public policy to hold that it is permissible for such a company to stipulate for immunity from liability for a failure to exercise the care and diligence that the statute under which it operates declares it shall exercise."

[10] Under these circumstances, we may consider whether or not the contract in question should be construed to apply to delays in delivery of a message which has been correctly transmitted. These contracts are prepared by the telegraph company and printed upon all of its blanks provided for the use of the public. They are not often the result of negotiation between the parties. The sender has no choice, nor any reasonable opportunity to make terms not specified in the printed contract. Although he does not sign it, he is presumed to have seen it; and from his failure to object he is taken to have assented to it. Hence, if it is uncertain in any particular, its language on that point is to be interpreted most strongly against the company. Civ. Code, § 1654. The subject to which it was intended to relate and the delays and mistakes against which it was intended to provide are shown by the opening words, to wit: "To guard against mistakes or delays, the sender of a message should order it repeated." Where a guard is offered against mistakes and delays, which are not more particularly described, a reasonable construction of the language is that the mistakes and delays intended are those which the proposed guard would prevent; in this case, mistakes and delays which a repetition of the message would disclose, so that they could be immediately corrected or avoided. That this was the object and meaning of the contract is further shown by the final proposal to insure "correctness in the transmission of a message to any point on the lines of this company." This language does not suggest, as some of the decisions holding the contract valid intimate, promptness in delivery after arrival. It plainly confines the insurance to the subject of correctness or accuracy in transmitting it to the company's delivering office on its lines, and does not refer to delays in subsequent delivery. The company has power only to make reasonable regulations. If the condition sought to be imposed requires an act to be done to protect the sender against a certain mischance, and such act would have no tendency to do so, the regulation could not be deemed reasonable. The contract should, therefore, not receive this construction, unless no other meaning can reasonably be deduced. For these reasons it should be interpreted to provide only for delays and mistakes occurring in the forwarding of a message from the company's desk, where it is received from the sender, to the company's office, where it is written out and made ready for delivery to the addressee.

There are some cases in the states, which hold the contract valid as to errors in transmission, which extend the rule to delays in subsequent delivery. But the better reason and the greater number of cases uphold the views we have stated. In Texas the contract is held valid as to mistakes in transmission, but invalid with respect to delays in delivery. Gulf, etc., Co. v. Wilson, 69 Tex. 741, 7 S. W. 653; W. U. T. Co. v. Bennett (Tex. Civ. App.) 124 S. W. 154. In Barnes v. W. U. T. Co., 24 Nev. 140, 50 Pac. 438, 77 Am. St. Rep. 791, and W. U. T. Co. v. Graham, 1 Colo. 234, 9 Am. Rep. 136, it is conceded that it is valid against errors in transmission, but held to be void as to delays in delivery. In all of these cases the distinction we have pointed out is held to be good. In Box v. Postal T. Co., 165 Fed. 138, 91 C. C. A. 172, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 566, the court says: "Although the regulation purports to be made to guard against mistakes or delays, it should be construed to refer to such mistakes or delays as could be corrected or avoided by repetition or comparison." In Beatty v. W. U. T. Co., 52 W. Va. 412, 44 S. E. 310, the court declares that "this condition has no relevancy, except as to such failure or error as might be cured by repetition; it is only to errors preventable by repetition that such a condition logically applies." The company in that case was held liable for a negligent failure to deliver, notwithstanding the contract in question.

TAYLOR v. DARLING. (Civ. 1,117.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 4, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 113*)—APPEALABLE ORDER—REFUSAL TO VACATE JUDGMENT.

An order denying the motion under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 663, 663a, to vacate and set aside, as not supported by the facts found, the judgment rendered and entered, is within section 963, declaring appealable any special order after judgment.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 239*)—ACTION AGAINST WIFE—JOINDER OF HUSBAND.

The fact that one sued alone for conversion was a married woman not living separate and apart from her husband, requiring, under provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 370, that her husband be joined as a defendant, being pleaded by the answer and found by the court, defeats right to recover against her in such action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 856; Dec. Dig. § 239.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Catherine M. Taylor, administratrix of Catherine Kenny, deceased, against Agnes Darling. From an order denying her motion, defendant appeals. Reversed, and motion ordered granted.

George A. Connolly, for appellant. Neal Power, for respondent.

HALL, J. [1] This is an appeal from an order made after final judgment, denying defendant's motion made under sections 663 and 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure to vacate and set aside the judgment rendered and entered against defendant as not supported by the facts found.

1. The contention of respondent that such order is not appealable is fully answered by the cases of Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 270, 113 Pac. 366, Condon v. Donohue, 160 Cal. 749, 118 Pac. 113, and Rahmel v. Lehndorff, 142 Cal. 681, 76 Pac. 659, 65 L. R. A. 88, 100 Am. St. Rep. 154. The order denying such a motion is one made after final judgment, and is appealable under the provisions of section 963, Code of Civil Procedure.

[2] 2. Defendant was sued alone for the alleged conversion of $1,000. She answered and pleaded in abatement that she "is a married woman, not living separate and apart, or separate or apart, from her husband, and that her husband has not been made a party to this action," and the court found this allegation of her answer to be true, but nevertheless rendered judgment against her as prayed for. A married woman not living separate and apart from her husband cannot be sued without joining her husband as a party defendant, except where her husband is the plaintiff. Section 370, Code Civ. Proc.; McDonald v. Porsh, 136 Cal. 301, 68 Pac. 817. The defect of parties defendant in this case did not appear upon the face of the complaint but defendant pleaded the facts in her answer, and the court found in accordance therewith. Such finding necessarily defeated plaintiff's right to recover against defendant in this action. Bogart v. Woodruff, 96 Cal. 609, 31 Pac. 618; McDonald v. Porsh, 136 Cal. 301, 68 Pac. 817; section 370, Code Civ. Proc.

The court therefore erred in denying defendant's motion and the order is reversed, and the court directed to grant said motion.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

E. C. Miles was convicted of larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

William Maxwell and N. C. Coghlan, for appellant. Attorney General U. S. Webb, for the People.

HALL, J. Appellant was jointly indicted with Mr. and Mrs. Arnold and one Emma Smith for the larceny of $1,000 of the property of Olive Griesse and Henry Griesse. Appellant was tried separately and by the jury found guilty as charged, and from the judgment rendered upon such conviction appealed to this court.

In the methods resorted to by appellant and his codefendants to obtain the money from the prosecuting witnesses this case bears a close resemblance to the case of People v. Tessie Arnold, 17 Cal. App. 68, 118 Pac. 729, in which all of the same parties were indicted for stealing $150 from one Francis Shaw, and in which case the conviction of Tessie Arnold was by this court sustained. It is urged by the appellant that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence.

[1] The evidence shows that at all the times referred to by the witnesses Tessie Arnold was residing at 1237 O'Farrell street in the city and county of San Francisco, and at her apartments there conducted from time to time what she was pleased to call "seances," at which, as she represented to her patrons, voices from the spirit world audibly spoke to her and to those participating in the seances. The prosecuting witnesses first visited Mrs. Arnold's apartments in the latter part of December, 1909, or in the early part of January, 1910, and became interested in the "seances." They kept up their visits at frequent intervals for about four months. They were early induced by Mrs. Arnold to have a "seance." At the invitation of Mrs. Arnold they entered a small apartment or cabinet, in the center of which was a small table, upon which was placed a music box and a trumpet. The room was hung with curtains, apparently against the walls, and was illuminated by artificial light. During the "seances" this was turned down so as to give but a very dim light, and the music box was set running so as to give forth strains of music. Mrs. Arnold and the prosecuting witnesses being seated at the table, voices were heard, apparently coming from the trumpet, and which Mrs. Arnold represented to be from the spirit world. One of these called himself Dr. Winthrop, and claimed to be the guide and "control" of Mrs. Arnold, while the other called himself Abde-water, and claimed to be the guide and "control" of Mrs. Griesse. We have no doubt but that the jury from the subsequent developments correctly believed that these voices came from the throats of Mr. Arnold and appellant Miles, and that they were confederates of Mrs. Arnold in a scheme to mulct Mr. and Mrs. Griesse of their little savings.

The confederates, as we shall hereafter term them, soon learned that Mr. and Mrs. Griesse were the owners of a lodging house. Thereafter at each "seance" the voices advised and urged Mr. and Mrs. Griesse to sell their lodging house, to the end that the money could be invested under the directions of "Dr. Winthrop" and "Abdewater." By means of urging, cajoling, and bullying repeated at frequent "seances," the confederates finally induced the Griesses to dispose of their lodging house, for which they received the sum of $1,400, and which they promptly on the 18th day of April, 1910, deposited in the Anglo, London & Paris National Bank in such a manner that it could be withdrawn upon the order of either Mr. or Mrs. Griesse. Shortly afterwards Mr. and Mrs. Griesse, at the invitation, over the telephone, of Mrs. Arnold, visited her, and were given a "seance," at which the voices urged and advised the Griesses to invest their money in a wonderful invention originated by an "honest man" whom they had been "developing" as an inventor. At the conclusion of the "seance" the Griesses were conducted by Mrs. Arnold to another room, where they were introduced to appellant as the inventor and to Mr. Arnold. The merits of his "fountain tooth brush" and the wonderful business prospects of the "American Fountain Tooth Brush Company," to be organized to market and exploit this invention, not yet completed nor patented, were explained to Mr. and Mrs. Griesse by appellant, and the "confederates" earnestly and persistently urged the Griesses to invest in the stock of the company, but without immediate success. The Griesses went home without coming to a decision.

On April 21, 1910, Mrs. Griesse visited Mrs. Arnold, and was again treated to a "seance," at which she was urged and advised by the voices of "Dr. Winthrop" and "Abdewater" speaking through the trumpet to invest in the stock of the company. At the "seances" some sort of incense was burned, but at this one more than usual, and she was urged by Mrs. Arnold to inhale of it, so as to more fully come under the "control." This she did to such an extent as to become dizzy. At the conclusion of the "seance" she was conducted to another room, where she again met Mr. Arnold and appellant, and, after more talk and persistent urging in which she was told among other things that she could at any time get back $250 of her money and in a short time all of it, she signed and delivered to appellant a check on the bank for $1,000, payable to him, and which he promptly cashed. Appellant upon the receipt of the check gave her an instrument, signed by him, as follows: "San Francisco, California, 6/21/1910. Received of Olive M. Griesse, on account of purchase price of ten thousand shares of the capital stock of the American Fountain Tooth Brush Company (now being organized), owner of patent rights for U. S. Patent application No. 546289, now pending. Stock to be issued and delivered as soon as printed and to be fully paid and nonassessable.—A. C. Miles, Agent." This transaction occurred and the check was dated April 21, 1910.

It is urged that the evidence does not support the verdict, in that, as it is claimed, no criminal connection of appellant is shown with the scheme to fleece Mr. and Mrs. Griesse, and because, as it is claimed, the evidence shows that the crime committed was not that of larceny, because, as it is claimed, the evidence shows that Mrs. Griesse intended to part with the title to her money when she gave the check.

As to the first contention there can be no doubt, from the evidence as we have detailed it, as well as from other matters in evidence not adverted to, that appellant was a fellow conspirator and an active participant in the entire scheme.

[2] The other point, to wit, that the evidence shows that Mrs. Griesse intended to and did part with title to the money when she made the transfer of possession, and that, therefore, the case is one of obtaining money by false and fraudulent pretenses, and not a case of larceny, is more plausible. The court very correctly and clearly explained to the jury what constituted larceny by trick and device, and the difference between such a larceny and the crime of obtaining money by false and fraudulent pretenses in accordance with the rule as laid down in People v. Delbos, 146 Cal. 734, 81 Pac. 131, and the cases there cited. It must be conceded, we think, that the jury would have been justified in finding that Mrs. Griesse did intend to and did in fact part with title to her money in the transaction with appellant. It may well be that such would have been the more logical conclusion to draw from the facts disclosed by the evidence.

But from this it does not follow that a contrary conclusion may not be supported by the evidence. Mrs. Griesse had been told that she could at any time have the return of $250 of her money, and could shortly get it all back if she wished. The transaction occurred and the check was dated April 21, 1910. At this time the corporation had not been formed, nor indeed had any steps been taken to form the corporation. No stock was yet issued or printed. The receipt was dated by appellant as of June 21, 1910 (6/21/1910), two months later than the date of the check. From this significant fact in connection with the other circumstances, the jury may well have found that it was intended and understood that until such date arrived, June 21, 1910, and the stock could be delivered and the transaction finally closed, the title to the money should remain with Mrs. Griesse, and the possession only be in appellant, for the purpose of paying for the stock when it could be issued by the company to Mrs. Griesse. This view of the transaction finds substantial support in the evidence, and for that reason we cannot say that the verdict of guilty of grand larceny is not supported by the evidence.

[3] The defendant also complains of the ruling of the court in sustaining an objection to appellant's offer to prove that the stock of the company was of some value. Without determining whether or not such evidence was at all pertinent or material in view of the peculiar facts of the case, we do not think the court in its ruling committed any error of which appellant can be heard to complain. Before this offer of testimony occurred, appellant had offered in evidence certain letters from various persons which, though not set forth in the record, seem to have been addressed to appellant, and to have contained statements bearing upon the value of the invention and the like. Upon objection these letters were ruled out, and appellant very properly makes no complaint as to such rulings. When he made his offer, of the ruling out of which he does complain, he did not put his witnesses upon the stand nor ask them any question. They were not shown to have had any knowledge of the company or of the value of the so-called invention. Appellant made a somewhat vague and general offer of testimony along certain general lines, and concluded his offer by the statement that "your honor has practically ruled on that." By this statement counsel manifestly referred to the ruling of the court in rejecting the letters that had previously been offered, and we think in so doing really invited the ruling of the court that was thereupon made as to his present offer. The matter was certainly so presented to the court as to convey the idea that the same point was involved as had been ruled on. In this way the action of counsel was well calculated to mislead the court (unintentionally of course) as to the purpose of the offer. The previous ruling was clearly correct; and we think, under the circumstances above detailed as attending the last offer, appellant should not be heard to complain of the ruling which he in effect invited.

Appellant also complains of the refusal of the court to give some instructions requested by appellant, but an examination of the record satisfies us that, so far as such instructions correctly stated the law, they were substantially given in other instructions. The instructions given were correct, and fully charged the jury on the matters of law involved in the case.

[4] In concluding this opinion we deem the occasion opportune to call attention to the provisions of section 954 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 772). This section is clearly intended to permit the charging of different offenses in different counts of the same indictment or information, where different offenses all relate to the same act, transaction, or event. The section as it is now written has been the law of this state since 1905, and yet no case has yet been before this court where the prosecuting officer has availed himself of its provisions. It is certain that, by following the rule prescribed in this section, any excuse for an appeal could be frequently avoided where any doubt may exist as to whether the evidence will disclose a case of larceny, false pretenses, or embezzlement. In charging under this section, it is, of course, necessary that care be taken to make it clearly appear that the offense set forth relates to but one act, transaction, or event (People v. Jailles, 146 Cal. 303, 79 Pac. 965); but, if this be done, no harm can result from charging under different counts so as to meet every plausible view of the facts.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by the Bank of Venice against Susan N. De Luna Hutchinson, sued as Susan N. De Luna. Judgment for plaintiff; defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Anderson & Anderson, for appellant. Tanner, Taft & Odell, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. The action was against defendant and appellant as guarantor of a promissory note, and was originally brought against Susan N. De Luna, under which name and style she executed the contract of guaranty. The complaint was filed August 1, 1908. Defendant and appellant appeared thereto and subsequently, on December 14, 1908, filed her answer, setting forth, among other things, that she was a married woman; that her husband's name was W. C. Hutchinson; and that her husband was absent from his home temporarily, but that the parties were not living separate and apart. Thereupon plaintiff asked for and obtained leave of court to amend its complaint, alleging the marriage, the husband's name, and asking that he be made a party to said proceeding. This was pursuant to a stipulation, which further agreed that the answer theretofore filed might stand as an answer to the amended complaint. This amendment to the complaint and the stipulation were filed on June 3, 1909. The court, by its order made October 13, 1909, directed the issuance of an alias summons. The original summons was returned and filed November 12, 1909. Thereafter an affidavit for publication of summons was filed, which set forth the time of the filing of the complaint, that the original summons had been returned on the 12th day of November, 1909, the issuance of an order for the alias summons, that the same could not be served upon W. C. Hutchinson, and generally setting forth facts sufficient to authorize the issuance of an order for publication of summons. The jurat attached to the affidavit bears date of October 11, 1909. Due publication and mailing is shown by the record, and the default of Hutchinson duly entered. Thereafter judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff, and against defendant and appellant, and a new trial denied, from which judgment and order Susan N. De Luna appeals upon a bill of exceptions.

[1] Appellant's chief contention is that the affidavit for publication of summons is shown to have been made a month before the order for publication was issued, and, upon the authority of Forbes v. Hyde, 31 Cal. 351, could not be used as the basis for an order of publication. It will be conceded that the affidavit should be with reference to conditions existing at the time of the application for the order; but we are not prepared to say that, under the facts presented by the record in this case, it can be said that such rule has been violated. In the body of the affidavit for publication, it recites occurrences of November 12, 1909. The date appearing in the jurat, we think, was obviously a mistake, and was inserted by the notary inadvertently and carelessly. Reading the affidavit, it is certain that it was sworn to and subscribed on or after the 12th day of November, 1909. Otherwise it would not have been possible to have incorporated therein the occurrences of that date. Section 412 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not provide in terms that the date of the affidavit should be disclosed therein, but does indicate clearly that it must be presented and verified at the time of the application. We are of opinion that, had the jurat omitted any date, and nothing to the contrary appeared, it would be presumed that it was made at the time of its presentation. The order of publication so recites. The case of Hibernia, etc., Society v. Churchill, 128 Cal. 633, 61 Pac. 278, 79 Am. St. Rep. 73, is an authority upon the proposition that, the statute not requiring the date of a summons to be made a part thereof, such summons is not void on account of an improper date being inserted therein; and People v. McDaniels, 141 Cal. 115, 74 Pac. 773, is to the effect that the primary object and purpose of the signature of the officer to the jurat is to witness the signature of the affiant to the affidavit.

[2, 3] We think there is no merit in appellant's suggestions, which she has not dignified by an argument, to the effect that jurisdiction of the husband, where an attachment is sought against the wife's separate estate, cannot be obtained by publication. Section 408 of the Code of Civil Procedure, with reference to the time when an alias summons may be issued, we think, has not reference to the service of such summons where parties are brought in by order of court, or by stipulation, under the provisions of section 389 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

We perceive no error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

HYNES v. ALL PERSONS et al. (Civ. 940.)
(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 27, 1912.)

1. QUIETING TITLE (§ 34*)—STATUTORY ACTION—AFFIDAVIT.

St. 1906, Ex. Sess. p. 78, providing a special action to quiet title, requires that the action shall be commenced by the filing of a verified complaint, and that plaintiff at the time of filing the complaint shall file with the same an affidavit setting forth the character of plaintiff's estate in and possession of the property, the period during which it has existed, from whom obtained, whether or not he has ever made any conveyance of the property, or any part thereof, or interest therein, and, if so, when and to whom, also a statement of any and all subsisting mortgages, deeds of trust, and other liens thereon, that he does not know and has never been informed of any other person who claims an interest therein or lien thereon, etc. The statute also requires that the complaint and summons contain a particular description of the property. Held that, where the summons and complaint particularly described the property in controversy, it was not necessary that it should be again particularly described in the affidavit, but it was sufficient that the affidavit embraced the description in the summons and complaint by reference.

2. QUIETING TITLE (§ 34*)—ACTION — AFFIDAVIT—NATURE OF PLAINTIFF'S ESTATE.

St. 1906, Ex. Sess. p. 78, is remedial in its nature, and should be liberally construed, so that, where the affidavit contains such a full and complete statement of plaintiff's interest as will enable the defendants to verify the same, prevent fraud, and safeguard their own rights, it is sufficient without setting forth every probative fact relating to the derivation of plaintiff's estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 69-72, 76, 77; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

3. QUIETING TITLE (§ 34*)—SOURCE OF TITLE —AFFIDAVIT.

In an action to quiet title, a statutory affidavit filed with the summons and complaint alleged that plaintiff derived the property from the estate of her father and from deeds from her mother, sister, and brother, all being specifically named; that the property was inclosed by fences and occupied by buildings, and was resided on by plaintiff; that plaintiff and her grantors have been the owners in fee simple, and in the actual and peaceable possession of the same and every part thereof for more than 20 years last past. Held, that the affidavit sufficiently set forth the character of plaintiff's estate and the duration of its existence, etc., as required by St. 1906, Ex. Sess. p. 78.

4. PLEADING (§ 406*)—NATURE OF ACTION—STATUTES — AFFIDAVIT — OBJECTION — WAIVER.

St. 1906, Ex. Sess. p. 78, creating a special action to quiet title, provides (section 12) that, except as therein otherwise provided, the provisions and rules of law relating to evidence, pleading, practice, new trials, and appeals applicable to other civil actions shall apply to actions under such act. Held, that where defendant appeared and answered in an action under such statute, and went to trial without objection, either by demurrer or answer to the jurisdiction or subject-matter, and the issue of ownership was submitted and decided, and an appeal taken from the judgment on that issue, she thereby waived any right to object that the affidavit required to be filed with the summons and complaint did not sufficiently set forth the nature of plaintiff's estate, the duration of her possession, etc.

5. QUIETING TITLE (§ 47*)—JUDGMENT—DETERMINATION OF INTERESTS.

St. 1906, Ex. Sess. p. 78, created a special action to quiet title, and section 11 declared that the judgment should ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests, and claims in and to the property and every part thereof, whether the same was legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent. Defendant in an action under such act filed a cross-complaint, alleging that she was the owner of an estate of inheritance in the property, and was seised in fee in every part thereof, etc. Held, that a finding of title in plaintiff, and that defendant and cross-complainant had no right, title, interest, or claim in or to the property described in the complaint or any part thereof, sufficiently disposed of the issues raised by the cross-complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 95-97; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 396*)—FINDINGS—EVIDENCE.

In a suit to quiet title, a finding on the question of rents, issues, and profits was properly omitted where there was no evidence on which to base it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 935-938; Dec. Dig. § 396.*]

7. QUIETING TITLE (§ 47*)—FINDINGS—SUFFICIENCY.

A finding of the fact of title or ownership is good without a finding on the particular facts on which the title or want of title depends.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 95-97; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

8. APPEARANCE (§ 24*) — SPECIAL ACTION — SUMMONS—MEMORANDA.

St. 1906, Ex. Sess. p. 78, creating a special action to quiet title, provides (section 4) that there shall be appended to the summons memoranda stating the date of the first publication of the summons, and, second, the names and addresses of such adverse claimants as are disclosed by the affidavit of plaintiff on filing the complaint. Held, that the omission of the second requirement was not fatal, where the only adverse party mentioned in the affidavit and interested in having the memoranda noted appeared and disclaimed any interest in the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appearance, Cent. Dig. §§ 118-143; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by M. J. Hynes, special administrator of the estate of Frances J. Graham, deceased, against All Persons, etc., interested in certain real property. From a judgment for plaintiff, E. A. Leigh, substituted in the place of Mary S. Knoll, deceased, appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Dunne and J. Walter Scott, for appellant. Cullinan & Hickey (A. Everett Ball, Sullivan & Sullivan, and Theo. J. Roche, of counsel), for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to quiet title to certain two lots or parcels of land in the city and county of San Francisco under the provisions of the so-called McEnerney act. Stats. 1906, p. 78. The action was commenced by Frances J. Graham, and, while yet living, judgment passed in her favor. Subsequently the present plaintiff was substituted in her stead. Defendant Knoll appealed from the judgment and order denying her motion for a new trial. Subsequent to the appeal said defendant Knoll died, and E. A. Leigh, the duly appointed, qualified, and acting executor of her last will and testament, was substituted in her place and stead, and now prosecutes the appeal.

The complaint and affidavit were filed on July 26, 1909, and on October 29, 1909, defendant Knoll filed a general and special de-murrer, which was overruled, and on November 15, 1909, she filed her answer.

The complaint appears to set forth, by proper averments, all the facts required to be stated by the McEnerney act, and we do not understand that its sufficiency is now questioned. Defendant denies the averments of the complaint, "and for a further and separate and distinct ground of defense, * * * and by way of cross-complaint, defendant alleges that this defendant is the owner of an estate in inheritance, to wit, an estate in fee simple absolute in and to that real property, situate, lying, and being," etc. (describing parcel 2 of the land mentioned in the complaint). She alleges that she "is the owner and seised in fee of and was at all times herein mentioned the owner and seised in fee of the above-described real property and every part thereof." The answer or so-called cross-complaint was not accompanied by an affidavit as required by section 5 of the act to be filed by the plaintiff, nor does it contain averments "fully and explicitly setting forth and showing the character of his (her) estate, right, title, interest or claim in and possession of the property," as is required to be stated by a plaintiff in his affidavit. It states that defendant has made no conveyance of said lot other than as explained in the cross-complaint, and likewise avers no knowledge of any claim or interest adverse to defendant except as explained. Defendant's prayer is for a decree of the court "quieting the title of said defendant to said real property against said plaintiff and all persons claiming any interest in or lien upon said real property * * * and declaring said defendant to be the owner in fee simple of each and every, all and singular of said real property," and that the deed executed by defendant to plaintiff be declared void and ordering that it be canceled.

The point principally relied on by defendant is "that the affidavit required to be filed at the time of filing the complaint was and is fatally defective." The grounds of this contention are (1) that the affidavit fails to identify any specific real property; (2) that it "fails to set forth and show, fully and explicitly, the derivation of the affiant's asserted title"; (3) that it fails to show in like manner "during what period the affiant's asserted title has existed." The affidavit states, among other things: "(1) That the character of plaintiff's estate, right, title, interest, or claim in, and possession of, the real property described in the complaint in this action and herein referred to, is as follows, to wit: That the plaintiff is the owner in fee simple absolute, and either by herself or by her tenants and agents, or persons holding under her, is in the actual and peaceable possession of all of that certain real property, situate in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, and particularly described in the said complaint, to which reference is hereby made, and made a part of this affidavit. That the real property described as 'parcel No. 1' and 'parcel No. 2' was derived from the estate of her father, Joseph H. Cording, deceased, and from deeds from Mary S. Knoll, her mother, Alice Leigh, her sister, and Frederick A. Cording, her brother. That all of said real property is inclosed by fences and buildings. Parcel 1 is inclosed by a fence, and parcel 2 is inclosed by fence and occupied by buildings, and is resided upon by affiant. That plaintiff and her grantors have been the owners in fee simple and in the actual and peaceable possession of the same and every part thereof for more than 20 years last past."

[1] The objection that the particular description of the property should have appeared in the affidavit and that the omission was not cured by reference to the complaint made part of the affidavit wherein, as well as in the summons, it was particularly described, we think without merit. The practice is quite common to make exhibits part of a complaint by reference thereto. Under the McEnerney act it is expressly provided that "the action shall be commenced by the filing of a verified complaint" (section 2); but "at the time of filing the complaint, the plaintiff shall file with the same his affidavit" (section 5). The complaint and affidavit are so closely related that we can see no reason why the reference here made to the complaint should not be held sufficient. The statute expressly requires the complaint to contain "a particular description of such real property," as also must the summons. The statute does not require the affidavit to contain a particular description of the property. It necessarily relates to the property, and may properly, and perhaps should, embrace a description of it for identification. But we think this may be accomplished by reference to the complaint. The general rule is discussed in Santa Rosa Bank v. Paxton, 149 Cal. 195, 86 Pac. 193. In Estate of Cook, 137 Cal. 184, 191, 69 Pac. 968, 971, the court said: "We regard the rule as well settled that a necessary allegation in a complaint or petition must be distinctly averred in the complaint or petition, and, if omitted, it cannot be supplied by a reference to an exhibit; but, if the allegation be defective, it may be aided by an express reference to an exhibit for that avowed purpose." The property is mentioned in the affidavit as situated in the city and county of San Francisco and is several times referred to but is not particularly described otherwise than by reference to the complaint. The defect, if any, we think was removed by such reference.

[2] Much attention is given by appellant, in support of his testate's objections to the affidavit, to the alleged unique character of the McEnerney act, and cases which have arisen under it are cited to show that "scrupulous care should be exercised by the court when examining the sufficiency and regularity of proceedings taken under the act." And it is hence claimed that one who proceeds under a special statute, such as this is, must comply with the conditions necessary to his recovery under that statute, "and no recovery can be had unless the plaintiff alleges exactly those facts which the statute names as the basis for the right conferred." In short, though in its nature remedial, the act must be strictly construed.

On the other hand, respondent contends that, being remedial, it is to be liberally construed. Of the statute, Mr. Justice Lorigan, for the court, in Lofstad v. Murasky, 152 Cal. 64, 67, 91 Pac. 1008, 1009, said: "While it is true that the act in question is of a remedial nature, and should be liberally construed so as to effect the purpose contemplated by it, a court is not warranted under the guise of liberal construction in giving to a term or phrase a different meaning than such as it is generally understood to possess"—this in discussing the meaning of the term "actual possession" used in the act. In Estate of Patterson, 155 Cal. 626, 638, 102 Pac. 941, 945 (26 L. R. A. [N. S.] 654, 132 Am. St. Rep. 116, 18 Ann. Cas. 625), the court said of the amendment of 1907 (St. 1907, p. 122) to section 1339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which relates to the proving of a will "destroyed by public calamity," and refers to the same cause which gave rise to the McEnerney act: "It is remedial in its nature and is designed to preserve the testamentary right. * * * Such laws should be given a liberal construction to promote the purposes for which they are designed." Appellant cites with confidence Potrero Nuevo Land Co. v. All Persons, 158 Cal. 731, 112 Pac. 303. That case was decided on a motion to dismiss for insufficiency of the affidavit which merely stated, as to the source of title: "That said title to said property was sold and conveyed by the state of California to one John Bensley in 1855, and by him, through divers mesne conveyances, conveyed to said plaintiff, who is now the owner and holder thereof, and has been for the last 10 years." Referring to the statute, the court, by Mr. Justice Henshaw, said: "A requirement of a full and explicit showing of the period during which a plaintiff has enjoyed this estate and a full and explicit showing of the person or persons from whom obtained is not met by the affidavit here presented. To say that one has owned an estate for 10 years and more is not fully and explicitly showing how long in fact he has owned and enjoyed it. A statement that one acquired title by 'divers mesne conveyances from one John Bensley, to whom the state conveyed the property in 1855,' is not a full and explicit showing, description or characterization of the person 'from whom obtained.'" The opinion points out that "the provision of the statute requiring a full and complete statement of these particulars is manifestly designed for the benefit of the defendants, in enabling them, by verifying plaintiff's claim, to prevent fraud and safeguard their rights," and hence the court says, "A full and fair compliance with the provisions is a just exaction from every plaintiff." In a concurring opinion, Mr. Justice Shaw said: "I agree that the procedure prescribed in the act should be followed closely." But how closely? With what degree of minuteness must the plaintiff set forth the history of his title and its enjoyment in order to meet the terms of the statute requiring him to file an affidavit "fully and explicitly setting forth and showing the character of his estate, right, title, interest or claim and possession"? It cannot be reasonably held that the plaintiff must set forth every probative fact relating to what appellant terms "the derivation of affiant's asserted title" and every probative fact showing for "what period the affiant's asserted title has existed," in which respects it is claimed the affidavit is defective. The purpose of a full and complete statement showing the person or persons "from whom obtained" and how long in fact the affiant "has enjoyed the property," as was said in the Potrero Nuevo Case, is "for the benefit of the defendants, in enabling them, by verifying the plaintiff's claim, to prevent fraud and safeguard their own rights."

[3] A statement that meets these requirements is sufficient. The affidavit here is much more explicit than the affidavit in the Potrero Nuevo Case. It shows that plaintiff derived the property "from the estate of her father, Joseph H. Cording, deceased, and from deeds from Mary S. Knoll, her mother, Alice Leigh, her sister, and Frederick A. Cording, her brother"; that the property is inclosed by fences and occupied by buildings, and is resided on by affiant; "that plaintiff and her grantors have been owners in fee simple and in the actual and peaceable possession of the same and every part thereof for more than twenty years last past." It seems to us that there is sufficient here to enable defendants "to verify plaintiff's claim," and "to prevent fraud and safeguard their rights." Unlike the affidavit in the case cited, it is explicit in showing from whom the estate was derived and the period during which plaintiff and her grantors named have enjoyed the estate. A still later expression by the Supreme Court is found in Soher v. Cabaniss, 119 Pac. 911, in which the Potrero Nuevo Case is cited. It throws some fresh light upon the question as to the requirements of the statute in the particulars we have been noticing.

[4] But we have this situation here. Defendant Knoll appeared and answered and went to trial, without objection, by demurrer or answer, either to the jurisdiction of the person or subject-matter. The issue of ownership between the respective parties was submitted, and decided, and the appeal is from the judgment on that issue. So far as appellant is concerned, the affidavit has performed its office, and she has no cause to complain. The evidence fully and explicitly showed the facts which appellant claims should have more fully appeared in the affidavit.

Section 12 of the McEnerney act provides: "Except as herein otherwise provided, the provisions and rules of law relating to evidence, pleading, practice, new trials, and appeals applicable to other civil actions shall apply to the actions hereby authorized." Appellant appeared voluntarily and answered, which is equivalent to personal service of the summons and copy of the complaint. Code Civ. Proc. § 416. It was said, in the Potrero Nuevo Case, supra, as applicable here: "Defaulting defendants are not adverse parties to other defendants when there is no joint relation alleged between them, and a judgment against each is several and independent. * * * The rules of practice relating to appeals under the McEnerney act are those applicable to other civil actions (section 12)." It was held in Adams v. Hopkins, 144 Cal. 30, 77 Pac. 716, that a defendant who has appeared cannot take advantage of any defect in the service or return of summons; "nor can the appellants avail themselves of defects in the service of summons on other parties." See In re Yoell, 131 Cal. 581, 63 Pac. 913. The doctrine of waiver of irregularities not amounting to nullities is fully discussed in Clapp v. Graves, 26 N. Y. 418. The rule stated by Coleridge, J., in Holmes v. Russell, 9 Dowl. 487, is quoted approvingly: "It is difficult, sometimes, to distinguish between an irregularity and a nullity, but I think the safest rule to determine what is an irregularity, and what is a nullity, is to see whether the party can waive the objection. If he can waive it, it amounts to an irregularity. If he cannot, it is a nullity." What office the affidavit is intended to perform was pointed out in the Potrero Nuevo Case, and we do not doubt that the filing of an affidavit in substantial compliance with the statute is jurisdictional, at least so far as it concerns defendants who do not appear. And if it be conceded that the proceedings would be a nullity as to all defendants for want of jurisdiction, whether appearing or not, where no affidavit is filed, or where the affidavit lacks the essential averments required by the statute, still we think the affidavit was sufficient in the present case to confer jurisdiction.

[5] It is contended that the judgment should be reversed because the court failed to find upon material issues raised by the cross-complaint. Section 11 of the McEnerney act provides: "The judgment shall ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent." The finding of the court as to plaintiff's title, set out above, is abundantly supported by the evidence and so also the finding as to defendant's title, also given above. But it is urged that there should have been a specific finding negating defendant's equitable interest claimed in the cross-complaint and also negating the averments of fraud and undue influence.

It appeared that title to the property in question vested in defendant Knoll, the then wife of Joseph H. Cording, deceased, and mother of plaintiff's intestate, Mrs. Graham. By the decree of distribution, the property of the said Cording was distributed in accordance with his will, half to Mrs. Knoll, then Mrs. Cording, and the remaining half to her in trust, for the support, education, and benefit of the three children, of whom Mrs. Graham was one. The will provided and the decree adjudged that Mrs. Cording should "have full and entire control and right of disposition of all and every part of said property, both real and personal, during her natural life, to sell and convey, lease, mortgage or hypothecate the same or any part thereof without an order of probate, or any other court, or any of the legal proceedings in, about or concerning such matters." It further appeared that, for reasons shown, Mrs. Knoll made a division of this remaining property among her children, conveying to Mrs. Graham the parcel in question, and in this deed the other children joined. This deed was delivered and placed in escrow with a bank in San Francisco under an agreement that it was to be recorded after the death of Mrs. Knoll. Thus far there is no conflict in the testimony. There was evidence that subsequently this deed was, by the written consent of Mrs. Knoll and her children, surrendered by the bank and recorded, and is the deed on which plaintiff relies. It was in evidence that the deed was recorded because Mrs. Knoll was involved in some litigation, and desired to place the title in Mrs. Graham. This deed was one of three deeds by which she undertook to convey this trust property directly to the beneficiaries. There was no evidence that any fraud was attempted to be practiced on her, or that she acted under any undue influence. There was some evidence that Mrs. Graham agreed to furnish a home for her mother, and she testified that she had kept that promise. The principal fact in controversy was whether the deed had been taken out of escrow and recorded by the direction and with the consent of Mrs. Knoll. And all these matters were brought out in support of her claim of title and to disprove Mrs. Graham's title. In fact, the real and only issue presented by the pleadings was that of ownership—both parties claiming a fee simple absolute, and the relief sought by defendant was to quiet such title in her.

The court found title in Mrs. Graham, and "that the defendant Mary S. Knoll, has no right, title, interest, or claim in or to said property described in said complaint, or any part thereof." It seems to us that the ultimate fact involved in the issue presented by the answer is here directly found upon and that no further finding was necessary. The death of Mrs. Knoll has been suggested since the cause was transferred to this court, which has terminated any life estate or interest she may have had in the property.

[6] If a question of rents, issues, and profits should be suggested, suffice it to say that there is no evidence on which any finding could have been made. We do not think the point now urged would warrant a reversal of the judgment. The finding of ownership includes the probative facts. Montecito Valley W. Co. v. Santa Barbara, 144 Cal. 578, 594, 77 Pac. 1113.

[7] A finding upon the fact of title or ownership is good without a finding of the particular facts upon which such title or want of title depends. Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 156 Cal. 510, 523, 105 Pac. 981. See Black v. Black, 74 Cal. 522, 16 Pac. 311; Bulwer Cons. M. Co. v. Standard Cons. M. Co., 83 Cal. 589, 23 Pac. 1102.

[8] Section 4 of the McEnerney act directs that two certain memoranda be appended to the summons on the posting and publication thereof—first, the date of the first publication of summons; and, second, the names and addresses of such adverse claimants as are disclosed by the affidavit of plaintiff upon filing the complaint. The second requirement was omitted. The affidavit showed that the city and county of San Francisco claimed an adverse interest. The city and county of San Francisco appeared by answer and disclaimed any interest in the property. Conceding that appellant could take advantage of this omission, which we doubt (Adams v. Hopkins, 144 Cal. 30, 77 Pac. 712), the appearance of this, the only adverse party mentioned in the affidavit and interested in having the memoranda noted, cured the defect.

Discovering no prejudicial error in the proceedings, the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

DELGER v. JACOBS et al. (Civ. 950.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 27, 1912.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 291*)—FORCIBLE DETAINER—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

A complaint in forcible entry and detainer, alleging that plaintiff leased certain premises in writing to defendant J. for five years, at a specified rental; that J. entered under such lease, which contained covenants against assignment and subletting, providing that any assignment or subletting should work a forfeiture at the lessor's option; that J. assigned his interest without plaintiff's consent to certain other defendants, whereupon plaintiff served notice to quit; and that defendants had refused to quit and surrender the premises—was sufficient and not subject to demurrer.

2. WITNESSES (§ 219*)—PRIVILEGE—WAIVER.

Where defendant's attorney and a stenographer were permitted to testify with reference to the execution of an assignment of a lease, without objection, defendant was not entitled to have the evidence stricken on the ground that the witnesses were privileged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 769, 781, 782; Dec. Dig. § 219.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 200*)—ATTORNEY—ACTS OF SCRIVENER—CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATION.

Where an attorney in preparing an assignment of a lease acted as a scrivener and not as confidential attorney of any of the parties, his evidence as to the execution and delivery of the assignment was not privileged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 752, 757; Dec. Dig. § 200.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 178*)—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE—ASSIGNMENT OF LEASE—CONTENTS.

Where an alleged assignment of a lease had been lost, its contents could be proved by any witness who had read it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 722-725; Dec. Dig. § 178.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 412*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—TRANSCRIPT.

In an action of unlawful detainer, plaintiff read in evidence portions of a transcript of the tenant's testimony in a bankruptcy proceeding as containing admissions against interest. Defendants demanded an inspection of the transcript, which plaintiff declined to give because of certain private notes thereon which had not been erased. At defendants' request the whole record was introduced; they being permitted to call the court's attention to such additional matter as they desired, and to inspect it after the notes had been erased. Held, that defendants could not complain thereafter of their own failure to inspect such transcript.

6. JUDGMENT (§ 580*)—FINAL JUDGMENT—SATISFACTION.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1049, provides that an action is deemed to be pending from the time of its commencement until its final determination on appeal, or until the time for appeal is passed, unless the judgment is sooner satisfied. Held, that where a judgment against a tenant in a prior proceeding, to the effect that he had leased the premises in controversy from plaintiff, had been fully satisfied by him, it was not objectionable, when offered in evidence as an estoppel, on the ground that the case had been appealed and that the judgment was not final.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1024; Dec. Dig. § 580.*]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 207*)—ADMISSION AGAINST INTEREST—JUDGMENT.

Where a judgment in a prior action by a landlord against his tenant determined that the tenant had leased the premises in question and was in possession under such lease, the judgment, even though it did not constitute an estoppel, was admissible, in a subsequent action by the landlord against the tenant, as an admission against interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 707-712; Dec. Dig. § 207.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 204*)—EVIDENCE—FAILURE TO LIMIT—NECESSITY OF OBJECTION.

Where evidence was admissible as against one of several defendants, the others could not object to its admissibility against them on appeal; they having made no such objection at the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1258-1280; Dec. Dig. § 204.*]

9. ESTOPPEL (§ 110*)—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL—PLEADING.

Proof of an alleged equitable estoppel against plaintiff is inadmissible where estoppel is not pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 300; Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 880*)—RIGHT TO CLAIM ERROR.

Where the tenant did not appeal from an adverse judgment in an action of unlawful detainer, other defendants, to whom the landlord had assigned an interest in the lease, who did appeal, were not entitled to review an issue of fraud raised in the tenant's cross-complaint.

11. TRIAL (§ 387*)—DECISION OF COURT—REQUISITES.

The decision on which the judgment is required to be entered by Code Civ. Proc. § 633, is not the clerk's entry in the minutes, but the decision which by section 632 is to be given in writing and filed with the clerk, prior to which there is no decision on which judgment can be entered, and no authority to enter judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 903-907; Dec. Dig. § 387.*]

12. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 291*)—UNLAWFUL DETAINER—USE AND OCCUPATION—DAMAGES FOR DETENTION.

In unlawful detainer, plaintiff is entitled to recover the value of the use and occupation, together with damages for the detention of the property to the date of the findings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1217-1269; Dec. Dig. § 291.*]

13. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 291*)—UNLAWFUL DETAINER—PARTIES—JUDGMENT.

Where an action of unlawful detainer was brought to recover rented premises for breach of a lease consisting of an assignment of the tenant's interest therein, without the landlord's consent, in violation of covenant, and it appeared that the assignment was for the purpose of operating a business on the leased premises by means of a partnership or corporation, it was error to order judgment against persons who never became members of the partnership or were in any wise interested in the business.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Edward F. Delger against Abe Jacobs and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants other than Jacobs appeal. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

L. S. Melsted and E. H. Williams, for appellants. Matt I. Sullivan, E. M. Gibson, Sullivan & Sullivan, and Theo. J. Roche, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. This action of unlawful detainer was brought to secure restitution of certain leased premises in San Francisco, a forfeiture of the lease, and for damages in the value of the use and occupation of the property during the period of detention. Besides Jacobs, the lessee, the others were made parties defendant upon the theory that they had entered under and by permission of said lessee and were doing business on the demised premises by his authority. The complaint sets forth: That "on the 15th day of July, 1910, plaintiff, by agreement and lease in writing, leased to said defendant Abe Jacobs" certain premises (describing them) for the term of five years from the 1st day of July, 1910, at the monthly rental of $650, "to be paid on the 1st day of each and every month in advance." That, by virtue of said agreement and lease, the said Jacobs entered into possession and occupation of said property and still continues to occupy the same. That the lease contained certain terms, conditions, and covenants, among which was that: "The lessee shall not sublet said premises, or any part thereof, nor assign this lease or any rights thereunder without the written consent of the lessor. Any assignment of this lease or any right thereunder, either directly or by operation of law, shall work a forfeiture of the same at the option of the lessor." That after the execution of said lease and said entry of Jacobs "and prior to the 1st day of October, 1910, and contrary to the conditions and covenants of said lease, said defendant, Abe Jacobs, without the consent in writing or otherwise of said plaintiff, assigned interests in said lease to said defendants B. T. Molsness, H. A. Moss, and Bristol Commercial Company, a corporation, and let and sublet said demised premises to said defendants." The violation of certain other covenants is also alleged, but this feature of the case we deem unnecessary to notice. It appears further that said defendants "are now, ever since the 1st day of October, 1910, have been, and were at the time of the service of the notice to quit hereinafter mentioned, in the possession of said demised premises"; that plaintiff served upon the defendants "three days' written notice to quit said premises and deliver possession thereof to plaintiff"; that defendants "have refused and neglected and still refuse and neglect to quit said premises or deliver possession thereof to plaintiff." A demurrer interposed by defendants was overruled by the court, and they filed an answer in which they denied positively the making of the lease, that Jacobs entered into possession thereunder, that there was ever any assignment of said lease or any part thereof by said Jacobs, or that he sublet said premises or any part thereof to any person in any form or manner, that any of the defendants violated any of the other covenants of the lease or that defendants B. T. Molsness, H. A. Moss, and Bristol Commercial Company, or any of them, "are now, or ever since the 1st day of October, 1910, have been, or were at any time or at all, in the possession of said demised premises," or that any of the defendants was served with "three days' notice to quit, such as specified in section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure or otherwise or at all." There are also some affirmative allegations of fraud against the plaintiff in connection with the leasing of said premises, which will be considered hereafter. From the judgment in favor of plaintiff all the defendants except the said Abe Jacobs have appealed; the last named having filed a waiver of "any and all rights that I may have to move for a new trial of the above-entitled matter, or to prosecute an appeal from the judgment rendered in said matter on the 18th day of November, 1910, in favor of plaintiff and against defendants."

[1] There can be no doubt that the demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. It is equally clear that there was sufficient evidence to support the material findings, with one exception hereafter to be noticed.

As to the execution of the lease itself, it may be said that, while apparently disputed in the opening brief of appellants, in their closing brief they declared that "everybody knows and admits that a lease was signed and delivered, but our answer shows that it was secured through fraud," and, to explain the denial of its execution in the answer, it is stated that, "where a lease is secured through fraud, its execution must be denied, for the obvious reason that the meeting of minds essential to the creation of a valid contract does not take place." In view of this statement and of the fact that no evidence of fraud in connection with the lease is exhibited, it is manifestly unnecessary to direct specific attention to the showing made as to this particular finding of the court.

Of the evidence that there was a violation of the covenant of the lease in reference to assignment, it is deemed sufficient to set forth the following: The plaintiff testified that he never gave any consent, in writing or otherwise, to Jacobs to assign any interest in the lease, or to assign the lease itself, or to sublet any of the premises described in the lease, and the court was justified in the inference that, on the 16th day of July, 1910, defendant Jacobs executed and delivered to B. T. Molsness and Henry A. Moss a written instrument in the following form: "San Francisco, July 16, 1910. I hereby certify and declare that the bill of sale taken in my name from Morris Steinberg, covering the saloon known as the 'Bristol' 1001 Market street, San Francisco, also the lease covering the said premises from the owner, and the municipal liquor license which has been taken in my name and has been received by me for the use and benefit of B. T. Molsness, Henry A. Moss and myself the undersigned, each of which parties is entitled to an undivided one-third interest in and to all of said property, and I hereby sell, assign and transfer to each of said B. T. Molsness and Henry A. Moss, an undivided one-third interest in and to all of said property." It is stoutly insisted by appellants that no such instrument was executed; but, in answer to this contention, it is sufficient to set forth the following testimony, which manifestly justifies the court's finding as to the assignment: Mr. Leon E. Prescott, a witness for plaintiff, was interrogated concerning the foregoing purported assignment, and he stated that he dictated it to his stenographer, Miss Whelan, at the request of Mr. Jacobs, "the three gentlemen being present at the time, Mr. Moss, Mr. Molsness, and Mr. Jacobs, and it was transcribed and signed by Mr. Jacobs, and a copy given to Mr. Molsness, and a copy given to Mr. Moss, and Mr. Jacobs kept the third." Miss Whelan testified that she took the dictation of this instrument from Mr. Prescott and transcribed it into longhand and delivered it to the latter in the presence of Moss, Jacobs, and Molsness. Mr. Morris Steinberg testified that, on said July 16th, at his place of business, he had a conversation with Mr. Jacobs in reference to the premises leased by the latter, and that Jacobs said that "he could not sign over the saloon and license and lease, as he agreed, to me for advancing him money, for the reason that Mr. Moss and Molsness compelled him that day to sign over a one-third interest to each of the parties at Mr. Prescott's office," and that Mr. Jacobs handed him the paper which had been executed, and that it was "the same thing in sum and substance" as the aforesaid purported assignment, and that it was signed by Abe Jacobs. The defendants Moss, Molsness, and Jacobs testified that an instrument was executed by Jacobs on said date and one copy delivered to Moss and another to Molsness, but they denied that it constituted an assignment, but claimed that it was simply a mortgage or pledge to secure the repayment of money that had been advanced for the purchase of the saloon fixtures. None of these witnesses, however, could give the contents of the instrument, nor did any of them produce a copy of it or satisfactorily account for its loss. The court was indeed justified in regarding with grave suspicion their testimony upon this point. There are other circumstances, unnecessary to detail, that lend support to the theory of assignment.

[2] In this connection we may notice the claim of appellants that the testimony of Mr. Prescott and Miss Whelan should have been excluded as privileged for the reason that Mr. Prescott was the attorney for Jacobs, Moss, and Molsness, and Miss Whelan was his stenographer. As a matter of fact, the testimony of these two witnesses showing the execution of said assignment was given without objection, and hence the ruling of the court refusing to strike it out could be justified on that ground. Miss Whelan identified the instrument, marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit 7," as a copy of Mr. Prescott's dictation already referred to. Not only was this evidence received without objection, but it must be plain that to these preliminary matters the rule of privilege would not extend. The essential facts as to the contents of said instrument and its execution and delivery were declared by Mr. Prescott, as aforesaid, in response to questions to which no objection was made. Appellants, to take advantage of the rule, should have objected promptly, of course, to any testimony as to these matters when it appeared that the witness sustained the relation that the law holds inviolate.

[3] But, assuming that the objection was timely, we think the facts take the case without the operation of said rule. It seems clear that the purpose of the meeting of the parties on said July 16th was the preparation and execution of an instrument that would afford Moss protection for the money that he had invested. Nothing transpired in the nature of a confidential communication that the law protects from disclosure. Mr. Prescott acted rather as a scrivener than attorney in the transaction. In 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (16th Ed.) § 239, it is said: "On the other hand, the person must be at the time acting as legal adviser, hence a communication with an attorney merely, as with a lender of money, a friend, or a scrivener, is not privileged."

In Borum v. Fouts, 15 Ind. 50, it is held that "when the terms of a contract have been agreed upon between the parties, and an attorney is afterwards employed as a scrivener merely to reduce the contract to writing, and no inquiry is made of him as to its legal effect, communications made to him while thus engaged will not be regarded as privileged."

In De Wolf v. Strader, 26 Ill. 225, 79 Am. Dec. 371, it is held, as stated in the syllabus: "An attorney who is requested to prepare a deed or mortgage, no legal advice being required, is not privileged and may testify as to what comes to his knowledge in connection with such a transaction."

In Hebbard v. Haughian, 70 N. Y. 61, the Court of Appeals declared that: "The objection that the attorney by whom the deed of April 4th was prepared could not give evidence of the directions he received from the parties and of the transaction between them at the time was not well taken.

He testified of facts within his knowledge, acquired in the transaction of the business between the parties, and they were not communicated to him as an attorney to enable him to perform his duties to a client. Knowledge acquired under such circumstances is not within the class of privileged communications."

[4] The material question here was whether, at the end of said transaction, an instrument in writing was executed by Jacobs, and, if so, what were its contents. The only disputed point, indeed, was as to what it contained, and, if it had not been lost, the instrument would speak for itself. Having been lost, its existence and contents could be proved by any witness who had read the assignment. Greer v. Greer, 58 Hun, 254, 12 N. Y. Supp. 778; Chapman v. Peebles, 84 Ala. 283, 4 South. 273. "It is a sound public policy which provides that an attorney or counsel should not be allowed to testify to any of the transactions or conversations between himself and his client which led up to the preparation of any document. But, when the document, be it a will or a contract or what not, has been executed, its contents are no longer confidential, the reason for the rule ceases, and the counsel may as well testify to the contents as may any other witness who knows such contents." Fayerweather v. Ritch (C. C.) 90 Fed. 13. We think this position is sound and is amply sustained by the authorities, in this and other jurisdictions.

[5] Appellants complain bitterly of the action of the court in reference to a transcript of testimony in the possession of respondent. They declare that the court denied to them the right to inspect it after it was actually introduced in evidence. They have, however, entirely misconceived the situation. Plaintiff had in his possession what purported to be a transcript of the testimony of Abe Jacobs taken in a certain proceeding in bankruptcy, and respondent read in evidence certain portions of it as containing admissions against interest. Appellants demanded an inspection of the transcript, but respondent declined to give them his copy for the reason that he had written upon it certain private notes that he had not erased. There is no claim made that respondent misread the quotation, or that it was not a correct transcription of said testimony of Mr. Jacobs. We must assume, also, that appellants could have secured a copy from the original source if they had so desired. Besides, on the request of appellants that the "whole record go in," with the exception of the testimony of a certain Mrs. Pyper which was claimed to be "fragmentary," the court said: "I expect that is probably the best course to take, to admit the whole, and then you gentlemen can call my attention to the other part. It will be admitted in evidence and marked as 'Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 8' and considered as read and hereafter counsel can refer to any part of it." Appellants claim that the "other part" was not called to the attention of the court; but, if they neglected to do so, they have only themselves to blame. After the said order was made, appellants requested the court to "permit us to inspect the copy of that record that he has there," and the court replied: "After he has erased his notes. You do not want to see his notes on it, I presume." It does not appear whether appellants ever inspected that copy, but this circumstance seems unimportant in view of the fact that the whole deposition was received in evidence and is set out in full in the record.

[6] Plaintiff offered in evidence all the papers, including the notice of motion for an order to be restored to possession, in the case of Edward F. Delger v. Abe Jacobs, No. 31,073, tried in the same court and decided in favor of plaintiff, September 2, 1910; his counsel stating in explanation: "There is a judgment against the defendant Abe Jacobs in this case, to the effect that the premises were leased by Delger to Jacobs, and he was in possession under the lease, and that judgment is, of course, an estoppel as to the material averment in his answer here, because he denies in his answer that he ever executed a lease." Appellants objected as follows: "We object to that, if the court please. We have asked to be restored to nothing but our estate there, and so distinctly provided, and we repudiated this lease in that suit, and we repudiate it in this." After said papers were received in evidence, appellants made the particular objection that "that case is on appeal and has not been finally decided, and is not a final judgment of the case, and ought not to be introduced as a part of this record, and that it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial evidence." The objection ought, of course, to have been made before the ruling of the court; but, since the record shows the payment by defendant Jacobs "of the sum of $1,388.50 in full payment, discharge, and satisfaction of the judgment in said action," and the acknowledgment of satisfaction by plaintiff therein, it cannot be said that the action was still pending, and the cases cited by appellant are therefore not in point. As to this it is probably sufficient to quote section 1049 of the Code of Civil Procedure that "an action is deemed to be pending from the time of its commencement until its final determination upon an appeal, or until the time for appeal has passed, unless the judgment is sooner satisfied." As we have seen, the judgment was satisfied by Jacobs, and hence the action was no longer pending.

[7] But if we concede that said judgment did not constitute an estoppel, it was, in connection with said satisfaction, at least evidence of an admission against interest upon a material issue and proper to be considered by the court.

[8] If it be admitted that the other defendants in the present action, being strangers to the former suit, might have urged successfully an objection to the consideration of said record as evidence against themselves or have maintained that it be limited in its application to Mr. Jacobs, it is sufficient to say that no such claim was presented to the trial court, and appellants are in no position now to make it, and Mr. Jacobs is presumably satisfied, since he has not appealed.

[9] The court did not err in excluding testimony tending to show a waiver on the part of the landlord of breaches of covenant under the lease. This claim was in the nature of an equitable estoppel, and it was necessary to plead it in order to introduce evidence in its support. Clarke v. Huber, 25 Cal. 593; Etcheborne v. Auzerals, 45 Cal. 125; Newhall v. Hatch, 134 Cal. 273, 66 Pac. 266, 55 L. R. A. 673; Chapman v. Hughes, 134 Cal. 641, 58 Pac. 298, 60 Pac. 974, 66 Pac. 982. There is no pretense of such plea in the answer. An amendment to the answer was filed in which an attempt was made to plead estoppel as to certain covenants in the lease. This amendment was stricken out by the court. But if we were to consider it as a part of the pleadings, it is not contended that it covers the breach of the covenant not to assign; counsel for appellants having stated to the lower court that: "Under those circumstances, I did not understand that we were to plead against an assignment. We have not pleaded here against an assignment, and we claim that there was no assignment."

[10] The second count of the answer of defendant Jacobs contained allegations of fraud against plaintiff, and there was a prayer for affirmative relief. It is urged that this constituted a cross-complaint and that the court's ruling was erroneous in sustaining an objection to evidence offered to support its averments. But, conceding that it stated a cause of action, it could only be so in behalf of Jacobs himself, and appellants are not aggrieved parties. They are not in any way connected with the purported cause of action, and therefore we are not called upon at their instance to review the alleged error.

[11] Appellants say that: "The court in its minute order holds the plaintiff entitled to judgment against all of the defendants for $650. In its findings it holds that plaintiff is entitled to judgment against all of the defendants except Melsted for $1,020. This is a distinction not justified by any reason, either in law or in evidence." The clerk's entry in the minutes is not the decision of the cause. "The decision upon which by section 633 of the Code of Civil Procedure the judgment is to be entered is that which by section 632 is to be given in writing and filed with the clerk; and until so given and filed there is no decision upon which judgment can be entered, and consequently no authority for entering any judgment." Crim

v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 486, 26 Pac. 1074, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491.

[12] The value of the use and occupation of the premises for one month was $650, and the difference between that amount and $1,020 is accounted for by the fact that the court allowed plaintiff damages for the detention of the property to the date of the findings. This was proper. Nolan v. Hentig, 138 Cal. 281, 71 Pac. 440.

[13] Justification for the judgment against the defendants other than Jacobs is urged by respondent, on the ground that, "under the statute providing for summary proceedings in unlawful detainer, persons may be made defendants who have entered upon or succeeded to the possession of the premises, from or through the tenant between whom and the landlord the conventional relation of landlord and tenant has been established." It is claimed that said defendants are brought within this rule by reason of the fact that they were all in the possession of said premises by consent of the tenant and without the consent of the landlord. There is, probably, no doubt that all of said parties expected to be interested in the use and occupancy of said premises. We think, however, it can hardly be said that any of them except Jacobs and Moss were actually in possession of the property and liable for the value of its use. Mr. Moss testified that, in the beginning, "we expected to make a co-partnership or an incorporation"; but, when he found he was the only one who had put up any money, he did not propose "to take Mr. Jacobs or Mr. Molsness in the partnership in a business for which I was paying and they had paid no money whatever." He testified further, substantially, that he discharged Mr. Jacobs, telling the latter "to go back to his tailoring business," and as "a matter of fact there is nobody interested in the actual ownership of the place but me, and my word has been final in every case. There is absolutely not one dollar of anybody else's money in there but mine," and that he had "absolutely the right to exercise control over the place." Without quoting further, we think it should be held that, as far as the judgment awards damages and costs against Molsness and the Bristol Commercial Company and costs against Melsted, it should be reversed, and affirmed in every other respect. The necessity for a new trial, however, upon this issue can probably be avoided if plaintiff will consent to such modification of the judgment in the court below.

We think no other point demands specific attention.

In conclusion, it may be suggested that, while counsel in their briefs have displayed much industry and learning, they are justly subject to censure for their apparent forgetfulness of the dignity and courtesy that should ever prevail in contests like this. It must be manifest that their untoward vituperation affords no credit to themselves and likewise neither entertainment nor enlightenment to the court.

All of said judgment is affirmed except that portion which orders, adjudgets, and decrees that plaintiff have and recover from defendants, B. T. Molsness and the Bristol Commercial Company, the sum of $1,020 for the use and occupation of said property and the sum of $100 for attorney's fee and $76, costs of suit, and except that portion which decrees that plaintiff recover said costs of $76 of defendant Melsted.

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 131*)—SEPARATE PROPERTY OF WIFE—PRESUMPTIONS—"SEPARATE ESTATE."

The presumption as to the character of property arising from the fact that a married woman engages in business is overcome by the fact that the property was purchased with funds derived from moneys owned by her before her marriage or acquired afterward by gift or bequest constituting her separate estate within Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Paul W. Bennett, Judge.

Action by Annie Cox Oldershaw against the Matteson & Williamson Manufacturing Company and another. From an order denying defendants' motion for new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

W. B. Beazley, Louis Luckel, and J. P. Jones, for appellants. W. W. Kaye and Kaye & Siemon, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Appeal from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

By stipulation filed it was agreed by counsel for the respective parties "that no briefs need be printed in the cause, but that the same may be heard and submitted upon the printed briefs filed in the case of W. H. Esdohr, Plaintiff and Appellant, v. Annie Cox Oldershaw and C. D. Oldershaw, Defendants and Respondents, 125 Pac.—, L. A. No. 2,979, in the Supreme Court, * * * and that printed copies of the briefs in said last-mentioned cause may be filed in the above entitled cause as the briefs of the respective parties." Accordingly, no briefs other than copies of those filed in case No. 2,979 in the Supreme Court have been filed herein. These briefs, however, were not prepared with reference to the record in this case; and, while numerous citations are made therein designating folios and pages of the transcript in the case of Esdohr v. Oldershaw, filed in the Supreme Court, no copy of that transcript has been filed herein or otherwise presented to this court. These briefs are of little value as an aid to the court in reaching a conclusion upon the questions presented, and our consideration of the appeal, in the absence of the presentation of the points, is necessarily independent and based upon what is disclosed by the transcript.

The complaint alleges that in 1897, and prior to the marriage of plaintiff with C. D. Oldershaw, the defendant Matteson & Williamson Manufacturing Company obtained a judgment against the latter in the superior court of Los Angeles county. In November, 1908, 10 years thereafter, said judgment creditor caused an execution to be issued out of said court and placed in the hands of defendant Kelly, sheriff of Kern county, who, as directed, levied the same upon the sum of $310.10 owned by plaintiff, but deposited in the Bank of Bakersfield in the name of C. D. Oldershaw, and which sum, notwithstanding plaintiff's verified claim and demand for the release thereof made to Kelly as sheriff, he collected from the bank and paid to Matteson & Williamson Manufacturing Company, which converted it to its own use; that said sum of $310.10 was the proceeds derived from a grocery business then and for a long time theretofore owned entirely by plaintiff as her separate property, and which she conducted under the name and style of C. D. Oldershaw & Co. The only issue raised by the answer was by a denial of the alleged ownership in plaintiff, defendants claiming that said grocery business, together with the $310.10 so levied upon and converted, was the property of C. D. Oldershaw, the judgment debtor. As to this issue, the court found in favor of plaintiff and gave judgment accordingly.

[1] The chief contention of appellants is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding of the court upon which the judgment was based. Without quoting it at length, it is sufficient to say that the evidence tends to show that the grocery business which produced the $310.10 so converted was purchased by plaintiff with her separate funds, the original source of which was money inherited by plaintiff from an aunt, and which, beginning with 1900, was invested in real estate, plaintiff from time to time selling and re-investing the proceeds of the same, all of which deals appear to have been successful in yielding her a considerable profit. The grocery business was purchased in 1905 by plaintiff and one Wheadon. Of the purchase price plaintiff paid $1,000, which sum she borrowed from the bank, and a short time thereafter she purchased Wheadon's interest for $880, which was paid by check drawn upon her account in the bank. By writing, she authorized the bank to honor checks drawn upon her account by the husband, and also gave the husband a general power of attorney to transact business for her. Sundry notes in various sums were executed to the bank by plaintiff through her husband as attorney in fact, payment of which was secured by mortgage upon the separate estate of plaintiff, and in all of which transactions the bank recognized plaintiff as the party to whom it extended credit. The direct testimony of both plaintiff and her husband is that the entire purchase price of the business was paid out of her separate funds, and that he, having no estate of his own, paid no part of the consideration therefor. He farmed her land, superintended the grocery business, and conducted all her business affairs without compensation other than the support of himself and family.

[2] While there may have been evidence and proof of circumstances inconsistent with the testimony of plaintiff and her husband, nevertheless, it was for the trial court to weigh and determine the same, and its finding based thereon will not be disturbed.

[3] While in cases of this nature a finding that property is the separate estate of the wife should be based upon clear and convincing evidence, the question as to whether or not the evidence offered is clear and convincing is for the trial court. Couts v. Winston, 153 Cal. 686, 96 Pac. 357; Estate of Pepper, 158 Cal. 619, 112 Pac. 62, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092. Much of the evidence offered on the part of defendants was hearsay, and, at most, tended to prove that plaintiff permitted C. D. Oldershaw to hold himself out as the owner of the property. The judgment upon which the execution was issued was for an indebtedness contracted by the husband long before his marriage with plaintiff, and the record discloses no facts which constitute an estoppel against plaintiff. Nor is there disclosed any act on the part of plaintiff whereby she transmuted her separate estate into community property; indeed, the execution to him of a general power of attorney is inconsistent with such intent.

[4] In our opinion any presumption as to the character of the property arising from the fact of a married woman engaging in business is, in this case, overcome by the fact that it was purchased with funds and the rents, issues, and profits (Civ. Code, § 162; Estate of Higgins, 65 Cal. 407, 4 Pac. 389) derived from moneys owned by plaintiff before marriage, or acquired afterwards by gift or bequest.

[5] Neither the fact that the husband contributed all his time and skill in the conduct of the business, or that he joined his wife in the execution of notes given for money wherewith to make the purchase (assuming that he did), in the absence of any agreement to that effect, gave him any interest in the property. Walsh v. Walsh, 84 Cal. 101, 23 Pac. 1099; Diefendorff v. Hopkins, 95 Cal. 343, 28 Pac. 265, 30 Pac. 549; Flournoy v. Flournoy, 86 Cal. 286, 24 Pac. 1012, 21 Am. St. Rep. 39; Heney v. Pesoli, 109 Cal. 53, 41 Pac. 819; Estate of Pepper, 158 Cal. 619, 112 Pac. 62, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092; Lewis v. Johns, 24 Cal. 98, 85 Am. Dec. 49; Carle v. Heller, 123 Pac. 815.

[6] Among other errors of law specified is that the court erred in excluding the depositions of C. D. Oldershaw and Annie Cox Oldershaw. It appears that the depositions of these parties were offered in evidence and objection thereto sustained upon the ground that the same were incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, and not proper cross-examination. The depositions, however, are not incorporated in the bill of exceptions, and hence the record contains nothing upon which the alleged erroneous ruling of the court can be reviewed.

[7] Officials of the bank which made loans to plaintiff were called as witnesses and permitted to testify that in making said loans they recognized plaintiff as the party borrowing the money and extended the credit to her. We perceive no prejudicial error in the ruling, particularly as it was shown that she was the only member of the marital community who possessed any estate whatsoever.

Our examination of the record discloses no error, and, our attention being called to none, the order appealed from is affirmed.

WITTMAN v. BOARD OF POLICE COM'RS OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 1, 1912.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 58*)—COMPELLING RESTORATION TO POSITION IN POLICE DE-PARTMENT—ACCRUAL OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

Plaintiff, on charges preferred to the board of police commissioners, was found guilty and, by resolution of the board on March 24, 1905, was dismissed from his position as chief of police and as a member of the police department, and thereafter was not recognized as a member of the department. On March 20, 1908, he demanded of the board that they assign him duty as a captain of police, which was refused, and on April 9, 1908, he filed a petition for mandamus to compel his restoration to duty as a captain of police. Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 1, provides a three-year limitation in actions upon a liability created by statute, other than a penalty for forfeiture. Held that, as the dismissal was the wrong sought to be redressed, and as the demand to be made as a condition precedent to legal relief could have been made at any time, the cause of action accrued upon dismissal, and the action was barred.

Mandamus by George W. Wittman against the Board of Police Commissioners of the City and County of San Francisco. Writ denied, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. M. Owens, Frank H. Gould, and J. J. Dunne, for appellant. Percy V. Long and John T. Nourse, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from a judgment denying plaintiff's petition for a peremptory writ of mandate, commanding the defendants to restore and assign petitioner to duty as captain of police of the city and county of San Francisco.

Defendants pleaded, among other things, as a defense to plaintiff's action, that the same was barred by the provisions of section 338, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court made findings of fact in accordance with this contention of defendants, and entered judgment for defendants. It is this finding of the court that presents the only point necessary to be decided upon this appeal.

Appellant was appointed a member of the police department of the city and county of San Francisco in 1885, and subsequently, on the 31st day of July, 1895, he was appointed a captain of police of said city and county. On the 21st day of November, 1901, he was regularly appointed chief of police of said city and county. On the 15th day of February, 1905, charges were preferred against him as such chief of police, to the board of police commissioners, which were heard and examined by said commissioners, who found him guilty thereof, and thereupon, on the 24th day of March, 1905, adopted a resolution in the words following, to wit: "Resolved, that George W. Wittman be and he is hereby dismissed as chief of police of the police department of the city and county of San Francisco and as a member of said department." And since said date defendants have not recognized or treated appellant as a member of the police department. On the 20th day of March, 1908, appellant demanded of defendants, the board of police commissioners of said city and county, that they assign appellant to duty as a captain of police, which demand they refused.

This proceeding to compel defendants to comply with such demand was instituted by the filing of a petition in the superior court for a writ of mandate on the 9th day of April, 1908, which was more than three years after appellant's formal dismissal from the department, but less than one month from the date of his demand to be assigned to duty as such captain of police.

Although the petition in form asks that the board be compelled to assign petitioner to duty as captain of police, the effect of granting the writ prayed for would be to reinstate petitioner in an official position from which he was formally, if not legally, dismissed more than three years before the institution of this action.

The contention of appellant is that the statute of limitations did not commence to run against appellant's cause of action until he made the demand on the 20th day of March, 1908. The argument is that, because, in a petition for a writ of mandate to enforce a private right, it is necessary to allege a demand and refusal, no cause of action in mandate exists until such demand and refusal; and therefore the statute does not begin to run until the date of such demand and refusal.

We cannot accede to this view of the law as applied to the facts of this case. Appellant was in form dismissed from the department on the 24th day of March, 1905, and ever since has been debarred from exercising any of the functions of a member of the department. For reasons not now necessary to be discussed, he claims that such attempted dismissal was illegal and void, and did not have the effect to remove him from his position of captain of police. It is the dismissal from the department that really lies at the bottom of appellant's cause of action. It is this alleged wrong that he seeks to have redressed by the action of the court, invoked more than three years after its commission. The denial of his right to hold a position in the police department occurred when he was formally dismissed by the board of police commissioners from the department. This dismissal occurred at a definitely fixed time, and was an unequivocal denial of his right to longer hold the position of captain of police, or any other position in the department. If his contention as to the illegality of such dismissal is well founded, he could immediately upon his dismissal have perfected his right to the remedy by mandate by making his demand for reinstatement or assignment to duty as such captain of police.

These considerations bring the case within the rule followed and recognized in many cases that, where a right has fully accrued, except for some demand to be made as a condition precedent to legal relief, which the claimant can at any time make, if he so chooses, the cause of action has accrued for the purpose of setting the statute of limitations running. Palmer v. Palmer, 36 Mich. 487, 24 Am. Rep. 605; Harrigan v. Home Life Co., 128 Cal. 531, 548, 58 Pac. 180, 61 Pac. 99; *Union Sav. Bank of San Jose v. Otherwise, as is pointed out in the cases above cited, he might indefinitely prolong his right to enforce his claim or right by neglecting to make the demand until it suited his convenience so to do.

The judgment is affirmed.

2. VENUE (§ 77*)—RIGHT TO CHANGE—EXHAUSTION OF RIGHT—REVIVOR.

After defendant had exhausted his right to move, under Code Civ. Proc. § 395, for a change of the place of trial, such right was not revived by an order, entered with plaintiff's consent, that defendant's subsequent motion for a change be argued on briefs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. §§ 59, 134, 138; Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

3. VENUE (§ 42*)—CHANGE—DISCRETION.

Where defendant's affidavit in support of his motion for change of place of trial on the ground of inconvenience to his witnesses was met by plaintiff's affidavit, showing that his witness would be inconvenienced by a granting of a change, denial of the motion was not an abuse of discretion.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 965*)—VENUE (§ 52*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION—CHANGE OF VENUE.

The granting of a change of the place of trial for the convenience of witnesses rests in the sound discretion of the superior court; and the Supreme Court will not disturb its determination, in the absence of any abuse of its discretion.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

Action by McNeill & Co. against John Doe (real name Charles Reick) and another. From an order denying a motion of defendant Reick for change of place of trial, and from judgment against him, he appeals. Affirmed.

T. E. Clark, for appellant. Strother & Aynesworth, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This appeal is from an order denying the motion of defendant Reick (sued as John Doe) for a change of the place of trial of the action, and from the judgment entered against him.

The suit was in claim and delivery to recover from defendant Reick possession of a piano, alleged to have been delivered to him by the defendant Hirsch, a piano salesman for plaintiff, in exchange for a secondhand automobile, without authority so to do.

The action was commenced in the superior court of Fresno county, and summons served on defendant Reick in Tulare county on May 17, 1910. On June 9, 1910, defendant Reick filed a demurrer to the complaint, and at the same time served notice and demand for a change of the place of trial from Fresno county to Tulare county, on the ground that he was a resident of the latter county when the action against him was commenced. This demand was accompanied by what purported to be an affidavit of merits. Before the day noticed for hearing of his motion, Reick filed a supplemental affidavit of merits. The motion was denied on June 20, 1910. The order of denial was clearly right, as the original and supplemental affidavits of merits were radically defective in essential particulars. No claim to the contrary is made by appellant. In fact, no appeal has been taken from this order.

On July 5, 1910, defendant Reick filed his answer, and therewith served another notice of demand for a change of the place of trial, on the ground of his residence in Tulare county when the action was commenced, and on the further ground of the convenience of witnesses; this demand also being accompanied by an affidavit of merits. On July 18th this motion, on both grounds, was denied—properly, as applying to the demand for a change on the ground of the residence of defendant, for reasons hereafter to be given, and properly, also, on the ground of alleged convenience of witnesses, as the affidavit of merits contained neither the names of the witnesses, nor any statement of the matters to which they would testify. Nothing, however, need further be said about this order, as no appeal has been taken from it.

On August 27, 1910, defendant again served a notice and demand for a change of the place of trial, both on the ground of his residence in Tulare county when the suit was commenced, and the further ground of the convenience of witnesses, filing therewith an affidavit of merits addressed to both grounds. The plaintiff filed a counter affidavit on the matter solely of the convenience of witnesses. The motion for a change came on for hearing on September 12, 1910, when it was agreed that it should be submitted to the court on briefs; and it was so ordered. Thereafter, on October 10, 1910, the court entered an order denying it. This appeal is taken from this last order, and from the judgment subsequently entered against the defendant.

[1] The order appealed from, as far as it denied the application for a change of the place of trial on the ground of the residence of the defendant, was correct. Section 395, Code of Civil Procedure, gives to a defendant sued in an action, such as was brought against appellant here, the right to a trial of the cause in the county where he resided when suit was brought. The procedure for securing this right—the filing of a demand that it be had in the county of his residence, made at the time he answers or demurs, accompanied by an affidavit of merits—is provided for by section 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Thereunder but one right is given to a defendant to move on that ground, and but one time fixed when he may assert it; and he is only then entitled to an order therefor upon a sufficient showing in his affidavit of merits. The appellant here was required to make his motion for the change when he filed his demurrer, and he did so; but, as his affidavit of merits was entirely insufficient, within the plain requirements of the law, the court properly denied his motion. He accepted this ruling as correct, as it undoubtedly was; and it was conclusive of any right to subsequently renew his motion on his own initiative, and on the same ground. His right to move ended with that denial. Hence, when he made this third motion on the same ground of residence in Tulare county, the court properly denied it, as his right to move in that respect was exhausted with the denial of his original application.

[2] Appellant claims, however, that because counsel on both sides agreed to submit this last motion to the court to be argued on briefs, and the court entered an order to that effect, this operated as a consent on the part of counsel for plaintiff and the court that appellant might renew the motion, and related back so as to revive the original motion. There is nothing in this claim. The court simply entertained the motion because it was made, and it was its duty to do so, and pass upon it; and, as far as the agreement to submit on the part of plaintiff is concerned, it only operated to just the extent it was intended, namely, to permit a written argument on the motion, instead of arguing it orally.

[3, 4] As to the denial of the motion on the ground of the convenience of witnesses. Appellant lays but little stress for a reversal of the order on this point. Whatever other reasons might be assigned in support of the order of the court, denying a change on this ground, it is sufficient to say that, while the affidavits on the part of appellant tended to show some inconvenience in the attendance of his witnesses, should the trial be held in Fresno county, the affidavit of the plaintiff in some degree tended to show a like inconvenience to the witnesses of plaintiff if the trial was changed to Tulare county. The matter of granting a change of the place of trial on the ground of convenience of witnesses is a matter addressed to the sound discretion of the superior court; and this court will not interfere with its exercise, unless it appears that such discretion has been abused, or injustice done by the ruling. The situation presented here does not admit of such a claim.

[5] As to the appeal from the judgment, little need be said on that subject. Under section 594, Code of Civil Procedure, on application of counsel for the plaintiff, and without notice to the appellant, the cause being at issue, the court fixed the day for its trial. Plaintiff served notice on the attorney for appellant of the day fixed therefor by the court, and on failure of the appellant or his counsel to appear on the day set judgment was entered for plaintiff. The claim of the appellant is that he should have had notice of the intended application to the court by counsel for plaintiff to have a day fixed for the trial. But the section does not require it; only that he shall have five days' notice of the time set for trial, and this he fully had. The validity of the judgment is attacked on other grounds; but, as they are of less merit than the point last considered, we do not discuss them.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Frewett, Judge.

Action by Edward C. Goldner against William Crane Spencer and others to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment directing a foreclosure subject to the lien of Thomas E. Curran, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

L. W. Lovey and Meredith & Landis (P. L. Benjamin, of counsel), for appellant. Francis Dunn and Henry N. Beatty, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage on lands in Placer county, alleged to have been given by defendant Spencer to plaintiff to secure the payment of a note for $21,000, dated November 15, 1907, payable one year after date, alleged to have been given by said Spencer to plaintiff. Defendant Curran, administrator, etc., was made a party defendant, because he had an interest in the mortgaged premises, which interest was alleged to be subject to plaintiff's mortgage. Defendant Spencer filed an answer, admitting all the allegations of the complaint, except the allegation as to the amount due, alleging that $500 had been paid on February 19, 1909, on account of the interest that had accrued on the note. This allegation was admitted by plaintiff's attorneys on the trial to be true. Defendant Curran, administrator, filed an answer, denying all the allegations of the complaint as to the note and mortgage, and the allegation that such mortgage was superior to his lien. He alleged his lien on the mortgaged premises to be that of a judgment obtained by him in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against said Spencer on March 27, 1908, for $10,946.46 and costs, a certified transcript of which judgment was recorded in the office of the county recorder of Placer county on April 6, 1908. By his amended answer served and filed at the commencement of the trial, he further alleged that said note and mortgage were executed and delivered without consideration, at a time when Spencer was heavily indebted to him and numerous other creditors, and insolvent, and when he had no other property, except the property described in the mortgage, out of which he (Curran) and such other creditors could satisfy their claims against him; that such note and mortgage was executed and delivered for the purpose of defrauding, delaying, and hindering him (Curran) as a creditor of Spencer, and other creditors; that plaintiff well knew that they were executed and delivered for that purpose; and that at no time since their execution has Spencer ever had any other property out of which Curran and other creditors of Spencer can satisfy their claims. By supplemental answer he alleged the sale to himself, on January 11, 1910, on an execution issued on said judgment, of said property for the sum of $10,000.

The trial court found that the note and mortgage were executed as alleged in the complaint; that at the time of their execution Curran, as such administrator, was a creditor of Spencer on the claim subsequently reduced to judgment; that at such time Spencer was insolvent; that such note and mortgage were without consideration; that said note and mortgage were made, executed, and delivered by Spencer to plaintiff, with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors; that plaintiff accepted the same knowing these facts, and knowing that Curran was one of said creditors, and with the intent to assist Spencer in his purpose to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors. Judgment was given, declaring the amount due to plaintiff on his note, namely, $24,388.10, and directing a sale of such portion of the mortgaged premises as had not been released to pay said amount, with interest and costs, subject, however, to the claim and lien of Curran, which was adjudged to be prior to plaintiff's claim. Plaintiff's motion for a new trial was denied. This is an appeal by him from the judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The validity of Curran's claim against the mortgaged premises is not questioned; the only question in regard thereto being whether it is superior to or subject to plaintiff's mortgage. The mortgage was recorded in Placer county on March 18, 1908, while Curran's certified copy of the transcript of his judgment was not recorded in such county until April 6, 1908. The conclusion of the trial court was that the note and mortgage were void as against Curran, because of the matters stated in the findings to the effect that the same were given by Spencer and accepted by plaintiff without consideration, and for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding Curran and other creditors of Spencer. The principal claim on this appeal is that such findings were utterly without support in the evidence.

[1] It is earnestly urged by plaintiff that it is apparent from written opinions filed by the trial judge on April 29, 1910, and May 19, 1910, which have been incorporated in the bill of exceptions, that he was satisfied by the evidence that plaintiff actually loaned Spencer $21,000, and took the note and mortgage therefor, and that he did not in any way collude with Spencer to defraud any creditor, and that the only reason for holding the mortgage void as against Curran was that he accepted a note and mortgage calling for a higher rate of interest than that to which he was entitled, knowing that Spencer was heavily indebted to Curran and others. But, as has often been said, we cannot consider these written opinions in determining whether or not the findings are sufficiently supported by the evidence. Although, in fact, in the bill of exceptions, they constitute no proper part of the record for any such purpose. The findings of fact filed October 20, 1910, must be taken as embodying the conclusions of the trial court on all questions of fact submitted to it for decision. The only question for us is whether these findings have sufficient legal support in the evidence and such inferences as may reasonably be drawn therefrom. Learned counsel for Curran frankly admit in their brief that "there is practically no conflict in the evidence, i. e., there is no point on which the testimony of one witness was directly contradicted by the testimony of any other witness," and that "the problem of deciding the case reduces itself into drawing the proper conclusions from the facts shown."

Addressing ourselves, first, to the question of want of consideration for the note. Plaintiff and Spencer are half-brothers. Plaintiff, during, and ever since the year 1907, resided in Paris, France. In April, 1907, Spencer went from San Francisco, his place of residence, to Paris, and did not return to San Francisco until October. He was then heavily interested in the California City Rock Company, a rock-quarrying enterprise, and was anxious to obtain money with which to further develop this enterprise, in which he apparently had great confidence. While in Paris, he obtained amounts of money aggregating nearly $30,000. His bank book, containing his account with the bank Société Générale, showed deposits from June 11 to October 18, 1907, aggregating 146,500.65 francs; the last being one of 94,000 francs on October 18, 1907. He testified that he received not exceeding 50,000 francs from his stepfather's estate, and acknowledged that 45,000 francs of the amount so deposited was so received by him. When he returned to San Francisco, he brought at least two drafts for $8,000 each, issued by said bank on October 22, 1907, one of which was deposited in the Crocker National Bank on November 15, 1907, and cashed by the Wells Fargo National Bank on November 16, 1907, and the other of which was paid by the latter bank on January 9, 1908. As to the source from which the money procured in Paris was obtained, he testified positively that amounts aggregating $21,000 were borrowed from plaintiff in Paris; the last item so borrowed being that of 94,000 francs on October 18, 1907, on his promise to send plaintiff a note and mortgage for the whole $21,000 on his return to San Francisco. Robinson, Spencer's attorney, who was with him in Paris, testified that he heard Spencer say to plaintiff that he desired to borrow some money from him, and that plaintiff replied that he "would loan him some money." Spencer testified that his reason for not giving the mortgage while in Paris was that he did not have a description of the real property to be mortgaged at hand. On his return to San Francisco, he prepared and signed the note and mortgage and acknowledged the execution of the mortgage on November 19, 1907, before a notary public; and he testified that he sent the same by mail to plaintiff at Paris, with the suggestion that, if satisfactory, the mortgage be returned to him to be recorded. It was subsequently recorded at Spencer's request in Placer county. He testified that plaintiff did return it to be recorded, and that after recording he sent it back to plaintiff at Paris. Plaintiff's attorney, Mr. Lovey, testified that in August, 1909, he received both the note and mortgage from plaintiff by mail from Paris, with a letter from plaintiff, stating that no part of the principal or interest had been paid, and directing him to press for collection, and, if necessary, to begin a suit to foreclose the mortgage and buy in the lands, if necessary. This letter was introduced in evidence. The action was commenced September 10, 1909. In reply to a letter of inquiry from Mr. Lovey to plaintiff for definite information as to the circumstances of the loan, written in October, 1907, plaintiff wrote to Mr. Lovey, regretting that no satisfactory settlement had been possible, and regretting the consequent necessity of the expense of a foreclosure suit, and informing him that the money was given to Spencer by his "personal check on my bank, with the exception of 3,500 francs, which he owed me at the time," and giving the items and dates, which corresponded with the last five items in Spencer's French bank book; the last item being that of 94,000 francs on October 18, 1907. Spencer produced in evidence a receipt from himself to plaintiff, which was as follows: "Paris le 18 Octobre, '07. Received from Edward C. Goldner ninety-four thousand francs, being part of the $21,000 note and mortgage to be executed by me on my return to San Francisco. Wm. Crane Spencer."

Spencer testified that he gave this receipt to plaintiff on October 18, 1907, when the 94,000 francs were loaned to him, and that plaintiff returned it to him with the mortgage when he sent the latter to be recorded. When introduced in evidence, it bore the indorsement: "Paid by note Nov. 15-07. Ed. C. Goldner." The genuineness of the signature of plaintiff to this was apparently not questioned, and Spencer testified that he received it from plaintiff so indorsed. Mr. Robinson, Spencer's attorney, testified that in January, 1909, plaintiff, who was in California from about October, 1908, to April, 1909, told him that he had a note and mortgage against Spencer and could not collect his money, and asked him what he could do; and that he (Robinson) told him that he could not act for him, because he was Spencer's attorney, and recommended to him three or four San Francisco attorneys, including Mr. Lovey.

No witness testified directly to anything in conflict with the foregoing. Opposed to it are only certain circumstances, which, respondent claims, warranted an inference on the part of the trial court to the effect that there was no consideration for the note and mortgage. In considering these it must be borne in mind that, by reason of certain facts that cannot be disputed, if, in fact, there was no consideration, plaintiff must have deliberately assisted in the fabrication of evidence, for the purpose of consummating a fraud on Spencer's creditors. That plaintiff accepted the note and mortgage from Spencer, that he indorsed Spencer's receipt of October 18, 1907, to him for 94,000 francs, "Paid by note, Nov. 15-07. Ed. C. Goldner," that he furnished to his attorney a written statement to the effect that he had loaned to Spencer the various sums stated therein, on the dates named, aggregating 105,000 francs, and that he directed the institution by his attorney of the foreclosure action, is absolutely established. These things cannot be reconciled with the idea of want of consideration, except upon the theory that he was actively engaged in a deliberate attempt to defraud. They fully corroborate Spencer in his testimony as to the borrowing of $21,000 from plaintiff, the agreement as to the giving of the note and mortgage therefor, and the claim that such note and mortgage were given in pursuance of such agreement.

The matters relied upon by respondent as warranting a conclusion on this point opposed to plaintiff's claim and to Spencer's direct testimony are all as consistent with honesty on the part of plaintiff as with fraud. Spencer was in need of money. The Curran suit was pending, having been commenced in April, 1907, but no answer was filed therein until February 5, 1908. Outside of his interest in the quarry company, Spencer had nothing, except his Placer county land and some $10,000 that he had just received from his stepfather's estate. These things were probably all known to plaintiff. Plaintiff advanced the money on Spencer's mere request, without any security being given, leaving it to Spencer to send him a note and mortgage on his return to America, and without taking any step to ascertain the condition of the title of the property proposed to be mortgaged. He may have known that the property was not worth to exceed $16,000. He subsequently trusted Spencer to record the mortgage. He subsequently, at the request of Spencer, executed two partial releases covering small portions of the mortgaged property, without receiving any consideration therefor. He never appeared as a witness in this proceeding.

Of course, some of these facts are not reconcilable with the idea that plaintiff, in his dealings with Spencer, was a cold and keen business man, careful to guard himself against loss. But it is to be borne in mind that he was a half-brother of Spencer; that the relations between plaintiff and Spencer had always been most friendly; and that Spencer had the greatest confidence in his rock quarry enterprise, and fully believed that he would make a great deal of money out of it, and had probably imbued plaintiff with the same confidence. Plaintiff was not dealing with a stranger, but with his half-brother, whom he desired to aid financially, and in whom he had every confidence. It would not be at all surprising, under the circumstances, assuming that he was financially well situated, which does not appear to be questioned, had he been willing to advance the money without any security whatever, and it certainly is not a very material circumstance, in view of the relations between the parties, that he was willing to trust Spencer to subsequently furnish him with such security as he had promised to give, and to see that the instrument furnishing such security was properly recorded. The same is true as to the fact that he was willing to take inadequate security for his loan, and also as to the fact that he was willing to execute the partial releases without consideration. All these things are entirely consistent, under the circumstances shown, with perfect honesty and good faith on his part. We are unable to see any sufficient foundation for a conclusion that this action was brought as the result of any collusion between plaintiff and Spencer. His failure to personally appear during the trial is not of any particular importance in view of the facts shown by the record.

[2] We have given these matters very careful consideration, and are unable to find anything therein that warrants the rejection of the clear and uncontradicted evidence as to the actual making of the loan of $21,000 by plaintiff to Spencer upon the promise by Spencer that he would give therefor the note and mortgage in suit here. Even if, as claimed by learned counsel for Curran, the situation was such as to throw the burden on plaintiff to show a valuable consideration for the note and mortgage, the evidence was such, in our opinion, as to compel a conclusion that these were the facts. The circumstances claimed to be opposed to this conclusion cannot be held to constitute such "satisfactory" evidence as justifies a verdict. They are at best "slight evidence." Code Civ. Proc. § 1835.

[3] What we have said applies with equal force to the matter of good faith on the part of plaintiff in the acceptance of the note and mortgage. There was nothing in the nature of evidence sufficient to support a conclusion that plaintiff had knowledge of any intent on the part of Spencer, in giving the mortgage, to thereby destroy, hinder, or defraud any other creditor, if, indeed, such intent did exist on the part of Spencer. If a valuable consideration for the note and mortgage was shown, the burden of showing plaintiff's knowledge of a fraudulent intent on the part of Spencer was on Curran. See Hart v. Church, 126 Cal. 481, 58 Pac. 910, 59 Pac. 296, 77 Am. St. Rep. 195; Roberts v. Burr, 133 Cal. 159, 67 Pac. 46. It may be freely conceded that, if there was satisfactory evidence to show that it was understood between the parties that the loan was in fact to be one without security, and that the mortgage was a mere device to protect the property from other claims for the sole benefit of Spencer, and was not to be enforced against him in any event, a different conclusion could be sustained. But certainly there is not satisfactory evidence of any such understanding. Looking at the evidence in the light most favorable to Curran, we have at most, in the circumstances we have above detailed, some slight evidence affording ground for vague surmise and suspicion as to the motives of the parties, in no degree measuring up to the standard provided by law for what is termed "satisfactory evidence."

[4] Something has been said about the matter of interest. The note called for interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, "compounding quarterly." In the mortgage it was declared that the same was given as security for the payment of $21,000 on November 15, 1908, "with interest thereon at the rate of eight per cent. per annum according to the terms and conditions of a certain promissory note of even date with the mortgage, in words and figures following, to wit;" but the note was not set forth in the mortgage. So far as the record shows, nothing was said at the time of the loan as to the rate of interest; but it does not appear from the record that any point was made in regard to interest, either in the pleadings or at the trial, except in so far as a waiver of interest in excess of 7 per cent. and the written opinions filed by the trial judge indicate that something was said about the matter in argument. At the time of the first submission of the case, April 7, 1910, plaintiff's attorney filed a disclaimer and waiver of all interest "in excess of seven per cent. (7%) per annum upon said note from the date of the execution thereof." The learned trial judge apparently was of the opinion that there was no agreement as to the amount of interest, and that consequently plaintiff was entitled to only 7 per cent. per annum; and, furthermore, that by reason of certain early decisions of this court (Taaffe v. Josephson, 7 Cal. 352; McKenty v. Gladwin, Hugg & Co., 10 Cal. 227), if plaintiff, with full knowledge that Spencer was largely indebted, knowingly and intentionally took a note calling for a larger rate of interest than he had agreed to accept, or to which he was entitled, the note and mortgage must be held void in toto. It is conceded by learned counsel for Curran that, in so far as the cases cited may be considered as holding that the acceptance by a creditor from a debtor known to be financially involved of an evidence of indebtedness calling for more than is due, either in principal or interest, is conclusive evidence of fraud, they have been overruled. At most such a fact may be evidence tending to show fraud, which is purely a question "of fact and not of law," except as otherwise provided in sections 3440 and 3442 of the Civil Code. Its importance as a circumstance tending to show fraud is necessarily dependent upon the facts of the particular case. In the case at bar, there is not the slightest basis in the facts we have set forth in regard to the matter of interest for a conclusion that there was any fraudulent intent on the part of anybody, and especially on the part of plaintiff. Assuming that nothing was said as to the rate of interest when the money was advanced, which is the most that is claimed by respondent, that matter was simply left to be provided for in the note and mortgage which Spencer agreed to give plaintiff on his return to San Francisco. Plaintiff had the right to assume that the note would provide for interest at a reasonable rate. It cannot be claimed that there was anything unreasonable about the rate of interest prescribed, especially in view of the law as it then was relative to the payment of taxes by the mortgagee. We are utterly at a loss to see how the acceptance by plaintiff of the note and mortgage containing the provision in regard to interest to which we have referred, where nothing had theretofore been agreed upon in regard to the rate, could warrant any inference of a fraudulent intent on his part with relation to the other creditors of Spencer.

From what we have said, it is apparent that our conclusion is that certain findings essential to support the judgment subordinating plaintiff's lien to the lien of Curran's judgment are without sufficient support in the evidence, and it is unnecessary to discuss other points made in the briefs.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

LAGUNITAS WATER CO. v. MARIN COUNTY WATER CO. et al.
(S. F. 5,778.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 16, 1912.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 158*)—INJUNCTION PENDENTE LITE—EFFECT.

As the granting of an injunction pendente lite is not a matter of right, but within the discretion of the court, and the court, in passing on such an application, is not bound to pass on the merits of the controversy, the denial of it is not a determination of anything as to the merits.

2. INJUNCTION (§ 137*)—INJUNCTION PENDENTE LITE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Where, in an action to establish riparian rights, the only showing of damage which would accrue to the plaintiff from the maintenance of a dam pending the suit was that a tenant of his property would be deprived of water for the use of his cattle, and the opposite parties showed that the plaintiff's tenant had sufficient water for that purpose, independent of the flow of water in the creek in which the riparian right was claimed, the refusal of the court to grant a temporary injunction was a proper exercise of its discretion.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Thos. J. Lennon, Judge.

Action by the Lagunitas Water Company against the Marin County Water Company and another. From an order denying an application for an injunction pendente lite, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. E. Shaw, for appellant. Jesse W. Lillenthal, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order denying its application for an injunction pendente lite and dismissing the order to show cause why it should not be issued.

The application for the order was heard upon the complaint and affidavits produced on both sides.

The complaint alleged that plaintiff is the owner of an undivided one-third interest in a tract of land, known as the Berry ranch, in Marin county (particularly described in the complaint), and that said tract is riparian to a natural water course, known as Lagunitas creek; that said creek rises upon the slope of Mt. Tamalpais, flows thence in a northerly direction into the Lagunitas reservoir owned by defendants, and thence through the premises of plaintiff for about seven miles; that the water of this creek at and above the easterly boundary line of the premises of plaintiff flows continuously during the year until the late dry season, when the waters thereof above said point sink and flow underground, coming to the surface again upon the premises of the plaintiff; that said creek, by itself and its tributaries, carries all the waters falling upon the watershed thereof east of the boundary line of the plaintiff, and all said waters falling upon said watershed are accustomed to flow in the channel of said Lagunitas creek in well-defined channels or tributaries thereof, which join said Lagunitas creek above where it enters the land of plaintiff at the eastern boundary thereof, and upon and through the said premises of plaintiff; that said defendants have no right to the waters of said Lagunitas creek, other than the right to impound a sufficient quantity of said waters to fill said reservoir, known as the Lagunitas reservoir, above referred to, which is situated near the headwaters of said creek; that defendants threaten to and will divert from said creek other waters than the said waters to which they are entitled, as aforesaid, unless restrained by decree of court. It is then alleged generally that plaintiff has been greatly damaged and will be irreparably injured by the diversion of said waters by defendants. A decree was asked establishing the right of plaintiff to the waters of said creek as a riparian owner, that defendants by final decree be perpetually enjoined from making such diversion or interfering with such right, and for a restraining order pendente lite.

On filing the complaint and an affidavit on behalf of plaintiff, an order to defendants to show cause why an injunction pendente lite should not issue was made. On the hearing thereof, affidavits were presented on behalf of the respective parties. Those on behalf of plaintiff tended to support the allegations of the complaint, and averred that the particular method of diversion contemplated and threatened by defendants was the construction of a dam to bedrock across the creek near the eastern boundary of the lands of plaintiff, for the purpose of impounding the waters of the creek, the effect of which construction, it was claimed in the affidavits, would be to prevent the flow of the water of the creek in its accustomed channel below the dam and on and through the premises of plaintiff.

The affidavits on behalf of defendants denied that the construction of the proposed dam was intended to or would divert any of the water of the Lagunitas creek or its tributaries, or other waters than storm or freshet waters; averred that the Lagunitas creek was not a living stream, except during the winter or freshet season, and that shortly after the cessation of rains said creek above the site of the proposed dam became wholly dry; denied that any water of the Lagunitas creek, at or above the point where the dam is proposed to be constructed, sinks or flows underground, or comes to the surface on the land of plaintiff, but in fact that such waters as come to the surface on said land come from living springs thereon, the waters of which flow into the Lagunitas below the proposed dam site; further averred that if the waters above the dam were impounded there would still be at all times a sufficient water supply from the feeders upon the Berry ranch to provide all the water for domestic, culinary, or irrigation purposes to which the owners thereof were entitled by virtue of their riparian rights.

In addition to affidavits of persons having official connection with the corporations plaintiff and defendant, there were also presented on behalf of either side the affidavits of expert civil and hydraulic engineers, who had examined the proposed dam site and the locality and water conditions surrounding it. Those offered by plaintiff supported its claim that the watershed above the proposed dam site drained into the channel of the Lagunitas, or into channels of streams tributary thereto, and sunk, flowed underground, and came again to the surface on the land of plaintiff, and that the construction of said proposed dam would cut off such flow through said lands; while those produced on the part of the defendants flatly denied the existence of any such conditions, or that the proposed dam could have that effect.

In addition, defendants offered in evidence a conveyance, made in 1871, by the predecessors in title of plaintiff to the defendant the Marin County Water Company of certain tracts of land, one of which, designated and described as "the Fish Gulch Tract," was conveyed in fee. The other tracts were conveyed for a term of 10 years, with the right, however, granted to said water company, for a period of 50 years, to divert and appropriate all waters flowing on the described tracts, or in gulches or creeks therein. It was asserted by defendants that the waters which they intended to impound by their dam did not include any waters, except such as flowed from the Fish gulch tract or catchment or surface waters on the tracts described in the above conveyance; and that as to those they were entitled to divert or impound them under the deed.

It is proper to say, as to this deed, appellant claimed that it did not convey the lands where defendants contemplate constructing their dam, nor confer any rights to divert the water at that point.

Upon a hearing, the only damage or injury which it was claimed plaintiff would sustain, unless defendants were restrained during the pendency of the action, was with respect to a tenant of plaintiff, who had rented and was in possession of a portion of the land of plaintiff for dairy purposes, and had about 80 head of cattle on the premises. It was averred, as to such tenant, that during the dry months of the year, from about July to December, he depended upon the waters of the Lagunitas creek flowing through the dairy premises for his stock; and that if the construction of the proposed dam was not restrained said tenant would be deprived of the use of said waters for such purpose. It was not claimed that any of the waters of the creek were being used, or ever had been used, to irrigate any of the lands of the plaintiff, or for any other purpose than watering cattle.

Respecting this claim, the showing on the part of defendants was that this tenant of plaintiff never at any time depended upon the waters of the Lagunitas creek flowing above the proposed dam site for watering stock, or for any other purpose; that four springs arose on the land of plaintiff, each running a large volume of water all the year around, which flows into the Lagunitas creek on the land of plaintiff below the proposed dam site, and furnishes, and always has furnished, more than sufficient water to supply the cattle of said tenant, or any cattle which the lands of plaintiff could maintain; that, in addition, two streams, flowing all the year around, the waters of which would not be impounded by the proposed dam of defendants, empty into the Lagunitas creek on the lands of plaintiff, either one of which is sufficient to supply water for all the cattle that could be maintained on the premises.

We refer to this evidence produced on both sides at the hearing for the preliminary injunction to show that the essential facts stated in the complaint, upon which plaintiff based his right of action, as well as all the material facts in support thereof contained in the moving affidavits, as well as the matter of the injury which, it was claimed, would be sustained by plaintiff during the pendency of the action, were denied and disputed by counter affidavits on the part of the defendants.

Counsel for appellant, on the assumption that the superior court, in denying the application for the temporary injunction, did so by deciding against appellant on the merits of the case, discusses at length the affidavits addressed to them on the hearing and the law respecting the right of a riparian owner to enjoin the threatened diversion of a natural water course, whether he has present use for the waters thereof or not, and aside from any question whether present injury may accrue to him thereby.

[1] But on the hearing of this motion it was not necessary for the superior court, in order to warrant a denial by it of the motion of plaintiff, to pass upon the merits of the case. The court may have concluded, as the essential facts were so clearly in dispute, and the right of plaintiff to any relief in doubt, under the showing on the preliminary hearing, that it would decline to grant any injunction at all until the trial on the merits. It is to be borne in mind that the matter from which this appeal is taken was an application solely for a temporary injunction pending the trial of the cause, on the ground that, unless it was so granted, plaintiff would suffer great and irreparable injury. But a preliminary injunction is not a matter of right. It is addressed to the discretion of the court. In denying it the court does not necessarily determine anything as to the merits of the main controversy. It may conclude that from the evidence produced on the application for a preliminary injunction it does not appear that, pending a trial, any possible injury can result to the plaintiff, and may decline to grant an injunction until after the trial of the cause.

[2] Here the only injury which it was claimed by plaintiff it would suffer pending the trial, unless the preliminary injunction was granted, was that a tenant of its property would be deprived of water for the use of his cattle. The showing on the part of the respondents was that no such injury would be suffered, as the plaintiff had an abundant supply of water on the ranch for that purpose, and independent of the flow of any water in the Lagunitas creek, or from its alleged tributaries. It must be assumed that the court found that this only claim of plaintiff to injury during the pendency of the trial was unfounded, and so declined to award any injunction until upon the final hearing. This it was clearly in the discretion of the court to do.

As said in Santa Cruz Ass'n v. Grant, 104 Cal. 309, 37 Pac. 1035: "The granting of a preliminary injunction is not a matter of right, but the application is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, which is to be exercised according to the circumstances of the particular case; and its action upon such application will not be reviewed in the appellate court, unless it shall clearly appear that there was an abuse of its discretion."

In that case the court quoted with approval the language of Chancellor Walworth from a case cited therein that: "There are many cases in which the complainant may be entitled to a perpetual injunction on the hearing, where it would be manifestly improper to grant an injunction in limine. The final injunction is, in many cases, matter of strict right, and granted as a necessary consequence of the decree made in the case. On the contrary, the preliminary injunction before answer is a matter resting altogether in the discretion of the court, and ought not to be granted, unless the injury is pressing and the delay dangerous."

As, under the evidence, the court was warranted in concluding that no injury could occur to plaintiff pending the trial on the merits, there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to grant the application of plaintiff.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

WRIGHT et al. v. BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS OF CITY OF LOS ANGE-LES et al. (L. A. 3,124.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 1, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1138*)—DETERMINATION AND DISPOSITION—ACADEMIC QUESTION.

Where, between the denial of one application for a temporary injunction to restrain a sale of lots to pay assessments for the widening of a street and the making of a second application for such an injunction, which was also denied, the sale of the property sought to be enjoined took place, an affirmance of the orders made was proper.

2. INJUNCTION (§ 12*)—OBJECTIONS TO RELIEF—INEFFECTIVENESS OF WRIT.

A court properly refused to grant a temporary injunction restraining the sale of lots to pay assessments for the widening of a city street, where, at the time of the making of the application therefor, the sale had already taken place.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Injunction by William Wright and others against the Board of Public Works of the City of Los Angeles and others. From orders denying successive motions for a temporary injunction, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Chase, Overton & Lyman, for appellants. John W. Shenk, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiffs appeal from two orders denying successive motions for a temporary injunction.

The plaintiffs are owners of various tracts of land upon which the authorities of the city of Los Angeles undertook, in attempted compliance with the provisions of the street opening act of 1903 (Stats. 1903, p. 376), to levy assessments to pay the damages and costs to be incurred in the widening of Sunset boulevard in said city. The complaint describes the several parcels of land affected, alleges that they are owned by the respective plaintiffs, and states the amount "pretended to be assessed" against each. It then alleges that on February 17, 1911, the plaintiffs herein, together with Constance D. Simpson, brought an action in the superior court of Los Angeles county against the defendants. The purpose of the action, which may be designated as the Simpson suit, was to obtain a decree that the proceedings and assessments under the ordinance for the opening and widening of Sunset boulevard, so far as they affected the properties of the plaintiffs, be declared void and be canceled, and that the defendants be enjoined from asserting any liens or claims against said properties by reason of said proceedings, and from executing deeds of plaintiffs' respective lots. On July 12, 1911, a judgment was entered, granting to plaintiffs in said Simpson suit the relief for which they had prayed. Notice of the entry of such judgment was duly served upon the defendants. Notwithstanding their knowledge of the decree, the defendant members of the board of works thereafter, in August and September, 1911, published a notice that they would, on Friday, September 15, 1911, sell the properties of plaintiffs for the delinquent assessments claimed under the aforesaid proceedings. It is alleged that such sales will be followed by certificates and deeds, which will cloud the plaintiffs' respective titles to their lots, and that such sales and the issuance of such certificates and deeds will be in violation of the injunction in the Simpson case. The prayer is for an injunction restraining the board of works from selling the said properties of plaintiff; that the judgment and decree heretofore rendered be "enforced and rendered effectual"; that the titles of respective plaintiffs be quieted, and the defendants enjoined from asserting any claims under the proceedings mentioned in the complaint.

The record contains a verified answer filed by the defendants. From the pleadings, and from the arguments contained in the briefs, it appears that the principal point of difference between the parties is the construction of the decree in the Simpson case. The contention of the plaintiff is that that decree adjudged to be void all of the proceedings looking to the widening of Sunset boulevard, while the defendants take the position that the decree went no further than to set aside so much of the proceedings as required the support of a due recording of the assessment and diagram; and that, upon a re-recording of these documents, the board of works was authorized to collect the assessments by taking anew the further statutory steps. There is no occasion to consider the soundness of these respective views of the merits of the controversy.

The complaint shows that the defendant board of works had given notice that they would sell the properties of plaintiffs on September 15, 1911. The complaint was filed, and the first application for a temporary injunction restraining such sale made on the same day. The application was denied. The court then issued its order, requiring the defendants to show cause on the 19th day of September why an injunction should not be issued, restraining the defendants from selling the properties described in the complaint. The answer was presented in response to said order to show cause. It alleges that on the 15th day of September, 1911, after the hearing of the first application, the board of works did offer for sale and sell all of the property advertised in the notice of delinquent sale.

[1] It appears, therefore, that the act sought to be restrained has been done since the making and denial of the first application; and that it had already been done at the time the order to show cause came on for hearing. Under these circumstances, neither order should be reversed.

[2] The second application was properly denied, regardless of its merit or want of merit in other respects, on the ground that a court of equity will not undertake to restrain the doing of an act, single and complete in its nature, that has already been performed. 22 Cyc. 759; Clark v. Willett, 35 Cal. 534; Coker v. Simpson, 7 Cal. 340; Gardner v. Stroeveer, 81 Cal. 148, 22 Pac. 483, 6 L. R. A. 90; Ball v. Kehl, 87 Cal. 505, 25 Pac. 679.

And, if it were conceded that an injunction against the threatened sale might or should have been granted when first applied for, on the day the complaint was filed, the order denying that motion should nevertheless be affirmed upon the showing that the sale has taken place since the denial of the order. Where a reversal would prove fruitless, the appellate court will not reverse the judgment or order appealed from. 3 Cyc. 188; Id. 420. The rule has been applied by this court to cases just like the one at bar—cases, that is to say, of an appeal from an order refusing an injunction pendente lite, where, after the order and before the disposition of the appeal, the act sought to be enjoined has been performed. Foster v. Smith, 115 Cal. 611, 47 Pac. 591; Bradley v. Voorsanger, 143 Cal. 214, 76 Pac. 1031. See, also, Horton v. City of Los Angeles, 119 Cal. 603, 51 Pac. 956; Weaver v. Reddy, 135 Cal. 430, 67 Pac. 683. In Foster v. Smith, the court said that: "To re-establish the restraining order, or to issue an injunction pendente lite, would be a vain and frivolous act. Any opinion that we might give upon the merits of the plaintiffs' application to the superior court would not, therefore, be followed by any action on the part of that court, and would not have any binding authority, or constitute an adjudication of the rights of the parties." The disposition of the present appeals from the orders denying a temporary injunction will not, of course, affect the trial of the cause on its merits, in so far as such trial may involve a demand for further relief than that sought by the application for injunction pendente lite. The plaintiffs may, for example, ultimately show that they are entitled to an injunction against the execution of deeds to the purchaser at the sale. But they did not, on the applications under review, ask for any such injunction, and we can, on these appeals, consider nothing more than their right to the injunction for which they applied, which was an injunction against the sale which has actually been made.

In some jurisdictions the courts, upon presentation of a state of facts like that here shown with reference to the first motion, affirm the judgment or order appealed from without consideration of the merits. In California, however, it seems to have been the practice to dismiss the appeal, upon the view that it presents no real controversy, but only a moot or academic question. This was the course followed in Foster v. Smith and in Bradley v. Voorsanger.

The appeal from the order of September 15, 1911, is dismissed. The order of September 19, 1911, is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. R. Hervey, Judge.

Action by Earl D. Gray against A. O. Bonnell, in which J. P. Magney intervenes. From judgment for plaintiff, the intervener appeals. Affirmed.

George Beebe, for appellant. Geo. E. Cryer, for respondent.

JAMES, J. On the 7th day of May, 1908, the intervener, who is the only appellant herein, entered into a contract with plaintiff and defendant Bonnell; the design of intervener being to obtain the services of Gray and Bonnell in the promotion of a corporation which was to be organized for the purpose of placing on the market a spring tire for use on automobiles and other vehicles, of which intervener was the inventor. The written agreement, after providing for the organization of the corporation, set forth terms under which Gray and Bonnell were to take charge of the selling of the shares of the capital stock of that corporation as fiscal agents thereof, and fixed their compensation of 50 per cent. of the amount to be received from such sales. As additional compensation to be received by Gray and Bonnell, the written agreement, signed by the three parties to this action, provided that 400,000 shares of stock, which were to be issued to Magney, should be placed in escrow until January 1, 1909, "or until such time as that the said company shall, through the sale of stock by parties of the second part [Gray and Bonnell], or through the conducting of its business, be on a good financial basis," and that Magney would transfer and assign 100,000 shares of such stock to Gray and Bonnell when the term of the escrow had expired. The corporation was duly organized, and Gray and Bonnell entered upon the work of making sales of its stock, and did sell a large number of its shares. In December, 1908, Bonnell made a written demand upon Magney, which recited the substance of the agreement respecting the delivery of the 100,000 shares of stock to Bonnell and Gray, and demanded that Magney comply with that agreement. Magney objected to releasing the stock from the escrow, but finally did deliver it to Bonnell, and entered into another agreement with Bonnell, whereby Bonnell on his own part, and also on the part of plaintiff, Gray, agreed, in consideration that Magney would deliver 50 shares of stock in addition to the 100,000, that the 100,000 shares of stock might remain in escrow for a further period of time, and until the 1st day of September, 1909. Gray was not a party to this agreement, and at the time it was made there were no unsettled accounts between himself and Bonnell, except that pertaining to this block of 100,000 shares of stock, of which each was entitled to receive one-half. Gray objected to this latter escrow agreement, and demanded of Bonnell that he deliver him the stock which he had received, and, upon that demand being met with a refusal, brought this action against Bonnell and the Spring Tire Company to obtain the stock to which he was entitled. This action was commenced on the 20th day of August, 1909. The Spring Tire Company made appearance, and, upon its application, the action was dismissed as to it, and Magney was allowed to file a complaint in intervention. In this complaint he alleged that Bonnell and Gray had failed to fulfill the obligations of the first contract made with them, and sought to enforce rescission thereof. On his behalf, it was also claimed that the contract made with Bonnell, requiring that the 100,000 shares of stock be held in escrow until the 1st day of September, 1909, was binding upon Gray, notwithstanding that he had not signed it; this claim being made under intervener's theory that Gray and Bonnell were copartners, and that the act of one was binding upon the other. All of the issues were found in favor of plaintiff, and the intervener appealed from the judgment.

[1] In our opinion, there is little merit in any of the contentions advanced on behalf of appellant. The question as to whether or not Gray and Bonnell had fulfilled the obligations of their contract in making sales of stock of the Spring Tire Company was determined affirmatively by the trial court in its findings, which were based upon sufficient evidence. Moreover, it seems clearly to appear that Magney estopped himself from contending that there was a lack of performance on the part of Gray and Bonnell when he issued the stock and made the new arrangement with Bonnell to have it held further in escrow. This second arrangement was based upon an entirely new and different consideration, to wit, that 50 shares of stock should be paid to Bonnell and Gray. In this second agreement, which was reduced to writing, there was no mention of any other consideration than the delivery of the 50 shares of stock; and it was provided that all of the escrow stock should be held only until the 1st day of September, 1909. So that it then appears that when Bonnell demanded of Magney that he deliver the 100,000 shares of stock, which was to be paid to Gray and Bonnell as part consideration for their efforts in making sales of the capital stock of the Spring Tire Company, Magney complied with that demand, but attempted, by the making of a new agreement, based upon a new consideration, to cause the stock to be held in escrow for an additional definite time, at the expiration of which it was to be issued at all events. Under these facts, no ground for rescission, attempted to be made long after this second alleged agreement was entered into, is shown. It may be noted, also, that the court found, and the evidence sustains the finding, that Magney was cognizant of the methods employed by Gray and Bonnell, and of the quantity of stock which they had effected a sale of at the time the 100,000 shares of stock was attempted to be escrowed under the second agreement.

[2] It was made clear by the evidence that, in so far as the dealings between Bonnell and Gray had partaken of the nature of partnership affairs, all of these matters had been adjusted, and no partnership accounts remained unsettled between the parties. The proportion which each was to receive of this 100,000 shares of stock, to wit, one-half each, had been determined upon, and the plaintiff was entitled, in his own right, to have that stock delivered to him. The agreement, whereby Bonnell attempted to bind Gray, which required that the stock so issued be held further in escrow, was without effect upon the latter, because he had given no consent thereto; and he made no claim, so far as appears in this action, to any part of the 50 shares of stock agreed by Magney to be delivered as a consideration of the second escrow agreement.

[3] Some argument is made by the intervenor that the judgment is ineffectual as to the Spring Tire Company, and not perfect in other respects as affecting the other parties to the action; but of such deficiency or imperfection he is not entitled to complain. The judgment as to him is in plain terms, and sufficiently explicit to enable plaintiff to exact performance thereunder.

The judgment is affirmed.

NATIONAL LUMBER CO. v. WICKLIFFE.
(Civ. 1,095.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 7, 1912. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 6, 1912.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 271*) — CONSTRUCTION OF PLEADING—PRESUMPTION.

It will be presumed, against one seeking to foreclose his lien for materials furnished the contractor, that the contract of the owner did not provide for payment of more than $1,000, and so, though not filed for record and not in writing, was not, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, void; his complaint not stating the contract price, and the amendment thereof, made after the sustaining of a demurrer specifically pointing out such defect, not attempting to cure that defect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 494-513; Dec. Dig. § 271.*]

2. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 271*)—ENFORCEMENT—COMPLAINT.

It appearing affirmatively elsewhere in the complaint of a materialman to foreclose his lien that the purchase was not made by the owner of the premises, but that the goods were sold and delivered to the contractor, the allegation therein that the contractor was acting as the agent for the owner and as such purchased the materials, with the preceding statement that there was never any written contract, or contract filed for record, will be considered not an attempt to allege a sale to the owner through an agent in fact; but as a statement of a conclusion, with reference to Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, providing that where the amount agreed to be paid by the owner exceeds $1,000, the contract, unless in writing and filed for record, shall be void, and materials furnished by all persons, except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 494-513; Dec. Dig. § 271.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 54*)—SEPARATE COUNTS—REpetition OF ALLEGATIONS.

An allegation in the first cause of action, in a complaint by a materialman to foreclose his lien, that there was money in the hands of the owner due the contractor at the time of the delivery of the stop notice and the filing of the lien, not being repeated in the second cause of action, forms no part of it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 118; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 934*)—PRESUMPTIONS.

All intendments being in favor of a judgment, it must be presumed that the contract and papers before the court were such as to justify the judgment for defendant.

5. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 121*)—MATERIALMEN—NOTICE.

A building contract having been valid, and the whole of the contract price having been paid under its terms before the filing of notice of lien or stop notice by one who furnished materials to the contractor, nothing remained in the owner's hands on which the notice of lien could operate, regardless of whether the building was completed 97 or 108 days before the filing of such notices, or of the effect which should be given Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, declaring an estoppel to assert a lien has not been filed in time if the owner of a building does not within a certain time after its completion file for record a notice of the completion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by the National Lumber Company against G. W. Wickliffe. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. L. Horton, for appellant. G. W. Wickliffe and P. M. Nash, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. The action is one to foreclose a mechanic's lien. The complaint originally set forth two causes of action. Plaintiff dismissed as to the first cause of action, and the case proceeded to trial upon the second. This alleged the ownership by defendant of a parcel of ground; that a contract was entered into between the owner and a certain corporation for the construction of a dwelling on the property for the sum of $——, under and by the terms of which said contractor agreed to furnish materials and labor and perform the contract; that the contractor purchased of plaintiff the materials mentioned in the complaint; that the same were sold to be used and were actually used in the construction of the house; that the house was completed on the 2d day of November, 1908, and no notice of completion has ever been filed; that on January 29, 1909, plaintiff filed its claim of lien, and on the 27th day of January, 1909, served upon the owner a stop notice under section 1184, Code of Civil Procedure. The answer denied the material allegations of the complaint, and upon the trial it was stipulated that the allegations of the complaint were true, except as to the labor done and materials furnished on the 2d of November, 1908, and of the date of the completion of the building. Upon these issues the court found in favor of defendant, and found that the building was in fact completed on the 22d of October, 1908, except for a certain lock for the front door and a certain lock for a sliding door which were furnished by plaintiff and put into said building on the 2d of November, 1908, at the request of defendant, in place of other locks placed therein prior to October 22d, which had also been furnished by plaintiff; that defendant took possession of said building and moved into the same on the 24th of October, 1908; that the changing of the locks on November 2d was the correction of a trivial imperfection in the work. There is evidence in the record tending to support these findings. The court found that plaintiff was not entitled to any lien against the property and gave judgment for defendant for costs. A motion for a new trial was filed, which was denied, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial, upon a bill of exceptions.

[1] It will be observed that the contract was entered into and all work connected with the construction of the building performed before the amendment to sections 1183 and 1184, Code of Civil Procedure (Laws 1911, p. 1313). As section 1183 stood at the time of this contract and work, no contract of $1,000 or under need be reduced to writing or recorded. To the original complaint a demurrer was filed, specifically pointing out the defect in not stating the contract price. The demurrer being sustained, plaintiff amended its complaint, but made no attempt to cure the defect, and the case proceeded to trial without any matter appearing in the complaint as to the amount of the original contract price, nor does such amount appear in the record. If therefore the contract was for $1,000 or under, which must be presumed under the rule for the construction of pleadings, it was valid, and the only rights possessed by laborers or materialmen was to cause the contract price to be applied to the payment of their demands. In Stockton Lumber Co. v. Schuler, 155 Cal. 412, 101 Pac. 308, it is said: "The lien, in the case of a valid contract, extends to the contract price, and such contract price is the limit of the liability which may be imposed upon the owner or his property."

[2] The second cause of action alleges that there never was any written contract, nor any contract filed for record, which is followed by the statement that the contractor was acting as the agent for the owner in the premises and as such agent purchased the materials set forth. Taking the whole allegation together, it is not an attempt to allege a sale by the plaintiff to the defendant through an agent in fact, but a statement of the condition arising by noncompliance with the statute with reference to the recordation of a written contract where such is required by section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, and the stipulation that the allegations of the complaint were true can be said to extend no further than that the contract was not in writing and was not recorded, but cannot be construed as an admission of an independent purchase by defendant, for it elsewhere appears affirmatively in the complaint that the purchase was not made by defendant, but that the goods were sold and delivered to the contractor.

[3] There is no allegation in the second cause of action that any sum was in the hands of the owner and due the contractor at the time the alleged stop notice was delivered or the lien was filed. We do find such allegations in the first cause of action, but they were not repeated and formed no part of the second. There was therefore nothing upon which the stop notice could have an effect, if the contract were a valid one.

[4] All intendments being in favor of a judgment, it must be concluded that the contract and papers before the court were such as to justify the court in its rendition of a judgment for the defendant, for the court finds, notwithstanding the failure to file for record, that defendant was entitled to a judgment. This judgment was warranted upon the theory that the contract was valid without recordation.

[5] If the contract were a valid one and the whole amount thereof paid under its terms before filing the notice of lien or stop notice, nothing remained in the owner's hands upon which the notice of lien could operate, regardless of the question of completion of the building, or the effect which should be given to section 1187.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that no facts showing the invalidity of the contract were either pleaded or proven, and the plaintiff's rights depend upon the fact whether or not the owner had any money in his possession belonging to the contractor at the time of the service of notice or filing of lien.

There being no claim in that regard, the judgment and order of the trial court should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 194*)—PRESENTATION BELOW—ANSWER TO AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSE.

Where the defendant in an action on a promissory note filed a cross-complaint to which the plaintiff demurred, and the case went to trial without the demurrer being ruled on or any answer to it being filed, he could not on appeal for the first time complain of the want of such answer; the want of a formal answer to an affirmative defense being waived where both parties treat such defense as denied.

Action by the Kern Valley Bank against Charles A. Koehn. From judgment for plaintiff and order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 157 Cal. 237, 107 Pac. 111.

E. L. Foster (E. J. Emmons, of counsel), for appellant. Geo. E. Whitaker, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover upon a promissory note. Judgment went for plaintiff in accordance with the verdict of a jury to which the issues were submitted for trial. Defendant appeals from the judgment and an order of the court denying his motion for a new trial.

The execution of the note was admitted. As an affirmative defense it was alleged the note was made without consideration, and that it was given in renewal of a former note made and executed by defendant to plaintiff, which first note at the time of executing the note herein involved had been paid by the transfer to the bank of certain personal property which, though transferred as a pledge to secure payment of said first note, was, in case defendant failed to pay the same at maturity, to be accepted by the bank in full payment and satisfaction of the indebtedness evidenced thereby. He made default in the payment thereof, and notwithstanding the alleged agreement he gave the new note herein sued upon which he says was requested by the bank as a matter of form only in order to balance its books. It is apparent from the verdict of the jury that it gave little weight to the meager evidence offered in support of these allegations.

Defendant with his answer filed a cross-complaint wherein, besides reiterating the affirmative defense set up in his answer, he asked to have a statement, whereby the plaintiff certified that the bank held certain personal property as security for the payment of the note in question, reformed so as to state that the bank had received the personal property in payment of said note. Plaintiff interposed a demurrer to the cross-complaint, and, as shown by the record, the parties went to trial without any ruling of the court thereon or the filing of any answer thereto. Appellant insists that, by reason of plaintiff's failure to file an answer thereto, the allegations of the cross-complaint should be deemed admitted. Plaintiff was not in default in not answering the cross-complaint for the reason that its demurrer was pending. Both parties, however, appear to have deemed the allegations of the cross-complaint in issue, and evidence touching the truth of the allegations was offered, without objection, as though there had been a formal denial of the same. Under these circumstances, appellant will not on appeal for the first time be permitted to raise the question of the want of an answer to the cross-complaint. Conant v. Jones, 3 Idaho (Hasb.) 606, 32 Pac. 250; Netcott v. Porter, 19 Kan. 131. The rule is well established that where both parties treat an affirmative defense as denied, the want of a formal answer thereto will be deemed waived.

An examination of the instructions given disclose no error which upon this record could have misled the jury to the prejudice of defendant.

The court properly excluded from evidence a letter of the bank wherein it was stated that it held certain personal property as collateral security for the payment of the note. The record discloses no theory upon which the statement could be deemed material or competent evidence.

The appeal is wholly without merit, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 110*)—RESERVATIONS FOR BENEFIT OF GRANTOR—CONVEYANCE FOR FUTURE SUPPORT.

Where a grantor conveyed all her property in consideration of the grantee's contract to support her during her lifetime, she had an interest in the property which was subject to execution on a judgment against her, at least in so far as the value of the property exceeded the value of the support already given; a conveyance of all one's property in consideration of future support being void and presumptively fraudulent as to existing creditors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. R. Hervey, Judge.

Action by William A. Baxter against J. A. Baxter and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant named appeals. Reversed.

Valentine & Newby, for appellant. Edw. F. Wehrle, for respondent.

SHAW, J. On March 9, 1906, one E. M. Baxter by deed conveyed all her property, consisting of certain real estate of the value of $5,000, to plaintiff herein; the consideration therefor being an agreement on the part of plaintiff to keep, maintain, and care for her during her lifetime. Upon the execution of the deed plaintiff entered upon the duties imposed upon him by his agreement. At the date of the transaction E. M. Baxter was indebted to J. A. Baxter in the sum of $669.83, for which sum, in an action instituted on October 17, 1906, a judgment was duly recorded against her. Thereafter, by virtue of an execution issued upon said judgment, the sheriff levied upon all interest of the judgment debtor in the real property so conveyed by her to plaintiff and advertised the same for sale to satisfy such execution. This action was brought to perpetually enjoin the sale of the property. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant J. A. Baxter appeals.

[1] It clearly appears that the effect of the conveyance was a transfer of the property to the use of the grantor, and since she possessed no other property out of which payment of the judgment so rendered could be enforced, she, in so far at least as the value of the property exceeded the value of the support theretofore given, had an interest therein subject to execution. As against existing creditors, one cannot transfer all his property in consideration of future support, and thus defeat the creditor in enforcing his claim. Under such circumstances, the law presumes the act to be done with fraudulent intent to hinder and delay the creditor in the collection of his debt. Harris v. Brink, 100 Iowa, 366, 69 N. W. 684, 62 Am. St. Rep. 578; Davidson v. Burke, 143 Ill. 139, 32 N. E. 514, 36 Am. St. Rep. 367; Sidensparker v. Sidensparker, 52 Me. 481, 83 Am. Dec. 527; Harting v. Jockers, 136 Ill. 627, 27 N. E. 188, 29 Am. St. Rep. 341.

[2] At the close of the evidence plaintiff, by leave of court, filed an amendment to his complaint wherein, among other matters pleaded by way of estoppel, it was alleged that defendant "agreed and consented that the plaintiff should take said property; that the same should be conveyed to him by said E. M. Baxter in consideration of such care and maintenance." This alleged fact, denied by the answer, tendered a material issue which, if found in favor of plaintiff and relied upon by him, would estop defendant from enforcing his claim against the property. The court, however, failed to make any finding thereon. As to other allegations, the court found: "That on said 9th day of March, 1906, and prior to the execution of the deed described in the complaint on file herein, wherein and whereby E. M. Baxter deeded, granted, bargained, sold, conveyed, and confirmed unto W. A. Baxter all the property described in the complaint, the defendant J. A. Baxter had knowledge and notice that the said E. M. Baxter contemplated and intended to convey said property to said W. A. Baxter, the plaintiff herein, in consideration of the plaintiff agreeing to care for and maintain the said E. M. Baxter for and during the term of her natural life, and said J. A. Baxter did not object to such conveyance of said property; that immediately after the execution of said deed, and before the plaintiff entered upon the performance of his agreement and contract to so maintain said E. M. Baxter, the defendant J. A. Baxter had notice and knowledge of the execution of said deed, for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned; that he, the said W. A. Baxter at no time prior to a few days before the commencement of that certain action brought in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, state of California, by the defendant J. A. Baxter against E. M. Baxter, being action No. 53,853 of said court, wherein a judgment was rendered on or about the 8th day of March, 1907, in favor of the defendant J. A. Baxter, had no notice or knowledge that the defendant J. A. Baxter had any claim against the said E. M. Baxter, or that the defendant J. A. Baxter made any claim that said E. M. Baxter was indebted to him, said J. A. Baxter, in any sum whatsoever; that plaintiff informed said J. A. Baxter of the execution and delivery of said deed on the day the same was executed and delivered, and the defendant J. A. Baxter made no objection of any kind or nature to the same; that plaintiff closed his business in the city of Monrovia, Cal., and then and there took charge of said E. M. Baxter and devoted the greater part of his time to her care; that it was impossible for plaintiff to care for said E. M. Baxter under the terms of his contract so executed with her without closing and discontinuing his said business in the city of Monrovia, Cal., aforesaid; that defendant J. A. Baxter had notice and knowledge of all of the foregoing facts; that the defendant J. A. Baxter did not at any time give plaintiff herein any notice of any claim against said E. M. Baxter until a few days before the commencement of that certain action brought by J. A. Baxter against said E. M. Baxter hereinbefore referred to; that plaintiff, relying upon said deed so made and executed by said E. M. Baxter, entered upon the performance of his said contract, and ever since said date has been and now is caring for and maintaining said E. M. Baxter; that plaintiff, prior to and before he had any notice or knowledge of any claim of said J. A. Baxter against said E. M. Baxter, had for many months cared for and maintained said E. M. Baxter and had disposed of and closed his said business to enable him to carry out the terms of said agreement so made between plaintiff and said E. M. Baxter for her care and maintenance."

The effect of an estoppel, since it denies the owner's right to assert his claim, is to transfer his property to another. Hence, in order to justify a court of equity in decreeing an estoppel, there must not only be some degree of turpitude in his conduct, but it must appear: "First, that the party making the admission by his declarations or conduct was apprised of the true state of his own title; second, that he made the admission with the express intention to deceive, or with such careless and culpable negligence as to amount to constructive fraud; third, that the other party was not only destitute of all knowledge of the true state of the title, but of the means of acquiring such knowledge; and, fourth, that he relied directly upon such admission, and will be injured by allowing its truth to be disproved." Boggs v. Merced M. Co., 14 Cal. 368. Measured by the rule thus laid down the findings disclose no facts upon which to predicate the claim that defendant is estopped from enforcing the collection of his debt against the property. All that appears therefrom is that, prior to the execution of the deed, defendant knew of the intention of E. M. Baxter to transfer the real estate to plaintiff in consideration of the latter's promise to support her for life, and that when informed of the execution of the deed he interposed no objection to the transaction; that at the time plaintiff did not know that defendant was a creditor of E. M. Baxter; and that defendant, with knowledge that plaintiff had entered upon the performance of his duties pursuant to the contract, did not acquaint him with the fact that he was a creditor of E. M. Baxter until a short time before instituting suit against her for the collection of the debt. There is nothing in the facts found to show any degree of turpitude in defendant's conduct.

[3] As a matter of law, plaintiff is presumed to have known the transaction was fraudulent as to existing creditors; hence it was his duty, since he had the means of acquiring such knowledge, to make inquiry and ascertain whether or not there were existing creditors. Neither is it made to appear that defendant knew that E. M. Baxter, his debtor, was divesting herself of title to all her estate. If she had other property sufficient to pay his debt, then such transfer was not a matter which concerned him. Harting v. Jockers, supra.

[4] Moreover, the findings clearly show that plaintiff did not rely upon the silence of defendant in failing to give him notice of the fact that he was a creditor of E. M. Baxter, but it is expressly stated that he relied upon the validity of the deed whereby he acquired the property. Since plaintiff relied upon the deed, rather than upon anything done or omitted to be done by defendant, and without which reliance there can be no estoppel, he cannot claim to have relied upon the doctrine of estoppel. Powell et al. v. Rogers, 105 Ill. 318. Certainly it cannot be said that a creditor of one who fraudulently transfers his property will, as against the fraudulent grantee, be estopped from asserting his claim because, having knowledge of the proposed transfer, he fails to act affirmatively and notify such grantee that he is a creditor.

The facts found are insufficient to constitute an estoppel against defendant, and the judgment and order are therefore reversed.

1. WILLS (§ 403*)—CONTEST—COSTS TO EXECUTOR—GOOD FAITH.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1720, which provides that the superior court may, in its discretion, order costs to be paid by any party to the proceedings or out of the assets of the estate, as justice may require, the discretion of the court, while it may be exercised in favor of an unsuccessful proponent of a will, should be exercised only in his favor where he has acted in good faith.

2. WILLS (§ 403*)—CONTEST—COSTS TO EXECUTOR.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1720, the superior court sitting in probate has no jurisdiction to make an order allowing expenses to an executor resisting the contest of the will, on application pending his appeal from a judgment denying probate of the will, since it is only upon a final judgment that the court can properly determine whether it would be justified in making the allowance.

Application to the Superior Court by Joseph Morcel, a nominated executor under the will of Therese Berthol, deceased, for an allowance of expenses incurred in resisting a contest against the probate of the will, prosecuted, after Morcel's death pending the application, by E. K. Taylor, as executor of his last will. From an order granting the application, Elsie Mousnier, administratrix of the estate of Therese Berthol, appeals. Reversed.

R. B. Tappan, for appellant. E. K. Taylor, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an appeal from an order allowing respondent's testate, who was one of the nominated executors under the last will of Therese Berthol, deceased, expenses incurred by such executor in resisting a contest against the probate of her will. Said nominated executor—Joseph Morcel—was made the principal beneficiary under the will and petitioned for its probate, whereupon a contest against the probate was filed by the daughter and only next of kin of deceased on the ground of alleged undue influence exercised by said Morcel upon the deceased to procure the execution of the will in his favor. The verdict of the jury on the trial of the contest was in favor of the contestant on that ground, and the judgment was entered denying probate of the will therefor. Thereafter the motion of said Morcel for a new trial being denied, he appealed therefrom and from the judgment. Subsequently, an administratrix of the estate of said Therese Berthol having been appointed, said Morcel applied to the superior court for an allowance out of her estate of his expenses incurred as nominated executor in the contest of the will on the ground that these expenditures were made in good faith. Pending this application, Morcel died, and respondent, as executor of his will, thereafter proceeded in the matter. Appellant, while admitting the expenditures in the sum claimed—$849.90—resisted the granting of the order, setting up in opposition thereto the verdict and subsisting judgment denying the probate of the will on the ground of undue influence of Morcel. The court granted the application and made the order from which this appeal is taken.

[1] The authority of the superior court sitting in probate to allow the costs and expenses of Morcel incurred in the contest of the will is based on section 1720 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as follows: "When it is not otherwise prescribed under this title the superior court * * * may, in its discretion order costs to be paid by any party to the proceedings or out of the assets of the estate as justice may require." While this provision of the Code places the matter of allowing costs and expenses within the discretionary power of the court, and permits it to be exercised in favor of an unsuccessful proponent of a will, still this discretionary power should be exercised only in his favor "as justice may require," where he has acted in good faith, and such discretion can be properly exercised only upon the final determination of the litigation.

[2] When the order here appealed from was made, there was no final determination of the controversy respecting which this allowance was claimed. It is only then that the court can properly determine whether it would be justified in making the allowance or not. In that respect the principle is declared in Estate of Yoell, 160 Cal. 741, 117 Pac. 1047, where there was under consideration an allowance for expenditures in the contest of a will, and where, in reversing the order, this court said: "The final determination of the litigation, consequently, must have a weight in influencing the court in the exercise of the discretion to award costs with which the law has vested it, and not until the final determination can that discretion be properly exercised."

In applying this principle, the merits of the application upon which an order purports to be based are not involved. Hence we make no discussion of them here. The court is simply without discretion to make any order until the final determination of the controversy. Under this view the superior court should have declined to entertain or act on the application in behalf of the nominated executor Morcel until the litigation was ended and the probate of the will finally allowed or rejected.

The order appealed from is reversed.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO
v. HYATT, Superintendent of Public Instruction. (S. F. 5,988.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 26, 1912.
Rehearing Denied Aug. 23, 1912.)

SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 19*)—AP-PORTIONMENT OF FUNDS ACCORDING TO SCHOOL ATTENDANCE—AUTHORITY OF STATE BOARD OF EDUCATION—STATUTES.

Pol. Code, § 1532, subd. 4, required the state superintendent of public instruction to apportion the school fund as provided by section 1858, which, as amended by St. 1911, p. 527, adding subdivision 5, provided that according to the number of teachers, calculating one teacher for every district having 35 units of average daily attendance, and defined such unit as the total number of days' attendance divided by the number of school days, and a school day as that part of a day or night in which one-twentieth of the work of a school month was performed. Pol. Code, § 1617, gave local school boards the same authority to prescribe rules as that possessed by the state board of education over the public schools of the state. Section 1697 declared 20 days, or 4 weeks of 5 days each, to be a school month. Section 1673 provided that no school should be in session more than six hours a day. Section 1663, subd. 2, required city or county boards to prescribe the course of study in day and evening schools. Sections 1543, 1664, 1665, 1771, and 1874 authorized such boards to prescribe and enforce a course of study and to amend or change it, and enumerated the branches to be taught in public schools. Section 1874 made it the duty of the state board to select text-books in such enumerated branches, to be used by the local boards in prescribing courses of study. And section 1861 provided that state school funds should be used only to pay salaries of teachers of the day and night elementary schools. The state board of education, empowered by Pol. Code, § 1521, to adopt rules for public schools not inconsistent with the laws of the state, adopted a rule that the minimum school day for schools sharing in state funds on a basis of average daily attendance should be four hours, each hour to be estimated as one-fourth of a day, which operated to cut down the apportionment to evening schools, in which the attendance averaged only two hours a day, to one-half the apportionment to day schools, averaging four to five hours a day. Held that, there being no statute expressly limiting the power of the state board or expressly conferring such power upon the local boards, the rule was valid as being within the general powers of the state board.

In Bank. Mandamus by the City and County of San Francisco against Edward Hyatt, Superintendent of Public Instruction of the State of California. Writ denied.

Percy V. Long, City Atty., and J. F. English, Asst. City Atty., for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John H. Riordan, and W. H. Cobb, for respondent. J. D. Fredericks, Dist. Atty. of Los Angeles County, and Byron C. Hanna, Deputy Dist. Atty. of Los Angeles County, amici curiæ.

LORIGAN, J. This is a petition for a writ of mandate, and involves particularly the validity of a rule of the state board of education providing a minimum of four hours as the attendance necessary in the elementary schools of this state to constitute a school day's work in the matter of the apportionment of the state school funds to the different school districts.

Preliminary to quoting the rule adopted by the board and as bearing on the question of its validity, certain sections of the Political Code must be referred to.

Section 1532 of that Code, subdivision 4 thereof, requires the state superintendent "to apportion the state school fund" and "in apportioning said fund he shall apportion to every county and to every city and county two hundred fifty dollars for every teacher determined and assigned to it on school census by the county or city and county school superintendent for the next preceding school year as required of the county or city and county school superintendent by the provisions of section 1858 of this Code, and after thus apportioning two hundred fifty dollars on teacher or census basis, he shall apportion the balance of the state school fund to the several counties or cities and counties according to their average daily attendance as shown by the reports of the county or city and county school superintendents for the next preceding year." This section 1858, referred to in said section 1532, as it stood prior to the session of the Legislature of 1911, read as follows: "The school superintendent of every county and city and county must apportion all state and county school moneys for the primary and grammar grades of his county or city and county as follows: (1) He must ascertain the number of teachers each school district is entitled to by calculating one teacher for every district having seventy or a less number of census children and one additional teacher for each additional seventy census children, or fraction of seventy not less than twenty census children, as shown by the next preceding census." Provision is further made that any moneys remaining after the apportionment on the census basis should be apportioned to the several districts in proportion to the average daily attendance for the preceding school year. This section was amended in 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 527), and as now in effect reads, as to the apportionment of all state and county school moneys by the school superintendent of every county and city and county for the elementary grades therein as follows: "(1) He must ascertain the number of teachers each school district is entitled to by calculating one teacher for every district having thirty-five or a less number of units of average daily attendance and one additional teacher for each additional thirty-five units of average daily attendance, or fraction of thirty-five not less than ten units of average daily attendance as shown by the annual school report of the school district for the next preceding school year; and two additional teachers shall be allowed to each district for every seven hundred units of average daily attendance," etc. At the same session a new subdivision was added to this section as follows: "(5) Units of average daily attendance wherever used in this section shall be construed to be the quotient arising from dividing the total number of days of pupils' attendance in the schools of the district by the number of days school was actually taught in the district. A school day is hereby construed and declared to be that portion of the calendar day or night in which school is maintained and in which one twentieth of the work of a school month may be performed. The attendance of pupils present less one fourth of any day shall not be counted for that school day and pupils present for one fourth of a day or for more than one fourth of a day shall be counted as present for one fourth of a day, one half of a day, three fourths of a day, or for a whole day, as the case may be."

Subsequent to the taking effect of these amendments to section 1858, the state board of education adopted the following rule, the validity of which is the main point in controversy: "The School Day: Computing Average Daily Attendance. The minimum school day for any school sharing in state funds on a basis of average daily attendance shall consist of not less than four hours of actual work and attendance exclusive of recesses. Each school day shall be divided into four approximately equal parts. One-fourth of a day's attendance shall consist of actual work and attendance for not less than one hour, exclusive of recesses; one half of a day's attendance shall consist of actual work and attendance for not less than two hours exclusive of recesses; three fourths of a day's attendance shall consist of actual work and attendance for not less than three hours, exclusive of recesses. In no event shall attendance by any individual on one calendar day be construed as more than one day's attendance. The word hour as used in this rule means a sixty minute hour. This rule shall govern the computation of average daily attendance in day and evening elementary and high schools, polytechnic, industrial, agricultural, and all other schools drawing state money on a basis of average daily attendance."

The powers of the state board of education as far as involved here are enumerated in section 1521 of the Political Code: "The powers and duties of the state board of education are as follows: (1) To adopt rules and regulations not inconsistent with the laws of the state for its own government and for the government of the public schools and district school libraries. * * *"

The substantial allegations of this petition for a writ of mandate are that, under the law, respondent state superintendent is required to give, and has always heretofore given, in computing the average daily attendance in elementary schools consisting of day and night schools, for the purpose of determining the annual apportionment of state school funds thereto, credit to the elementary night schools on an equal basis with the elementary day schools, making no discrimination between them; that he has calculated a night session of such night schools as being the equivalent of a day session for that purpose; that said respondent threatens and intends to now follow said rule of the state board of education fixing a minimum school day in making an apportionment of state funds to the elementary day and evening (night) schools; that by said rule the minimum for a school day is fixed at not less than four hours daily work and attendance; that the average attendance in evening elementary schools of the city and county of San Francisco and elsewhere in the state is, and necessarily will continue to be, an average period of two hours each night, while the average daily attendance in day elementary schools in said city and county and throughout the state is, and will continue to be, a period of from four to five hours; that under the rule adopted credit will only be given by said respondent for elementary work done in night schools in the various school districts upon the basis of one-half or less of the credit given to day elementary schools in said districts; and that the application of such rule to the apportionment would cut down the appropriation to which the elementary schools of the city and county of San Francisco claim they are entitled, to the extent of $16,759.

The claim of petitioner is that the state board of education had no authority to adopt the rule in question because under certain sections of the Political Code to be referred to, taken in connection with subdivision 5 of section 1858, it is asserted that the power to determine the length of time to constitute a minimum school day for the purpose of apportioning the school funds has been left exclusively to the local boards of education.

As a special basis in support of this position certain sections of the Political Code other than we have mentioned are relied on by petitioner. Section 1697 thereof declares that "a school month is construed and taken to be twenty days or four weeks of five days each, including legal holidays." Section 1663, subdivision 2, provides that "the county or city and county boards of education must, except in incorporated cities having boards of education, on or before the first day of July of each year, prescribe the course of study in and for each grade of the day and evening schools for the ensuing school year," and provisions of the city charter of the city of San Francisco are to the same effect. Section 1771 confers power on county boards of education "to prescribe and enforce in the public schools a course of study," and section 1543 requires the county superintendent of schools of each county "to enforce the course of study." Section 1673 provides as to the duration of school sessions that "no school must be continued in session more than six hours a day. * * *

Under these sections it is insisted by petitioner that, while the Legislature has fixed the maximum school day (by section 1673 just quoted) to be six hours, it has never established any minimum school day, but has left that to the local boards as incident to their right to determine the course of study; that authority to establish the course of study necessarily confers power on them to prescribe also the hours of study thereof—in effect to fix the minimum school day—and hence, when any local school board has determined what shall constitute a month's school work in said courses and has fixed the length of daily or nightly session in which one-twentieth of the school month work may be performed, such session, under subdivision 5 of section 1858, shall, for the purpose of apportioning school funds, be considered a school day's work, no matter what the hours less than the maximum may be which the local board has fixed; and that this authority cannot be interfered with by the state board of education under a rule making an average of four hours' daily attendance a minimum school day, with the result that in apportioning funds to the school districts the school work in the night schools, which necessarily cannot exceed two hours, shall only be credited with one-half the amount which is allowed for a day's work in a day school.

As against this claim, the position of respondent is that the authority to fix a course of study given the local boards of education confers no exclusive power upon them to prescribe whatever hours they see fit less than the maximum as constituting a minimum school day, and that subdivision 5 does not imply the existence of any such right, nor does it define of itself what shall constitute such school day. Hence it is claimed that as the local boards have not the authority asserted, and the Legislature has not specified in subdivision 5 of section 1858, what shall constitute a minimum school day, since it only defines a school day generally, it was the intention of the Legislature to leave the matter of fixing the length of the minimum school day session to the state board of education, particularly as it had theretofore declared what should constitute the maximum school day.

We are of the opinion from a consideration of the various sections referred to, particularly the later amendment of section 1858 which reflects the obvious intention of the Legislature, that the position of the respondent is correct.

It is apparent, we think, under the general power conferred on the state board of education "to adopt rules and regulations not inconsistent with the laws of this state * * * for the government of public schools," that it has the authority to define what shall constitute a minimum school day for any purpose, even for the apportionment of school funds, in the absence of any law defining it, or power elsewhere conferred to do so. The conference of this general power upon the state board of education is in harmony with the constitutional provision (article 9) requiring the adoption of one system of common schools which shall be applicable to all the common schools of the state, and the term "system" itself imports a unity of purpose, as well as an entirety of operation. Kennedy v. Miller, 97 Cal. 429, 32 Pac. 558. Aside from general legislation designed to secure this entirety of operation and with a view to promote it, power to do so is expressly conferred on the state board, and unless there is some law which otherwise governs, it would appear that as this rule fixing the minimum school day operates in the apportionment of the state school funds equally and uniformly throughout the state without discrimination, it is within the power of the state board to prescribe it.

If the rule adopted by it, in question here, is unauthorized it can be so only because, as contended by petitioner, the various sections of the Code upon which it relies, taken in connection with subdivision 5 of section 1858, confer exclusive power upon the local school boards of education to regulate the length of the school day for all purposes, and the existence of this power precludes the state board from attempting to exercise any authority upon the subject of the regulation for the apportionment of school funds. But certainly no section of the Code referred to by petitioner confers any such power on the local boards, or places any such limitation on the authority of the state board, nor impliedly requires any such construction.

Particular reliance is placed on those sections of the Political Code cited, which require the local boards to prescribe "the course of study" for each grade in the schools, and the argument is that the power to prescribe the course of study necessarily confers the power to determine the hours of daily or nightly session for the study thereof—therefore authority to determine the minimum school day. It is quite clear, however, what is meant by the "course of study" which these local boards shall prescribe through reference to section 1665 of the same Code, in which the various branches to be taught in the public schools and which shall constitute the course of study therein are specifically enumerated. The requirement that the local boards shall prescribe a course of study is a mandate that they shall establish a course which shall embrace the enumerated branches. While in doing so some measure of discretion is given to the local boards as to the extent of the course and authority also given them to amend or change it whenever they deem it necessary (section 1664, Pol. Code), this discretion is still to a degree controlled by the state board of education, as it is given the right and made its duty (section 1874, Pol. Code) to select the line of textbooks in these enumerated branches which must be used by the local boards in prescribing the course of study in the schools and the use of which the state board must enforce. In the section relied on, no power is expressly given to do anything else than to prescribe this course; nothing conferring on them the exclusive authority to fix the time or hours per day when any one of the prescribed branches shall be studied, or the length of the school day which shall be devoted to their study as a course. It may be conceded that, from the duty enjoined on the local boards to prescribe a course of study, it must logically follow that the local boards are authorized to determine the daily session for the study of such course; but still it does not legally follow that this amounts to an exclusive right to determine that this session shall constitute a minimum school day for all purposes under the school laws, or even confer exclusive right to determine what shall constitute a minimum school day for the study of the course in the schools where required. There is nothing inconsistent in requiring the local boards to prescribe a course of study and, on the other hand, empowering the state board of education to determine what shall constitute a minimum school day for its study. The Legislature in the first instance, in requiring the local boards to prescribe such a course, and using the same language now found in the sections, might have in addition declared what should constitute a minimum day for the study thereof. It would be the duty of the local boards thereunder to prescribe a course, the study of which should engage the minimum school day as so fixed. Only the same result would follow under the power conferred on the state board to do so and the exercise of it.

It may not be questioned but that, in the absence of any statute or rule of the state board on the subject, the local board could exercise the right to regulate the school day sessions in their respective cities or counties. This power exists, however, not by virtue of their right to prescribe a course of study, but under section 1617 of the Political Code, which gives them the same authority over the schools in their district that is conferred on the state board over the public school throughout the state, namely, "to prescribe and enforce rules * * * for the government of schools" within their districts. But the exercise of this power is subject to the control of the state board on that subject, because in this same section it is declared that such rules must be "not inconsistent with law or those prescribed by the state board of education." It is apparent from this section that, except as to those matters where express power is conferred on the local board to act exclusively, it was the intention of the Legislature to make their action, relative to public school matters, secondary and subsidiary to the control of the state board. Under the section last referred to, the local boards might fix the session of the schools in their district, and hence determine what should constitute a minimum school day therefor; but the power in that respect was subsidiary to that of the state board and subject to control and regulation by it at any time that it deemed it proper to act in the matter, and the regulation of the state board would abrogate any rule which might have been adopted by the local boards for a minimum school day, if in conflict with that prescribed by said board.

It is of no moment, in considering the power of the state board, that it had not deemed it necessary heretofore to exercise control over the local school boards in the matter of school sessions or to fix a minimum day therefor. It simply indicates that the public school system throughout the state, in the matter of daily sessions of schools as heretofore prevailing, was so established by the local boards as to render any rule of the state board on the subject unnecessary. In fact, as to such a session the state board has not undertaken now to interfere with its regulation by the local school authorities, but simply to define a minimum school day for the purpose of apportioning the school money under the new system of apportionment. Under the old system the apportionment was made on the basis of the number of census children in the school district, whether they actually attended the schools thereof or not, and the remaining money was apportioned on the basis of the average daily attendance, regardless of how long the pupils remained at the school session or how long a session of school was prescribed. The school day under that system was of no importance except to ascertain the average daily attendance for the purpose of distributing the surplus money after the apportionment on the census basis, and the length of the school session was of no importance for any purpose.

Under the new system provided for by the amendment to section 1858, making the "unit of average daily attendance" the exact basis of apportionment, the minimum school day became an important factor in calculating the apportionment, and, on the assumption that no such day had been fixed by the Legislature, or power vested elsewhere to determine it, the state board undertook to fix it. Having the general power to regulate for the public schools throughout the state, it could pass any rule or regulation for that purpose which it deemed necessary, unless constrained by some statutory provision. It cannot be said that the fixing of a minimum school day for the purpose of apportioning state school funds is not a proper part of the government of the public school system. Nor do we understand petitioner to claim that the powers conferred upon the state board are not comprehensive enough to embrace authority to fix a minimum school day for all purposes, including the apportionment of the school funds, in the absence of any legislation on the subject. The claim only is that the power has been exclusively conferred on the local boards, and the daily school session as fixed by them is recognized in subdivision 5 as a minimum school day for the purpose of apportioning the state school fund. This claim of exclusive power vested in the local boards, for the reasons given above, we deem untenable, and, unless there is some merit in the claim of petitioner under subdivision 5, we are satisfied that the state board, in the exercise of its paramount authority respecting the public schools of the state, had the right to adopt the rule in question declaring what should constitute a minimum school day.

As to subdivision 5 of section 1858: The purpose of adding this subdivision to the section will be readily observed. While this amended section made the "unit of average daily attendance" the basis of apportionment for the state funds, it did not define what was meant thereby, and subdivision 5 was added for that purpose. In so defining it, it is stated therein that "a school day is hereby construed and declared to be that portion of the calendar days or nights in which one-twentieth of the work of the school month may be performed." Petitioner contends that thereby the minimum school day was fixed; that the declared intention of the Legislature was to make the unit quantity of daily work as fixed by the local boards govern as to such day for the purpose of apportionment. But if this was its intention, certainly the language used does not clearly or definitely express it, or really express it at all. All that is declared is that a school day is that portion "in which one-twentieth of the work of the school month may be performed," and after the definition has been read the inquiry still presents itself, What is the minimum school day? There is nothing clear or determinative on the subject in the language used. The most that can be said for it is that it defines a school day generally. When the Legislature had occasion to define a maximum school day, it defined it plainly and on a basis of hours, and if it had intended to itself define a minimum school day in this subdivision 5, we would naturally expect to find it defined on a similar basis of time. If it was intended to depart from this standard previously employed and provide for some other, we would look to find some clear expression of that intention. In other words, if it was intended that the quantity of a school day's work, as it might be variously fixed by the different local boards throughout the state, should constitute a minimum school day, we would expect to find something definite to that effect. But we find in the subdivision nothing of the kind. It contains no expression of intention to define the minimum school day on the basis of quantity of daily work as fixed by the local school boards, or on such a basis at all; nor, on the other hand, does the language contain the slightest suggestion that time or hours of daily session be made the basis. It simply does not define the minimum school day at all, nor declare any standard—whether the unit quantity of work or the unit of time—whereby it shall be fixed. If it had intended to define a minimum day itself, or to declare that the unit quantity of daily work, as the local school boards throughout the state might variously determine the period for its daily performance, should constitute a minimum school day, or that the time or hours as the unit of the basis should not be employed for that purpose, it was a very easy thing for the Legislature to have plainly said so. An entire absence of any statutory declaration, or the presence of any language from which it can be reasonably inferred, strongly implies that it did not intend to declare anything on the subject of a minimum school day, or provide any standard under which it should be determined, but to leave the whole matter to that body which, in the absence of any direct legislation on the subject, was empowered to deal with it, namely, the state school board. It doubtless concluded that the board charged with the duty of regulating the public schools would be in a much better position than itself to regulate that subject. It was not necessary for the Legislature to provide all the details in its legislation on the new system of apportionment. Having legislated on that subject as far as it deemed reasonably practical, it could leave the matter of the length of daily sessions of the schools—or the fixing of the minimum day—to the discretion of the state board.

That its purpose was to do so we think is quite apparent when we consider the intention of the Legislature in establishing the new system of apportionment of the state funds. Under the old method, the apportionment thereof was based on the number of census children in the district, whether they attended the schools or not, and the surplus distributed on the basis of average daily attendance, independent of any consideration of the time the pupils spent in school. Under this system, in the more populous districts of the state, where census children attended private schools and did not attend the public schools, these children were, however, enumerated and entered into the basis upon which such districts, to that extent, unnecessarily participated in the state school fund, to the disadvantage of less populous districts and where the schools were better attended, while under the same system distribution of the surplus fund was made on a basis of average daily attendance, irrespective of the length of time the children spent at the daily sessions or how long those sessions lasted. Under the new system the basis of apportionment is radically changed, and but one basis provided for, namely, the unit of average daily attendance. The general intention of the Legislature was to establish a more definite and exact and apparently a more fair and equitable method or basis of apportionment than previously obtained; to apportion the funds to the schools in proportion as the necessary cost and expense of their maintenance as represented by the unit of average daily attendance. While providing generally a basis to attain that end, no standard by which the unit of attendance should be measured was fixed by the Legislature. As we have said, it was not necessary that it should legislate as to the details, for a board existed, empowered to further the intent by its separate action, and in making the rule in question the state board did so by establishing a minimum school day based upon time as the unit under which the apportionment should be made. There can be no question but that this standard was a proper and definite one. It is that which is generally employed in educational matters where, as pointed out by respondent, high school pupils are credited to the state university, and that university itself credits its students upon "units," signifying so many hours of work in the classroom during the term. This is a proper, adequate, and definite standard, capable of being sustained on various considerations, if it were necessary here to do so. In fact, the complaint is not that it is not a definite or proper standard, but that it is too definite as applied to the night schools. But definiteness and exactness as to all schools was the very matter which the Legislature contemplated; to remove under the new system the laxity which prevailed under the old, by precluding particular schools throughout the school districts or classes of schools therein which are maintained either daily or nightly for but one or two hours, or even a less period of session, from receiving the same apportionment as those conducted for longer hours or for the maximum time. While it is true that under the Constitution the day and night elementary schools are placed on an absolute equality, this, as far as the apportionment of school funds for their maintenance is concerned, only means that no discrimination should be made between them. This rule of the state board makes none. It operates equally and uniformly upon all schools upon the basis of average daily attendance calculated under the established minimum school day. On the theory of petitioner, as the day schools are conducted for at least four hours and night schools, admittedly, for not exceeding two, the former, in order to get the same apportionment as the latter, would be compelled to maintain a session of twice the length. This would create a decided lack of uniformity and constitute a discrimination in favor of the night as against the day schools which it was designed by the Legislature under the new system of apportionment to prevent, and which is effectually prevented under the rule of the state board.

The beneficence of night schools is unquestioned; but it is to be noted that they exist almost entirely in the large cities, are for the benefit particularly of the residents thereof, and, in the nature of things, as their sessions do not exceed two hours, the expense of their maintenance cannot equal that of the day schools having sessions of twice that length. Under section 1861 of the Political Code, "the state school fund must be used for no other purpose than the payment of the salaries of teachers of primary and grammar schools," being the day and evening elementary schools. The principal element in the expense of the maintenance of schools is the salary of teachers, to pay which the state fund must be devoted, and this expense is based on the duration of their employment. Necessarily, this cannot be the same as between teachers employed in the night and day schools, and, in the ordinary course of things, the teacher employed but one-half the time that another is employed receives but one-half the compensation.

Under these circumstances, we would hardly expect to find the Legislature in subdivision 5 declaring, either expressly or impliedly, that the unit quantity of school work prescribed to be daily or nightly performed by the local school board, no matter how limited its sessions for the performance thereof might be, should constitute a minimum school day for the purpose of equal apportionment of the school funds, with schools holding longer sessions or impliedly declaring against the fixing of the minimum school day on the time or hour basis.

It is of no moment, on the question of the authority of the state board to fix such school day for purposes of apportionment, to consider how the rule adopted has affected the efficient maintenance of the night schools. No such question is involved. It is simply one of power and authority of the board to make the regulation, and in the absence of any express legislation on the subject or authority vested in the local boards to determine it, we are satisfied that the state board had this authority and that the rule in question is valid.

The application for the writ is denied.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 269*)—ADMISSIBILITY—DECLARATIONS.

In an action to set aside a deed of a decedent for fraud, undue influence, and lack of mental capacity, declarations of the decedent some time before its execution with reference to the disposition he intended to make of his property was competent as bearing on his mental condition, but not to prove fraud or undue influence.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 501*)—OPINIONS—MENTAL CONDITION.

In an action involving the mental condition of a deceased person on a particular date, an intimate acquaintance may express his opinion of his mental condition when followed by a statement of the facts upon which his opinion is based tending to show his mental condition at that time, for months preceding, and on the day following the date in question.

4. NEW TRIAL (§ 108*)—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—MATERIALITY.

A new trial should not be granted for newly discovered evidence unless it is of such a character as to render a different result probable on the new trial.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 981*)—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—NEW TRIAL.

On a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, the trial court exercises a discretionary power which will not be interfered with except when manifest abuse is apparent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George E. Church, Judge.

Action by A. W. Lamb and others against Frederick G. Wilke. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. T. Morrow and A. R. T. Truex, for appellant. Joseph Scott, James L. Irwin, and Gray, Barker, Bowen, Allen, Van Dyke & Jutten, for respondents.

ALLEN, P. J. Action to set aside a deed executed by one James D. Watson, deceased, to appellant while deceased was of unsound mind and acting under undue influence of appellant. Plaintiffs and respondents are nephews and nieces of the deceased. The action was tried by the court, which finds all of the material allegations of the complaint to be true; that Watson was of the age of 76 years at the time of the execution of the deed and was of unsound mind and incompetent to make a contract; that at such time he did not possess a mind sufficiently clear and strong to enable him to know and understand the nature of the act in which he was then engaged, or to know and recollect those who were the natural objects of his bounty; that at the time of the execution of the deed he was sick and suffering from a disease causing his death two days thereafter; that he was upon his deathbed when the deed was signed; that deceased had no independent advice, but acted solely upon the inducement and advice of defendant; that no consideration was paid for the deed; that at the time of the conveyance of said property, and for some time prior thereto, Watson implicitly confided in and trusted defendant and wholly depended upon defendant's advice and counsel in matters of business, and a relation of trust and confidence existed between them; that said deed was delivered and recorded on the 24th day of January, 1908, the day succeeding the date of its execution and the day preceding the date of the death of the grantor; that defendant immediately took possession of the property; that Watson did not know the nature or consequence of his act and was incapable of understanding its force and effect at the time of the execution of the deed, and was not then of sound and disposing mind. The court set aside the deed, and from this judgment and an order denying a new trial defendant appeals.

[1] The principal specifications presented by appellant relate to the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings. No good purpose would be served by incorporating herein a résumé of the evidence. We think it sufficient to say that a careful examination of the entire record demonstrates that there was some competent evidence before the court justifying each and every finding by the court made. The cause was tried by a learned jurist, competent to weigh the testimony and consider the force and effect which should be given the statements of witnesses. These witnesses, whose statements were conflicting and irreconcilable, were before the trial court, and it determined to what statements credit was due, and it is not within the province of this court to weigh the testimony, thereby substituting its judgment for that of the trial court.

[2] Appellant claims prejudicial error on account of the action of the trial court in permitting the witness Lundregan to testify to conversations had with the deceased some time before the execution of the deed with reference to making a disposition of his property. It may be conceded, "where the testator was, beyond question, of sound mind, such statements were entitled to no weight at all, in the absence of proof of influence as to the very testamentary act." In re Mc-

Devitt, 95 Cal. 17, 30 Pac. 101. While such declarations are not admissible to prove undue influence or fraud charged, they are, however, admissible to prove the state of mind or mental capacity. One of the chief allegations, the thing most relied upon, was the matter of the grantor's soundness of mind at the time of the execution of the deed. As said in Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 593, 82 Pac. 256: "The external facts constituting the exercise of undue influence must be established by other evidence than the declarations of the testator. His declarations are incompetent to show either that the influence was exercised, or that it affected his actions, and are inadmissible, except as they may illustrate his mental state, and give a picture of the condition of his mind contemporaneous with the declarations themselves." See, also, In re Calkins, 112 Cal. 301, 44 Pac. 577. The whole narrative objected to went more toward establishing the mental condition of deceased than that of anything else, and, in so far as it tended to establish his mental condition, it was in our opinion, competent evidence.

[3] It is also claimed the court erred in permitting the witness Lundregan, who was shown to have long been a familiar and intimate acquaintance, to testify as to his opinion of the mental condition of deceased on the day preceding the execution of the deed. This opinion was followed by a statement of facts upon which such opinion was based, not only tending to show his mental condition on that day, but for months preceding and upon the day succeeding the execution of the deed. We think there was no error which intervened on account of the admission of such evidence.

[4, 5] It is finally claimed by appellant that the court erred in denying his motion for a new trial based upon affidavits disclosing newly discovered evidence. The most that can be said of these affidavits is that they tended to show that upon a new trial defendant would be able to establish that the statement of plaintiffs' chief witness as to the amount Watson received from a certain crop was untrue, and that the statements made by Watson to such witness as to the ownership of certain horses were untrue. Under the rule that newly discovered evidence should be of such character as to render a different result probable upon a new trial, and such question being one to be determined by the trial court in the exercise of a discretionary power, which power will not be interfered with except when manifest abuse is apparent (Oberlander v. Fixen & Co., 129 Cal. 692, 62 Pac. 254), we are unable, as said by the court in People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 392, 77 Pac. 176, to say "that it is clear that the proposed evidence would render a different result probable." We are of the opinion that the entire record develops evidence in support of the findings, that such findings are sufficient to support the judgment, and that no prejudicial error intervenes.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SCHENONE. (Cr. 180.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 17, 1912.)

1. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 16*)—LARCENY (§ 14*)—DISTINGUISHING ELEMENTS.

An instruction that the distinction between larceny and obtaining money by false pretenses turns on the question of title, that if, when the taking is consummated by the use of a trick, artifice, or device, the complaining witness being deceived by the act or representations of the defendant parts not only with the possession, but also with the title to his property, the offense is obtaining property by false pretenses, but if the complaining witness only parts, and only intends to part, with the possession of his property and not with the title, the offense is larceny, was correct.

2. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 16*)—LARCENY (§ 14*)—CONFIDENCE GAME—EVIDENCE.

Complainant trusted his money to defendant with the understanding that defendant and his confederate B. were each to contribute a like sum to a common fund to be used for the advantage of all. Neither defendant nor B. contributed anything to the enterprise, but retained complainant's money. Held that, until contributions had been made by defendant and B., the title to complainant's money remained in him and was the subject of larceny, and hence the withholding thereof constituted larceny and not false pretenses.

Manuel Schenone was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Webster & Webster and S. N. Blewett, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, for the People.

BURNETT, J. The defendant, having been convicted of grand larceny, appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The principal contentions of appellant are that the court erred in the matter of instructions and that the defendant was entitled to an acquittal for the reason that the offense, if any, was that of obtaining money by false pretenses, instead of grand larceny.

[1] Appellant concedes that "it would be very difficult for us to point out the specific particulars wherein the instructions prejudice the substantial rights of the defendant." As might be expected from this statement, we find no less difficulty in the premises.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r indexes

The point to which special attention is directed—that is, the importance of instructing the jury clearly in reference to the distinction between these two different offenses—received due consideration from the court. For instance, it was declared: "The distinction which the law makes between larceny and obtaining money by false pretenses turns on the question of title. If, when the taking is consummated by the use of trick, artifice, or device, the complaining witness, being deceived by the acts or representations of the defendant, parts not only with the possession, but also with the title to his property, the offense is that of obtaining property by false pretenses; but if the complaining witness only parted and intended only to part with the possession of his property, and not with the title, the offense is larceny." This proposition was somewhat elaborated in other instructions, and the jury were expressly charged that: "The burden is upon the prosecution in this case to prove the offense charged, and if the prosecution fails to prove that the defendant committed the crime of larceny, even though the evidence may tend to prove some other offense, you must find the defendant not guilty, and if you believe from the evidence that at the time the complaining witness, G. Saloni, parted with the possession of the $137, he also at the same time parted with the title to the same, although the same was induced by fraud, misrepresentation, or artifice on the part of the defendant, nevertheless I instruct you to acquit the defendant." Indeed, the jury were fully and correctly instructed upon every phase of the case necessary for their enlightenment, and no error was committed in refusing certain instructions proposed by the defendant.

[2] It is equally clear that the verdict finds support in the evidence. It was a reasonable inference from all the facts, as implied in the verdict, that the complaining witness did not intend, at the time of the transaction, to vest in the defendant the title to the money in question, and that it was the defendant's purpose at all times to obtain possession of the money by trick and device and afterwards appropriate it to his own use. The money was intrusted to the defendant with the understanding that he and his confederate, one Ballo, were each to contribute a like amount to the common fund to be used for the advantage of all. It is probably unnecessary to add that neither the defendant nor Ballo contributed anything to the common enterprise, and until they did so the title to the money remained in the prosecuting witness and was the subject of larceny. The principle governing such cases is fully discussed in People v. Delbos, 146 Cal. 737, 81 Pac. 131, and People v. Arnold, 17 Cal. App. 68, 118 Pac. 729, and we deem it unnecessary to add to what is therein stated.

The case here, in brief, is that of a slick swindler who, by means of cajolery, misrepresentations, and dalliance with an easy victim's weakness for liquor, secured, with the fraudulent intent of appropriating to his own use, the money of the prosecuting witness; the latter consenting to the change in its possession for a certain purpose that was never consummated and never intended by the defendant to be consummated. The proof of guilt is entirely satisfactory and the record should not be examined with a microscope to discover abstract error.

The fact is, though, that the defendant was legally and fairly tried, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by R. W. Martland against the Bekins Van & Storage Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified.

Wm. H. Chapman, for appellant. F. V. Meyers, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action in claim and delivery.

For a given rate the defendant orally agreed to carry and transfer the furniture and goods of the plaintiff from a certain place "to and within a dwelling house" on Fifth avenue, San Francisco. Defendant delivered and placed all the goods in said house, except a piano. As to that article, defendant transported it to the entrance of the place of delivery, but refused to deliver it until paid the amount of its charges, to wit, $28. At the time of such refusal, plaintiff questioned the correctness of the bill, but informed defendant's employés that he would pay it if they would perform the contract and place the piano within the house. Subsequently he renewed this offer in writing.

Under the provisions of section 3051 of the Civil Code, the defendant had a lien on the goods of plaintiff for the services rendered in the carriage thereof, dependent upon possession.

[1, 2] The trial court found that the defendant was not entitled to be paid until the piano was delivered within the house. This accords entirely with our view of the case. Under the attending circumstances, the plaintiff insisting, as he did, that the defendant place the piano in the house, and promising to pay upon the performance of such act, it was clearly the duty of defendant, we think, to comply with plaintiff's demand, and thus fully perform its contract, in order to be entitled to payment of its charges, or to the benefit of its lien as carrier. We do not believe that if the defendant had placed the piano in plaintiff's home, and then and there demanded payment, and payment was refused, this would have been such a delivery as to deprive it of the right of possession for the purpose of preserving its lien. It would have had the right at once to remove the piano, and, if prevented, it could have brought an action in claim and delivery. Bigelow v. Heaton, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 43; Id., 4 Denis (N. Y.) 496; 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 412.

In Bigelow v. Heaton, the defendant declined to pay the plaintiff's freight for carrying a cargo of flour until the flour should be delivered, but promised to pay all charges upon delivery. The flour was thereupon delivered; but defendant refused to pay, unless the plaintiff would make a certain deduction from his freight for pretended injuries to the flour, which he claimed were caused by the manner of delivery. The plaintiff disaffirmed the act of delivery and demanded restitution of the goods. This being refused, he brought an action of replevin. It was held that the action was maintainable.

[3] The finding of the court that the plaintiff became indebted to his counsel for bringing this action in the sum of $75, and for services in connection therewith, and that therefore he was entitled to damages in such sum, cannot be sustained. Counsel fees, not paid, cannot be recovered as damages by the prevailing party in an action of claim and delivery. In Murphy v. Mulgrew, 102 Cal. 547, 36 Pac. 857, 41 Am. St. Rep. 200, it was held that the giving of a note by the plaintiff to his attorney for his services in a claim and delivery action would not support a finding of money expended by plaintiff in pursuit of the property.

In Hays v. Windsor, 130 Cal. 230, 235, 62 Pac. 395, in a similar case, the court held the same way, strongly intimating that in no case of claim and delivery would the prevailing party be entitled to attorney's fees as damages incurred in the pursuit of the property.

The judgment is therefore modified by striking therefrom the provision awarding the sum of $75 as damages to the plaintiff, and, as thus modified, the judgment is affirmed, appellant to recover from respondent the costs of this appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by John Lapique against Charles Monroe, Judge, and others. From an order sustaining demurrers to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John Lapique, in pro. per. Henry T. Gage, W. I. Foley, E. J. Fleming, James S. Bennett, and D. K. Trask, for respondents.

ALLEN, P. J. The first cause of action is one for malicious prosecution; that is to say, the matters alleged approach more nearly a statement of a cause of action of that character than of any other. In substance, it is alleged that certain of defendants conspired together to charge and prosecute plaintiff for a public offense of which he alleges he is innocent. He was, however, bound over by the magistrate, tried by a jury, and convicted, which judgment was subsequently reversed by this court. A second cause of action is attempted to be stated under section 1505 of the Penal Code, which section provides a penalty if a judge, after proper application, refuses to grant an order for a writ of habeas corpus, or if the officer to whom it is directed refuses obedience thereto. Various persons, including the sheriff and his official bondsmen, and ministerial officers of the court are made parties to this second cause of action. The writ was issued, and no disobedience of same is made to appear. Another attempted cause of action is against the superior judge and officers of the court connected with his trial and conviction, claiming that he was improperly convicted by reason of perjury on the part of certain witnesses and improper conduct upon the part of the court and officers. Separate demurrers were interposed by all of the parties upon about every ground recognized by statute, and the same were sustained. Plaintiff not desiring to amend his complaint, judgment was entered for defendants, from which plaintiff appeals.

We see no error in the action of the trial court. The misjoinder of causes of action, as well as of parties defendant, is apparent, and the ambiguities and uncertainties pointed out by the demurrers are obvious. Aside from this, no cause of action was stated, or attempted to be stated, against a large number of demurring defendants.

Judgment affirmed.

1. TRUSTS (§ 365*)—ENFORCEMENT—DELAY—LACHES.

When for a great length of time a trustee treats the trust property as his own, with knowledge of the beneficiary, who makes no assertion of his conflicting claim, and the delay works a substantial prejudice to the trustee, or to third persons, and is unaccounted for, equity, acting independently of the statute of limitations, will refuse relief on the ground of laches.

2. TRUSTS (§ 365*)—ENFORCEMENT—DELAY—LACHES.

Prior to the year 1895, plaintiff intrusted intestate with various sums of money to be invested, the income to be divided equally between them. In that year an accounting was had, in which it was found that intestate owed plaintiff $5,000; whereupon it was agreed that the same should be reinvested on the same terms. Intestate never thereafter made an accounting, but acknowledged his holding of the trust funds for plaintiff, and told her that it was producing good returns, and that it would be for her benefit to allow the money to remain, which she did until after his death. Held, that plaintiff was not barred by laches from enforcing the payment of the trust fund from intestate's estate.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by J. T. Fleming against Frank Shay, administrator of the estate of William Hale, deceased. From a judgment entered on an order sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's amended complaint, he appeals. Reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer.

S. J. & H. J. Hankins, for appellant.
Frank W. Shay, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon an order sustaining a demurrer to an amended complaint.

Substantially, and so far as material, the allegations of the amended complaint are as follows: That prior to the year 1895 the plaintiff had intrusted to William Hale, for the purpose of investment, various sums of money, which, it was agreed, should be held by William Hale in trust, and the profits divided equally between them; that in said year an accounting was had, and upon such accounting it was agreed and determined that Hale at that time had in his hands, in trust for the use and benefit of plaintiff, the sum of $5,000, and that it was further agreed that this sum should remain in the hands of Hale, to be reinvested under the same conditions and trust as before, to wit, Hale to retain in trust for the benefit of plaintiff the $5,000 and one-half of all the profits arising out of or on account of said fund; "that from time to time since the said year of 1895, up to the time of the death of said William Hale, said William Hale, deceased, as trustee, acknowledged and stated to the said plaintiff that the said $5,000 held in trust by the said William Hale, deceased, for the use and benefit of said plaintiff, was invested in and used for various purchases of real property; that said $5,000 was producing good returns; and that the said trust fund of $5,000 and the one-half of all the profits accruing from the investments of said $5,000 would be paid over to the plaintiff herein whenever he (the said plaintiff) so demanded, but that it would be to the benefit of the said plaintiff if he (the said plaintiff) would allow the said money to remain in trust with the said William Hale, deceased, and to be used by said William Hale, deceased, and invested as aforesaid;" that by reason of the request of Hale plaintiff allowed the trust fund to remain in the latter's hands for the purpose just set forth; that Hale never repudiated said trust, and no demand was ever made on him by plaintiff for an accounting; and that the trust fund was in his hands at the time of his death in the year 1908; that the fund was so commingled with the moneys and property of Hale as to make it impossible for plaintiff to trace the fund; that plaintiff presented a claim against the estate of Hale, which was rejected. Thereupon the present action was brought.

A demurrer to the amended complaint was sustained, and, upon the plaintiff refusing to further amend, judgment was entered against him, from which this appeal is taken. The demurrer was based upon several grounds; but the only one relied on here by the respondent presents the question of whether or not the plaintiff was guilty of laches.

[1] When for a great length of time a trustee acts toward trust property as if it were his own, with knowledge of the beneficiary, who makes no assertion of his own conflicting claim, or when it appears that the long delay of the beneficiary in asserting his rights works a substantial prejudice to the trustee, or to third persons, and the delay is unaccounted for, equity, acting independently of the statute of limitations, will refuse to grant relief on the ground that the cestui que trust has been guilty of laches. 16 Cyc. 158, 167, 174; Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 245, 81 Pac. 516; 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 99 et seq.

[2] In the present case it does not appear that the trustee's estate has been injured by the delay, unless it be by his supervening death; nor does it appear that the trustee, with the knowledge of the plaintiff, or at all, handled or dealt with the funds in any way hostile to the claim of plaintiff; nor was the delay unexplained, for plaintiff alleges that the deceased never disavowed the trust, and from time to time up to his death acknowledged the same, and stated that the fund was producing a good profit, and that the whole sum due would be paid over on demand at any time. Hovey v. Bradbury, 112 Cal. 620, 44 Pac. 1077; 16 Cyc. 174; Cooney v. Glynn, 157 Cal. 583, 589, 108 Pac. 506; 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 111. The last authority cited lays down the rule in this regard in the following language: "When positive evidence exists, which proves that the defendant has all along recognized the plaintiff's right, delay on the part of plaintiff in bringing the suit will be excused."

"The continued acknowledgment," reads 16 Cyc. 174, "by the defendant of plaintiff's right is generally sufficient to account for delay by plaintiff in bringing suit to enforce it."

In the case of Peebles v. Reading, 8 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 484, 494, it was held that 14 years would not be a reasonable time to enforce a trust, unless the trust was kept up by declarations from time to time.

A similar declaration to the one here was considered in the case of Kleinclaus v. Dutard, supra; but there it appeared that Dutard for 35 years had "dealt with all the property acquired as absolutely his own. He carried on a produce and commission business in his own name. He invested and re-invested the profits thereof in his own name in all kinds of property, in several different states, accumulating a great fortune. He never recognized any other person as having any interest therein." For those and other reasons stated in the opinion, the court said that the complaint, taken as a whole, presented a case "where every act of the alleged trustee was openly and notoriously hostile to the claim of plaintiff;" that consequently no such relation between the parties was evidenced by the complaint as justified the plaintiff in disregarding those acts and relying upon any declaration of Dutard.

The complaint in the present case reveals nothing inconsistent with the alleged acknowledgment of the trust. We think the complaint does not show laches on the part of the plaintiff.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the trial court is directed to overrule the demurrer to the amended complaint.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment on the pleadings entered in favor of Theresa Scanlan, one of the defendants. The action springs from a statute entitled "An act to create a police relief, health and life insurance fund in the several counties, cities and counties, cities, and towns of the state," approved March 4, 1889, and amended March 31, 1891. Stats. 1889, p. 56; Stats. 1891, p. 287. Section 7 thereof provides: "Whenever any member of the police department of such * * * city * * * shall, after ten years of service, die from natural causes, then his widow or children, or if there be no widow or children, then his mother or unmarried sisters, shall be entitled to the sum of $1,000.00 from said fund."

On September 10, 1910, John P. Scanlan, who had been at that time a member of the police department of the city of Oakland for more than 10 years, died from natural causes. At the time of his death he left surviving him no widow, children, or mother, but left three sisters, one of whom, Theresa Scanlan, had never been married, and two of whom, Louise B. Edes and Mary O'Neill, were widows. With more detail these facts were set forth by the plaintiffs in a complaint against the defendants, demanding that they interplead, and both sides submitted the case for judgment on that complaint. The question presented for solution is: Were the widowed sisters of the deceased unmarried sisters? Appellants contending that they were, and respondent taking the view, as did the trial court, that the word "unmarried," as used in the statute, means never having been married.

This act making provision, as it does, for those dependent and near and dear to police officers, is intended to provide a reward for long, courageous, and faithful performance of duty. A widowed sister is equally close to a brother as one who has never entered the state of matrimony, and the common experience of mankind teaches us that there is little difference, if any, as to their necessities and ability to earn a living. Hence it would seem that the Legislature intended to make no distinction between them. No such difference as is here contended for by respondent was held tenable in the case of In re Will of Kaufman, 131 N. Y. 620, 30 N. E. 242, 15 L. R. A. 292, when the court, passing on a statute providing that "a will executed by an unmarried woman shall be deemed revoked by her subsequent marriage," held that this provision was not restricted in its application to women who have never been married; the court saying: "The unmarried woman referred to by the statute must be defined according to that rule of statutory construction which requires that the words used in legal enactments shall be understood and taken in their ordinary and familiar significance. So read, the unmarried woman of the statute is the woman who is not in a state of marriage. That the Legislature could have had any other idea is both inconceivable and unreasonable."

In the case of Est. of Conway, 181 Pa. 156, 37 Atl. 204, the testator gave his residuary estate to his "spinster or unmarried nieces." Six of his nieces had never been married, and two of them were widows. While the court held that the word "or" was used conjunctively, and that therefore both classes of nieces were entitled to share in the residuary estate, in the course of the opinion the court said: "The spinsters and widows stood in the same relation to the testator; their actual condition was that of single or unmarried women, and no reason for discriminating between them appears in the will or in the circumstances presented by the case. This construction relieves the testator * * * from an arbitrary discrimination between those standing in the same degree of relationship to him, and works equality in the distribution of the estate."

So a divorced daughter was held to be an "unmarried daughter," and protected in her homestead rights after the death of her parents. Anderson v. McGee (Tex. Civ. App.) 130 S. W. 1040, 1043.

There is a line of cases in conflict with those just adverted to, in which the term is held to mean, as contended by respondent, "never having been married." 39 Cyc. 837. But it must be conceded that slight circumstances will be sufficient in any case to give the word its other meaning of not having had a husband or wife at the time in question. Peters v. Balke, 170 Ill. 304, 312, 48 N. E. 1012; Muller v. Balke, 167 Ill. 154, 47 N. E. 355; In re Oakley, 67 App. Div. 493, 74 N. Y. Supp. 206; Frail v. Carstairs, 187 Ill. 310, 58 N. E. 401; 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 347.

Section 56 of the Civil Code provides that "any unmarried male of the age of eighteen years * * * and any unmarried female of the age of 15 years, etc., are capable of consenting to * * * marriage." Section 1300 of the same Code, prior to the amendment of 1905, provided that a will executed by an unmarried woman shall be deemed revoked on her subsequent marriage. * * * In neither of these instances did the Legislature, by the word "unmarried," intend to designate only one who had never entered the state of matrimony; and we are aware of no instance where the Legislature in this state has employed the term in its narrow sense.

No reason suggests itself why the lawmaking power should have intended to prefer one class of sisters to the other; and, as the Legislature has on other occasions used the word to mean not being married at the particular time, we feel justified in so construing it in this act.

The judgment is reversed.

Henshaw and Melvin, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Application for writ of mandamus by Martin Whalen and others against Frank H. Smith, Judge of the Superior Court of San Joaquin County. Granted.

A. H. Carpenter, for petitioners. Max Crimm, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is a proceeding to compel the defendant, as judge of the superior court, to render judgment in the matter of the action to determine heirship in the estate of George Roach, deceased, entitled "Martin Whalen et al. v. Joshua B. Webster et al.," in accordance with the decision of this court on appeal therein, as reported in 159 Cal. 260, 113 Pac. 373, and without taking further evidence upon the issue as to the number of surviving children of Thomas Roach, a deceased brother of said George Roach.

The contention of the petitioners is that the appeal in Whalen v. Webster, supra, was from a part only of the judgment in the proceeding—a part which presented but one question, namely, whether the language of the will of George Roach gave to the descendants of his brothers and sisters one-half of his estate or only one-fourth thereof; that all other matters determined by the judgment remained unaffected, and are finally adjudicated, and, hence, that this court on said appeal had no jurisdiction to reverse the whole judgment, or any part of it, except the part appealed from; and that the mandate of reversal, although general in terms, can apply only to the part appealed from. And, further, they claim that, even if the Supreme Court had jurisdiction to reverse the entire judgment on appeal from a part only, yet, in view of the record in the case, the nature of the proceeding, the judgment rendered, and the narrow question presented by the appeal, the general mandate should not be construed to apply to the whole judgment in the proceeding below, but only to that part from which the appeal was taken.

[1] There are doubtless cases of appeals from a part of a judgment where the part appealed from is so interwoven and connected with the remainder, or so dependent thereon, that the appeal from a part of it affects the other parts, or involves a consideration of the whole, and is really an appeal from the whole, and if a reversal is ordered it should extend to the entire judgment. The appellate court, in such cases, must have power to do that which justice requires, and may extend its reversal as far as may be deemed necessary to accomplish that end. The Code provides that a party may appeal

WHALEN et al. v. SMITH, Judge. (S. F. 6,018.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1180*)—APPEAL FROM PART OF JUDGMENT—REVERSAL—EFFECT AS TO PART NOT APPEALED FROM.

Where an appeal is taken from a specific part of a judgment, as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 940, a reversal would ordinarily leave the parts of the judgment not appealed from unaffected, unless the part appealed from is so interwoven with the remainder, or so dependent thereon, that the appeal from part of it affects the other parts, or involves a consideration of the whole, so as in effect to amount to an appeal from the whole judgment, and if a reversal is ordered it would extend to the entire judgment.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1180*)—PART OF JUDGMENT—REVERSAL—EFFECT.

Plaintiffs, prior to the distribution of an estate, instituted a proceeding authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 940, to determine heirship, the ownership of decedent's estate, the interest of each respective claimant, and the persons entitled to distribution. The petition presented two issues: First, that decedent had only one brother and one sister, both of whom were dead, and that plaintiffs were the only descendants; and, second, that, as such, they were entitled to one-half of the estate under the will. The heirs and successors of decedent's widow denied that plaintiffs were the descendants of the brother and sister, and claimed that they, as heirs and successors of the widow, were entitled to succeed to three-fourths of the estate. The judgment found for plaintiffs on the first issue, but held that they were only entitled to one-fourth of the estate, and that certain of the defendants were entitled to the remaining three-fourths. From this portion of the judgment only, plaintiffs appealed, and, the court holding that plaintiffs were entitled to one-half of the estate, the judgment was reversed generally. Held, that the issue on which the judgment was reversed was separable from the issue determined in plaintiffs' favor, from which no from a specific part of a judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 940. Ordinarily such an appeal would leave the parts not appealed from unaffected, and it would logically follow that such unaffected parts must be deemed final, being a final judgment of the facts and rights which they determine. The decisions are to the effect that upon such an appeal, where the parts not appealed from are not so intimately connected with the part appealed from that a reversal of that part would require a reconsideration of the whole case in the court below, the court upon such partial appeal can inquire only with respect to the portion appealed from. Thus, in Early v. Mannix, 15 Cal. 150, it was said that a plaintiff in forcible entry could appeal from an order denying his motion for treble damages and, in the meantime, enforce his judgment for restitution of the premises. In Pacific Mutual L. I. Co. v. Fisher, 106 Cal. 237, 39 Pac. 758, it was said that the Supreme Court is not at liberty to review a part of a judgment which is not appealed from. In Estate of Burdick, 112 Cal. 391, 44 Pac. 734, the court below made a decree, upon the executor's petition, settling his final account and making distribution of the estate. He appealed from all of the decree, except the part thereof settling his final account. Upon the appeal he applied to review the order settling the final account; but the court refused to consider the question of its accuracy, saying: "We must not interfere with it. To attempt to do so would be an arbitrary proceeding without authority." In Ricketson v. Richardson, 26 Cal. 154, there were several defendants, and one alone appealed. A reversal as to all of the defendants was asked. The error consisted of a defective service of summons and affected the appellant only. A reversal as to the other defendants was refused; the court saying that it was bound to presume that there was no error as to them, since they had not taken any appeal. In Kelsey v. Western, 2 N. Y. 505, the court said: "It is well settled that only that part of a decree which is appealed from is brought before the appellate court for review." In Bush v. Mitchell, 28 Or. 92, 41 Pac. 155, the court referring to an appeal from a part of a judgment, quoted the following language from Shook v. Colohan, 12 Or. 243, 6 Pac. 503: "The trial of the suit anew would be confined to a trial of the case affecting the part of the decree specified in the notice of appeal." In that state the appellate court had power to try the suit anew. The following cases recognize and apply the general principle that an appeal from a distinct and independent part of a judgment does not bring up the other parts for review in the appellate court, and that a reversal of the part appealed from does not affect the portions not dependent thereon, but that they will stand as final adjudications: Ikerd v. Postlewhaite, 34 La. Ann. 1235; Nelson v.

Hubbard, 13 Ark. 253; Scutt's Appeal, 46 Conn. 38; Ervin v. Collier, 3 Mont. 189; Hess v. Winder, 34 Cal. 270; Sands v. Codwise, 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 602, 4 Am. Dec. 305; In re Davis' Estate, 149 N. Y. 548, 44 N. E. 185; Leavison v. Harris (Ky.) 14 S. W. 343; Meadow, etc., Co. v. Dodds, 6 Nev. 261; Robertson v. Bullions, 11 N. Y. 245; Moerchen v. Stoll, 48 Wis. 307, 4 N. W. 352.

[2] This principle is decisive of the case. If the decree appealed from in Whalen v. Webster had been a decree distributing the estate, it might plausibly be argued that the distribution was the final judgment, and that the decision as to the persons who are the heirs at law was a mere finding of fact, upon which the final judgment followed as matter of law, in which case a general order of reversal would open the whole matter for a new trial as to the facts. But that proceeding was instituted under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This section provides a special proceeding for the purpose of ascertaining and determining, in advance of distribution, the persons who have succeeded to the estate and the portions inherited by or devised to each of them. Upon the trial thereof, the court must "determine the heirship to said deceased, the ownership of his estate, and the interest of each respective claimant thereto or therein, and persons entitled to distribution thereof." No other judgment is to be rendered, and no disposition whatever is to be made of the estate. It is a determination, first, of the persons entitled as heirs, devisees, or legatees, or as their successors, if any have died; and, second, the interest of each one in the estate of the decedent.

The will of George Roach gave an interest in his estate, after the death of his wife, to be equally divided among his brothers and sisters or their descendants. The petition of Whalen and others, plaintiffs in the proceeding, alleged: First, that the decedent had only one brother and one sister, both of whom were dead, and that plaintiffs were the only descendants; and, second, that, as such, they were entitled to one-half of the estate under the will. The heirs and successors of the widow of the decedent appeared and answered, denying that plaintiffs were descendants of the brother and sister, and claiming that they, as heirs and successors of the widow, were entitled to succeed to three-fourths of the estate. The judgment therein declared, first, that the plaintiffs were the devisees and heirs at law of Roach, the descendants of his brothers and sisters referred to in his will and the persons entitled to take as devisees under his will; second, that each of them was entitled to a specific interest, the aggregate of all of them being only one-fourth of the estate; and, third, that certain named defendants, as successors of the widow, were entitled to the remaining three-fourths. There is nothing in the record to indicate that there was any claim that there were other descendants of the brothers and sisters. The principal dispute was upon the question of law whether the fourth clause of the will gave the plaintiffs one-half of the estate or only one-fourth thereof. The plaintiffs appeal only from that part of the judgment which declared that they were entitled to take only one-fourth, and that certain defendants were entitled to three-fourths of the estate. No appeal was taken from the part declaring that the plaintiffs were persons entitled, as descendants of the brother and sister, to take as devisees under the will. The question whether or not said brother and sister left other descendants, and whether or not there were other brothers and sisters, was in effect determined in the negative by the judgment. The plaintiffs were satisfied with that determination, no one appeared to dispute or question it, and its accuracy was not reviewed, considered, or discussed by this court in its opinion on the appeal; nor was it presented for review by the record. The only question discussed or decided was whether the fourth clause disposed of one-half of the estate or one-fourth thereof. The decision was that it gave one-half, and the judgment on that subject was accordingly reversed. The mandate did not go into specific particulars, but consisted simply of the words, "The judgment is reversed." The part of the judgment appealed from determined no question of law, except the proper construction of the will. No question of fact was involved in the appeal. The determination of the construction of the will did not require any inquiry concerning the persons who were entitled as members of the class described as descendants of the brothers and sisters of the decedent. The court was therefore without authority to consider the latter question, and it did not make any attempt to do so. In view of these considerations, the words of the mandate should be understood and construed to refer only to the part of the judgment appealed from—the part which the Supreme Court had jurisdiction to review—and to reverse that part only, without affecting the other parts not specified in the notice. It follows that the court below has no authority to retry the question whether there were other descendants of the brothers and sisters than those included in the decree previously rendered. The decision left no matter of fact to be determined, and the only duty of the court below upon the going down of the remittitur was to enter judgment in the proceeding in accordance with the facts previously found and with the decision of the Supreme Court on appeal.

It is therefore ordered by the court that a writ of mandate issue, directing the superior court of San Joaquin county to enter judgment in the proceeding of Whalen v. Webster upon the facts found in accordance with the opinion of the Supreme Court, and without proceeding to retry any issues of fact determined upon the former hearing in that court.

HENSHAW, J. I dissent. The power of this court to reverse the whole of a judgment, when a part only has been appealed from, is conceded by the prevailing opinion to exist.

The judgment delivered by this court in Whalen v. Webster, 159 Cal. 260, 113 Pac. 373, is in the following language, "The judgment is reversed." Language so plain and so free from ambiguity neither requires explanation nor permits construction. It either means what it says, or it means nothing. It follows, therefore (the power of the court so to do being conceded), that this court deliberately reversed, not a part, but the whole, of the judgment appealed from; for, as is said in Glassell v. Hansen, 149 Cal. 511, 87 Pac. 200, where a similar question was presented: "In reversing the case, this court might have directed what issues should again be tried, and what should be deemed finally settled by the first trial; however, it did not do so, and the judgment was merely in the general terms, 'The judgment and order are reversed.' This clearly left the whole case to be tried anew, as if it had not been tried before. Falkner v. Hendy, 107 Cal. 54 [40 Pac. 21, 386]." In Cowdery v. London, etc., Bank, 139 Cal. 298, 73 Pac. 196, 96 Am. St. Rep. 115, this court, in effect, refused to put any construction upon a judgment such as the one here under consideration, or to attempt to modify its plain meaning in any way. The judgment of this court in the Cowdery Case was: "The judgment * * * is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions that the trial court enter judgment in accordance with the views here expressed." Says this court: "The legal effect of the order of the Supreme Court was to reverse and vacate the judgment, and not merely to modify it. Upon a decision of the Supreme Court that there was material error in the action of the court below, that court may direct the character of the subsequent proceedings in the lower court, and its mandate will vary according to its views as to the proper course to be pursued. It may conclude not to reverse the judgment, but to modify it, by eliminating some portion, or by adding something to it, leaving the remaining part of the judgment below to stand affirmed and in full force and effect from the date of its original entry or rendition; or it may reverse the judgment, which means to entirely vacate it, and may remand the cause for a new trial; or, if a new trial is not necessary, it may upon the reversal remand it, with directions to the lower court to enter a particular judgment."

What this court is here doing is changing in essential particulars a judgment which it has solemnly given, which judgment by lapse of time has passed from its control and become an absolute finality. It is doing this under the guise of construing language so plain as to forbid construction. The direct consequence, the legal effect, of this is to impair, without warrant of law, the stability and security of every judgment which this court has rendered. If this court in one case can say that its formal decree reversing the whole of the judgment of a trial court means merely the reversal of some portion of that judgment, it may say so in any case.

The judgment which this court rendered in 159 Cal. 260, 113 Pac. 373, was either mistaken or not mistaken. If it was not mistaken, there is no need for its correction. If it was mistaken, this is not a legal method for its correction. Nothing but hopeless confusion in the law and a just contempt for the law can follow, if its highest interpreters, under conditions such as those here present, shall be permitted to say that their own deliberately chosen language does not mean that which alone the words must mean to any comprehending mind. I therefore dissent under the conviction that the prevailing opinion and judgment are not alone without the sanction of the law, but are a dangerous innovation upon the law.

PEOPLE v. HATCH. (Cr. 1,706.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 2, 1912.
Rehearing Denied Aug. 31, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1032*)—APPEAL—PRESENTATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW IN COURT BELOW.

An objection to the indictment, which was not taken by demurrer in the trial court, cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2627, 2628, 2642, 2653; Dec. Dig. § 1032.*]

2. EMBEZZLEMENT (§ 11*)—DEMAND—NECESSITY.

To support a conviction for embezzlement, it need not be shown that after the fraudulent misappropriation of the money a demand was made on defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Embezzlement, Cent. Dig. §§ 9, 10; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

3. EMBEZZLEMENT (§ 44*)—DEMAND—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In a prosecution for embezzlement, evidence held sufficient to show that a demand was made on defendant for the money appropriated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Embezzlement, Cent. Dig. §§ 67-70; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 563*)—EVIDENCE—CORPUS DELICTI.

The corpus delicti need not be proved beyond a reasonable doubt by evidence other than the admissions and declarations of accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1269; Dec. Dig. § 563.*]

5. EMBEZZLEMENT (§ 6*)—ESSENTIALS.

Where accused had control over money or a bank check which could be converted into money, he may be convicted of embezzlement for his fraudulent misappropriation, although he did not take possession of actual currency.

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 670*)—TRIAL—WAIVER OF ERRORS.

In a prosecution for embezzlement, where defendant sought to introduce a note, and the court, not being fully advised in the matter, sustained an objection, but expressed a willingness to permit the note to be introduced, if connected with the case, and accused rested his case without making any attempt to connect the note, he waived the error.

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

In a prosecution for embezzlement, where all of the facts upon which a witness' conclusions were based had been admitted in evidence and were before the jury, and the witness' conclusions were the only reasonable ones, the admission of his conclusions was not harmful.

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 371*)—EVIDENCE OF OTHER OFFENSES—EMBEZZLEMENT.

While evidence of independent crimes which have no tendency to prove a material fact in connection with the particular crime for which accused is being prosecuted is inadmissible, yet evidence of other offenses is admissible to prove motive or intent, or where the evidence of the crime is intermixed with the evidence of other crimes; and hence, in a prosecution for embezzlement, where accused had for a long time acted as agent, and had received and disbursed money, and had refused to account for a large sum of money, evidence of those facts was admissible in a prosecution for the embezzlement of a selected item.

14. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 822*)—TRIAL—READING LAW TO JURY.

In a criminal prosecution, where the instructions regarding the degree of certainty required for conviction, were clear and full, and, taken as a whole, could not have conveyed any other impression than that the prosecution was bound to prove every element of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt, the reading of Code Civ. Proc. § 1826, providing that the law does not require such a degree of proof as, including possibility of error, produces absolute certainty, but that moral certainty only is required, is not erroneous.

15. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 881*)—TRIAL—VERDICT—SUFFICIENCY.

In a prosecution for embezzlement, where the indictment charged accused with the embezzlement of $37,000, and at the outset the district attorney selected as the item to be proved the amount of $4,000, a verdict, finding accused guilty of embezzlement as charged in the indictment and elected by the people as the substance of offense to be proved, is sufficient; the election of the people appearing from the minutes of the trial, which, under Pen. Code, § 1207, are a part of the record.

Melvin, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Jackson Hatch was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 13 Cal. App. 521, 109 Pac. 1097. Rehearing denied; Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

Frank Freeman, O. D. Richardson, and H. I. Stafford, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Raymond Benjamin, Chief Deputy Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. This appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, comes to this court in consequence of the inability of the Justices of the District Court of Appeal for the First appellate district, to which the appeal was taken, to agree upon a judgment. Two of the Justices of said court were of the opinion that the judgment and order should be reversed on account of errors in the admission and rejection of evidence, while the third Justice expressed the view that the rulings in question, if erroneous, were not prejudicial to the appellant. All three Justices agreed that, except with regard to the particular rulings just referred to, the record disclosed no error affecting any substantial right of the defendant.

The following opinion, in which we express the views of this court upon the questions raised by the appeal, is taken, virtually in its entirety, from the two opinions filed in the District Court of Appeal.

This is the second appeal in the case. Upon the first appeal the judgment against the defendant was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. The retrial resulted again in the conviction of the defendant, and this appeal is from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

Upon this appeal the appellant again presents the point that the court erred in overruling his demurrer to the indictment, for the reason, as he claims, that the indictment charges appellant with two offenses. It is sufficient to say that this point was decided against the appellant upon the former appeal. People v. Hatch, 13 Cal. App. 521, 109 Pac. 1097. However, in addition to People v. Thompson, 111 Cal. 242, 43 Pac. 748, cited in the opinion upon the first appeal, we may cite People v. Shotwell, 27 Cal. 401; People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507; People v. Sheldon, 68 Cal. 434, 9 Pac. 457; People v. Leyshon, 108 Cal. 440, 41 Pac. 480.

[1] It is further urged that the indictment does not conform to the requirements of section 954 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 772), in that the "different statements of the same offense" are not set forth in different counts. This point is not raised by the demurrer, which is simply that more than one offense is charged in the indictment. In thus disposing of the argument of counsel, we do not wish to be understood as intimating that his point would be good, if properly raised by the demurrer.

Appellant urges that the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict of the jury, finding the defendant guilty as charged. We have carefully read all the evidence in the case, and find no merit in this contention. We do not deem it necessary to discuss the evidence in detail, but shall consider it only in regard to certain particulars, in which it is claimed to be deficient.

[2, 3] It is claimed that no demand was shown to have been made upon defendant for the money involved with which it was his duty to comply.

In the first place, the guilt or innocence

of defendant does not necessarily depend upon the question whether or not any demand had been made upon him for the money involved. The real question is, Does the evidence show a fraudulent appropriation by defendant of the money involved? Neither People v. Page, 116 Cal. 387, 48 Pac. 326, nor People v. Royce, 106 Cal. 173, 37 Pac. 630, 39 Pac. 524, lays down the rule that a demand is necessary, as a matter of law, to constitute an embezzlement. In each of these cases the court discussed the evidence, and held that it was insufficient to support a verdict of guilty, and in so doing adverted to the fact that no demand had been made, and in each case also adverted to the fact that it had not been shown that the defendant had in fact, or at all, appropriated the money involved to his own use, or that he did not have it on hand at all times to meet any demand, if one had been made. "No doubt embezzlement may be established under certain circumstances without proof of a demand, as where other evidence clearly shows an appropriation by an employé of his employer's funds, with intent to do so fraudulently and feloniously." People v. Royce, supra. In some cases, in the absence of other sufficient proof, a demand may be necessary to fix the fact of the fraudulent appropriation; but the real test always is: Does the whole evidence establish the crime charged; that is, a fraudulent appropriation as charged in the indictment. People v. Ward, 134 Cal. 301, 66 Pac. 372.

In the second place, there is ample evidence in the record of a sufficient demand. At the outset of the trial, the district attorney selected, as the item upon which he would rely for a conviction, the sum of $4,100.55, received by appellant for property belonging to the prosecutrix, Mrs. Sage, known as the Lyon street property, sold by him under her instructions in June, 1907. He had been her agent for a number of years. In January, 1907, he furnished her a statement, which on its face showed that he had in his charge as her agent money loaned and bearing interest in the sum of $34,509, and four pieces of real estate; one of them being the property above referred to as sold in June, 1907. In November, 1907, on the day following Thanksgiving day, Mrs. Sage called with her son, L. A. Sage, upon defendant and told him she would like to turn over all her affairs to her said son. The son, L. A. Sage, requested the defendant at his earliest opportunity to turn over to him all the properties and accounts of his mother in defendant's charge. Defendant stated that it would take some time to do this, as the accounts were mixed, but in effect promised to do so as soon as possible. L. A. Sage thereafter called on defendant several times, urging a settlement, but was put off with excuses. However, about the 1st of January, 1908, defendant did turn over or cause to be delivered to Mr. Beasley, who seems to have been acting as attorney for Mr. and Mrs. Sage, some notes, the face value of which did not exceed $5,000, while the evidence shows that he should have had in his possession at that time either money or securities to the amount of upwards of $35,000. Thereafter, on January 8, 1908, L. A. Sage and his attorney, Mr. Beasley, had an interview with defendant in the office of Mr. Beasley concerning the affairs of Mrs. Sage. At this time Mr. Sage asked Mr. Hatch to turn over to him all securities and moneys that he held in his possession belonging to Mrs. Sage. Defendant answered, saying: "You have got to rest satisfied with my statement that there are no securities, and the money is all gone." He refused to state what had become of the money or securities. Subsequently, and before the indictment was found, Mr. Sage served on the defendant a written demand, together with a certified copy of a power of attorney from Mrs. Sage to L. A. Sage. This demand was in three parts. One part, signed by Mrs. Sage, demanded that he turn over and deliver to her son, Louis A. Sage, all moneys, notes, securities, and other evidences of indebtedness in defendant's possession belonging to Mrs. Sage. Another part demanded $38,298.21, and the third part demanded in detail various sums of money, itemized and described, including one for $4,356.85, described as received by defendant from the sale of the Lyon street property.

We have no doubt that the above matters show, not only one demand, but more than one demand, quite sufficient to make it the duty of the defendant to turn over all money and securities in his charge belonging to Mrs. Sage, including the money selected as the basis for his prosecution. He knew, or should have known, exactly what money and securities he held that belonged to her. As her agent, he was bound to act toward her in the utmost good faith. He had in effect been instructed by her as early as November to turn over all her property in his possession to her son. It was clearly his duty to comply with this instruction, which was a sufficient demand to charge him with compliance therewith.

[4] It is claimed that the corpus delicti was not proved by evidence outside of the declarations and admissions of defendant. It must be remembered that the rule does not require that the evidence, other than the admissions and declarations of defendant, establish the commission of the offense beyond all reasonable doubt. People v. Jones, 123 Cal. 65, 55 Pac. 698; People v. Ward, 134 Cal. 306, 66 Pac. 372; People v. Rowland, 12 Cal. App. 7, 106 Pac. 428. We are satisfied that the record presents substantial and sufficient evidence, besides the admissions and declarations of the defendant to establish the commission of the crime charged.

[5] The appellant makes the point that the verdict cannot be supported, because the evidence does not show the appropriation of lawful money of the United States, nor, as it is claimed, of any money at all.

We find no merit in this contention. Defendant received a check for $4,100.55 in San Francisco. He brought this to San Jose and received therefor three certificates of deposit, one for $2,000, and two each for $1,000. The money called for by these certificates of deposit thus came into the control of the defendant. It may be that he never had the money in specie in his hands; but it was in his control. This meets both the language of the statute and of the indictment. The certificates of deposit which he received for the check were in form as follows: " * * * Jackson Hatch had deposited in the First National Bank of San Jose, Cal. $1,000.00, one thousand dollars, payable to the order of self on return of this certificate properly endorsed. * * * "

The money represented by such certificates was in his control, though in the possession of the bank. That the money represented by such certificates was lawful money of the United States is also sufficiently shown. When we speak or contract with reference to dollars in this country, we mean lawful money of the United States. No other sort of dollars could have been rightfully or lawfully paid in discharge of the obligations represented by the certificates of deposit. The money that came into his control by this transaction was necessarily lawful money of the United States. Again we say, after a careful examination of the evidence, we are satisfied that it is sufficient to support the verdict.

One of the matters most strongly relied upon by appellant upon this appeal concerns the ruling of the court in refusing to admit in evidence a certain promissory note for the sum of $5,000, and executed by Mrs. Sage.

The prosecution had introduced evidence showing that on the 12th day of June, 1907, defendant had received in payment of the purchase price of the Lyon street property, sold by him for Mrs. Sage, a check for $4,100.55. The check was drawn payable to one Murray F. Vandall, and was indorsed by him payable to the order of defendant. The evidence for the prosecution showed that defendant, on the 14th day of June, 1907, indorsed and delivered said check to the First National Bank of San Jose at San Jose, and received therefor from said bank, as previously stated, three certificates of deposit, one for $2,000, and two for $1,000 each, all payable to the order of defendant, and a credit to his personal account in the sum of $100.55, thus making up the full amount of the sum of $4,100.55. This is the amount and represents the item selected by the district attorney as the basis of the charge upon which he asked for a conviction. It was the theory of the prosecution that the defendant had fraudulently appropriated said sum of money and the whole thereof to his own use, and it had introduced evidence tending to support such theory.

After proving that the note in question was signed by Mrs. Sage, defendant further proved by Mr. Knox, an officer of the Commercial & Savings Bank, the payee in said note, that defendant had fully paid the principal of said note in five payments, as well as all interests, amounting to over $500. One of these payments was shown to have been made by indorsing over to the payee in said note, on June 15, 1907, the certificate of deposit for $2,000, above referred to, and which represented $2,000 of the money selected as the basis of the charge against defendant.

[6] Appellant offered the note in evidence, and the court sustained the objection of the district attorney to its admission. This action of the court affords no sufficient ground for reversal, for the reasons:

(A) The error in excluding the note was not prejudicial, inasmuch as every material fact which could have been shown by the paper had already been testified to by the witness, and there was no attempt to contradict any of such facts.

[7] (B) The error in sustaining the objection to the offer of the note was waived by the appellant. When the note was first offered, the objection was sustained. It appears, however, from a colloquy which followed the ruling that the court had not fully understood the testimony of the witness Knox. It having been explained that a $2,000 payment on the note had been made out of the proceeds of the Lyon street property (but no attempt being made to connect any of the other payments with the transaction under inquiry), the court expressed its willingness to permit the note to go in, if it were proper to admit a document which had been thus connected in part only. After some further discussion, the court stated that the ruling excluding the note would stand; whereupon the defendant rested. The discussion was so protracted that we cannot set it forth at length here. It is, however, quite apparent from a reading of the entire matter that the court intended to defer a final ruling until it could investigate the propriety of admitting in evidence such parts of the document as were connected with the transaction in controversy, and that the defendant prevented such investigation by his prompt, not to say precipitate, action in resting his case before the court was prepared to finally rule. Even after the defendant had rested, the court in effect gave him an opportunity to renew his offer of those parts of the note that had been properly connected; but no response was made to this suggestion. Under these circumstances, we are satisfied that the error, if any, should be held to have been waived.

[8] The court permitted E. L. Peterson, the exchange teller of the First National Bank of San Jose, and a witness for the people, to testify concerning certain checks, certificates, and deposit slips. In each instance the witness was shown a deposit slip and a certain check or certificate, and was asked to explain if there was any connection between the two papers. In each case, after an examination of the papers, he stated, over the objection of the defendant, that this question called for the conclusion of the witness that the slip disclosed that the check or certificate had been deposited to the credit of the defendant. All the facts upon which the witness' conclusion were based had been admitted in evidence and were before the jury; and, as the conclusion given by the witness appeared to be the only one that could be reasonably reached, it is difficult to see how any substantial right of the defendant was prejudiced.

The appellant contends that the court erred in admitting much evidence tending to prove embezzlements other than the one for which defendant was being tried.

[9] Over the objection of defendant, the court permitted the district attorney to prove that the defendant, at various times while he was acting as the agent and attorney of Mrs. Sage, collected and received for her and as her agent various sums of money, which he deposited in bank to his personal account and never paid to Mrs. Sage or to her use. Some of this money was received before and some after the money selected as the basis of the charge for which he was being tried.

The testimony as a whole tended to show that when defendant was called upon to turn over all property and money in his hands belonging to Mrs. Sage he should have had in his charge money or securities to an amount upward of $35,000. He did turn over securities to an amount of less than $5,000, and a day or so afterwards, when asked by Mr. Sage, the son and authorized agent of Mrs. Sage, to turn over all the securities and money in his charge belonging to Mrs. Sage, he replied that there were no securities, and the money was all gone.

While it is true that independent crimes, the evidence of which has no tendency to prove some material fact in connection with the particular crime charged, may not be proven against the defendant, this rule does not exclude evidence of such other crimes, when the evidence thereof does tend to prove some material element of the crime for which the defendant is on trial. This well-recognized exception to the general rule finds frequent application in cases where evidence of the crime tends to prove a motive for the commission of the crime charged, and where, a fraudulent intent being a necessary element in the crime charged, the evidence of the other crimes tends to establish and fix the existence of such intent, and in cases where the evidence tending to establish the crime charged is intermixed with the evidence of the other crimes.

We think the character of the offense charged here and the facts of the case bring it within the two latter conditions. Money ordinarily has no earmarks, and it is frequently impossible to prove the specific act of appropriation of a designated item of such money. Especially is this true where, as here, the agent has collected and disbursed various and large sums for his principal during an agency extending over a long period. In the case at bar, it was indeed shown that defendant had collected the specific item of $4,100.55 selected as the basis of the charge, and had deposited it to his individual account. While the fact that he thus deposited it to his individual account might be considered by the jury as tending to prove that in so doing he intended to fraudulently appropriate it to his own use, the district attorney had a right to support such inference of a fraudulent purpose, as well as the fact of the appropriation by other evidence that would legitimately tend to such support. Evidence that defendant had collected for his principal divers moneys which he had deposited to his individual credit, and that when the total which he ought to have had on hand or under his control amounted to upwards of $35,000, including the $4,100.55, a demand was made upon him to settle, to which his only reply in substance was that it was all gone, all tended to prove that the $4,100.55 had been by him fraudulently appropriated, and that the deposit thereof to his individual credit was for the purpose and intent to so fraudulently appropriate it. The evidence of the fraudulent appropriation of the $4,100.55 was intermixed in logic and in fact with the evidence as to the other items which he said were all gone.

If the evidence as to the collection of the other items and their deposit to the credit of defendant, and total amount, and the admission or statement of defendant that they were all gone, had not been furnished the jury, we doubt not that an argument to the effect that it had not been proved that the $4,100.55 had been fraudulently appropriated, or appropriated by defendant at all, would have been given much weight. Instances where evidence of other embezzlements have been allowed are found in Edelhoff v. State, 5 Wyo. 19, 36 Pac. 627, People v. Rowland, 12 Cal. App. 7, 106 Pac. 428, and People v. Gray, 66 Cal. 271, 5 Pac. 240, all of which cases support what we have said as to the rule to be applied in this case. See, also, the cognate cases of People v. Sanders, 114 Cal. 216, 46 Pac. 153; People v. Tomalty, 14 Cal. App. 224, 111 Pac. 513.

The facts of this case bear little resemblance to the facts in the case of People v. Bartnett, 15 Cal. App. 89, 113 Pac. 879, cited by the appellant. In the Bartnett Case the charge of embezzlement was based upon the sale of certain identified bonds, and, as is pointed out in the opinion, the evidence as to the sale of other bonds at a prior time was in no way interblended with the evidence of the sale selected as the basis of the charge. The court did not err in permitting evidence of the other offenses.

[10] It is contended by appellant that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in stating to the jury in the course of his argument the law concerning the duty of a trustee to act in the highest good faith toward his beneficiary in matters concerning his trust. It is not contended, and it cannot be successfully contended, that the district attorney in his remarks misstated the law in the abstract; but the contention of the appellant seems to be based upon the proposition that the law as stated has no application to a criminal case, and that such remarks as were made by the district attorney in this connection have no place in the argument to a jury, where an agent is charged with the embezzlement of the funds of his principal. This contention seems to be based upon a misapprehension of the effect of what was said by the District Court of Appeal in this case with regard to an instruction given by the court upon the first trial of this case.

Upon such trial the defendant was a witness, and claimed that the money which he was charged to have embezzled had been loaned to him by his principal, Mrs. Sage. Upon cross-examination he was obliged to admit that at the time he claimed he had obtained the alleged loans he was insolvent, but made no disclosure of such condition to Mrs. Sage. This fact had been much emphasized in the cross-examination. The court in its charge, without explanation or limitation, after stating, "You will observe that the essential element of the offense of embezzlement of which defendant is charged is the fraudulent conversion or misappropriation by the defendant of property received by him in a trust capacity," proceeded to state the rule as to the good faith required of an agent or trustee in dealings with his principal. The District Court of Appeal in its opinion pointed out the circumstances under which the instruction was given, and its tendency, in the manner in which it was given, to mislead the jury, and concluded with the statement that "under the condition of the evidence as above indicated, and in the connection in which the latter part of the instruction was given, it was erroneous, and, we think, clearly prejudicial to the rights of the defendant." As a reading of the opinion will show the conditions under which the instruction was given were exceptional, and the instruction came from the court without such explanation as would limit it in its proper application, no such conditions exist upon this appeal. What the district attorney said was correct as a principle of law, and had a just application to the circumstances of the case. Especially did it have application to the conduct of defendant in refusing in effect at the interview with Mr. Sage, at the office of Mr. Beasley, to give any account of what had become of the money of Mrs. Sage, except to say that it was all gone. The rule stated by the district attorney was correct, both in law and in good morals, and was a very proper subject to call to the attention of the jury in discussing the conduct of defendant in his dealings with Mrs. Sage and her property intrusted to him as her agent. Nothing that is found in the opinion upon the former appeal, when read in its true connection, justifies the criticism of the district attorney made by appellant concerning this particular matter.

The district attorney, evidently in the heat engendered by a hotly contested trial, did make some comments that should have been omitted. Thus, although the defendant did not become a witness, the district attorney made a remark in a discussion with the court to the effect that he (the defendant) could testify to a certain matter. The court, however, promptly, upon objection being made, correctly admonished the jury in regard to such remark. Some other remarks were made which might better have been omitted; but none of them were of sufficient importance to justify a reversal.

[11] Appellant also contends that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions requested by defendant, in modifying others, and in giving certain instructions upon its own motion. The instructions given are long and, we think, quite complete, and properly guarded the rights of the defendant. Some particular instructions, when read alone and without regard to their connection, may be subject to some criticism; but the instructions must be read as a whole, and if, when so read, they do not incorrectly state the law, and are not contradictory, a new trial should not be ordered because some particular instruction is not in itself a complete statement of the law.

[12, 13] Defendant complains of the refusal of the court to give several instructions, based upon the theory that there was evidence in the case that tended to support the theory that the relations between Mrs. Sage and defendant were those of debtor and creditor. Most of these instructions are argumentative, and for that reason objectionable. Furthermore, we find nothing in the record that tends to support the theory upon which they were based. There is nothing in the evidence that in any way tends to show that the relations between Mrs. Sage and the defendant were those of creditor and debtor, except in so far as it may be said that every agent who receives money for his principal and converts or withholds it becomes indebted to his principal for the amount thereof as for money had and received for the use and benefit of his principal.

There is in the record one statement, and one statement only, rendered by defendant to Mrs. Sage of receipts and disbursements by him for her. The receipts are listed under the heading "Receipts," and the disbursements under the heading "Disbursements." There is absolutely nothing in the statement to indicate anything other than the ordinary relation of principal and agent. The terms "credit" and "debit" do not even appear in the statement; nor does it appear from such statement that any of the money collected for Mrs. Sage was, either with her knowledge or without such knowledge, mingled with the money of defendant. By this statement we do not mean to suggest that such fact would be important if it did appear. This statement tends to show that defendant was dealing with the moneys and property of Mrs. Sage as agent, and not otherwise.

Appellant in his brief has several times stated that defendant rendered to Mrs. Sage between 60 and 70 statements. He has not pointed to any place in the record where such fact appears, and we have been unable to find it. Certain it is that it nowhere appears what the statements contained. If they were of the form of the one that was introduced in evidence, they would not tend to support any such theory as that upon which the rejected instructions were based. It is not error for the court to refuse to give an instruction that is predicated upon a theory that finds no support in the evidence.

[14] We think the jury could not have been misled to defendant's prejudice by the action of the court in reading section 1826 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The instructions regarding the degree of certainty required for a conviction were clear and full, and the charge, taken as a whole, could not have conveyed any other impression than that the prosecution was bound to prove every element of the crime charged beyond a reasonable doubt.

[15] Appellant contends that the verdict returned by the jury is not sufficient in form to support the judgment, and that defendant is entitled in consequence to be discharged. We find no merit in this contention. The verdict returned by the jury is as follows: "We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find the defendant guilty of embezzlement [a felony] as charged in the indictment and elected by the people as the substantive offense to be proved herein." The indictment charged the defendant with the embezzlement of $37,075.42, and at the outset of the trial the district attorney selected as the item to be proved, as constituting the basis of the charge, a sum of money in the amount of $4,100.55, received by defendant in June, 1907, from the sale of the Lyon street property. This appears from the minutes of the trial, which are a part of the record of the action. Pen. Code, § 1207. The verdict must be read in the light of the facts disclosed by the "record of the action," and so read it is in no way uncertain or indefinite.

Other points are made by the appellant, but none of them seem to us to be of sufficient consequence to require discussion. Upon the whole record we think the defendant was properly convicted of the offense charged, and that no error substantially affecting his rights was committed.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BEATTY, C. J., and LORIGAN, J., do not participate in the foregoing.

MELVIN, J. I dissent. I think the court erred in refusing to admit in evidence the note signed by Mrs. Sage and paid by defendant, and I do not think that the error was waived by the failure of the defendant to assent to the admission of parts of the note only. I agree with the opinion prepared by Mr. Justice Hall, in which Mr. Presiding Justice Lennon concurred, wherein this matter is discussed as follows:

"Appellant offered the note in evidence, and upon the objection of the district attorney the court sustained the objection. The defendant was thus denied the right to prove the direct evidence that a portion at least of the money which he was charged with embezzling had in fact been applied to the payment of an obligation of Mrs. Sage. Furthermore, the other payments on this note tended to account for some of the money that the prosecution claimed and proved had been received by defendant as the agent of Mrs. Sage. The evidence of Mr. Knox showed that defendant had made payments on the instrument, which was then exhibited to him, in the amount of over $5,000, and that over $4,000 of this was paid shortly after the receipt by defendant of the $4,100.55, which he was charged with fraudulently appropriating to his own use. But by the ruling of the court, made at the insistence of the district attorney, the defendant was prevented from proving that the payments were made to discharge an obligation of Mrs. Sage.

"This was a vital matter. The important fact to be established in regard to these payments was that they were made for the benefit of Mrs. Sage and in discharge of her debt. It is not for the court to say that the offered evidence would not establish a completed defense. If it tended to meet and overcome any portion of the evidence presented by the prosecution, the defendant was entitled to have it placed before the jury. The ruling of the court deprived the defendant of the benefit of important and material evidence.

"The note, in connection with the evidence of payments made thereon by defendant, given by the witness Knox, directly tended to account for a portion of the $4,100, as well as for other sums of money received by defendant for Mrs. Sage. The evidence of these payments was of practically no value without the introduction of the note. It was the note that would supply the important evidence that these payments were made to discharge an obligation of Mrs. Sage. It is thus manifest that the court erred in a vital matter to the prejudice of appellant in sustaining the objection of the district attorney to the introduction of the promissory note of Mrs. Sage."

MARRON v. MARRON et al.
(Civ. 1,008.)

1. TRIAL (§ 165*)—MOTION FOR DISMISSAL—EVIDENCE CONSIDERED.

On motion for nonsuit, only the evidence tending to prove plaintiff's case, with the fair inferences and presumptions deducible therefrom, disregarding contradictions, is to be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 373, 374; Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

2. DEEDS (§ 196*)—UNDUE INFLUENCE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence, in a suit to set aside a conveyance by one having a wife and child, to whom he was fondly attached, of practically all his property, of the value of $15,000, for a consideration of $10, that his mind was weakened by years of drinking, is sufficient to raise the inference of undue influence, putting on the grantee the burden of showing its absence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 587-593; Dec. Dig. § 196.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Nellie Marron, administratrix of Thomas J. Marron, deceased, against Mary Marron and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Edward C. Harrison and Daniel A. Ryan, for appellant. Lewis F. Byington and R. V. Whiting, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment following the granting of a motion for nonsuit in an action brought by the plaintiff to set aside a transfer of real and personal property.

On and prior to the 22d day of April, 1907, Thomas F. Marron was the owner of certain pieces of real property situated in the city and county of San Francisco. He was married and had one child, aged four months. On the above-mentioned date, he made a deed and an assignment, purporting to convey to Mary Marron, one of the defendants, the real and personal property described in the complaint. About three months thereafter he died, and subsequently the plaintiff, his wife, was appointed the administratrix of his estate; whereupon she brought this action to set aside the deed and bill of sale to said properties, upon the grounds that Thomas F. Marron was of unsound mind at the time the instruments of conveyance were executed; that they were procured from him by undue influence and by fraud practiced upon him by the defendant Mary Marron.

After the plaintiff had closed her case, the court granted a motion for nonsuit, on the ground that plaintiff's evidence failed to show that, at the time of making the instruments, the deceased was incompetent, or that the execution of those documents was the result of fraud or undue influence exercised upon him as charged in the complaint. Upon this order judgment was regularly entered. Plaintiff excepted to the ruling granting the motion, and now assigns that ruling as error. We think the ruling cannot be sustained.

[1] A motion for nonsuit assumes as true every fact which the evidence, and presumptions fairly deducible therefrom, tend to prove, and which was essential to entitle the plaintiff to recover. Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 84 Pac. 252. On such motion the evidence must be taken most strongly against the defendant. Contradictory evidence must be disregarded (In re Daly, 15 Cal. App. 329, 114 Pac. 787), and the motion denied, if there is any substantial evidence tending to prove plaintiff's case without passing on the sufficiency of such evidence. Zelmer v. Gerichten, 111 Cal. 73, 43 Pac. 408; Vermont Co. v. Declez, 135 Cal. 579, 67 Pac. 1057, 56 L. R. A. 728, 87 Am. St. Rep. 143. The rules as to a nonsuit are the same, whether the trial is by the court or by a jury. Freese v. Hibernia S. & L. Co., 139 Cal. 394, 73 Pac. 172.

In the case of the Estate of Arnold, supra, where the court passed upon a motion for nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's case in a will contest, Mr. Justice Shaw, after declaring that in a motion for nonsuit the same rules obtain in proceedings to contest a will as apply in civil suits, said: "Every favorable inference fairly deducible, and every favorable presumption fairly arising, from the evidence produced must be considered as facts proved in favor of contestants. When evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions, or if either of several inferences may reasonably be made, the court must take the view most favorable to contestants. All the evidence in favor of contestants must be taken as true; and, if contradictory evidence has been given, it must be disregarded. If there is any substantial evidence tending to prove, in favor of the contestants, all the facts necessary to make out their case, they are entitled to have the case go to the jury for a verdict on the merits."

[2] Following the doctrine laid down in those cases, and therefore disregarding contradictions, and considering only the evidence tending to prove the allegations of plaintiff's complaint, and the fair inferences and presumptions deducible therefrom, the facts in the case are these:

On April 22, 1907, in consideration of the sum of $10, the deceased made a deed and assignment to his mother of property estimated to be of the value of about $15,000, and being nearly all of his real and personal property. He was then about 33 years of age. "He was fragile, and a man of very nervous temperament;" was married, and had a child, a girl, about four months old. At the time of his marriage in February, 1901, he was accustomed to drink occasionally intoxicating liquor, and in the spring of the following year commenced to drink such liquor to excess, and continued to do so until the time of his death. In February, 1907, at the request of his wife, he took a solemn pledge to abstain from the use of all such liquor for one year. Between this date and the date of making the deed and assignment, he had been in several medical institutions for treatment for alcoholism. His craving for liquor was so strong that he broke his pledge the day he took it. On the way home from one of the hospitals where he had been treated for his unfortunate habit, he obtained and drank liquor. It was his custom for several months prior to making the transfers in question to take whisky or beer to bed with him to drink during the night. In brief, according to testimony introduced by plaintiff, he had become an habitual drunkard. On the day he made the deed and assignment, he was drunk, stupid, and appeared irrational. "He was not in his right mind, and he didn't know what he was doing." His mother and other members of her family were probably present when he executed the instruments, but his wife, whom he held in high regard, was absent, and knew nothing about the transaction until several days afterwards. The notary before whom the acknowledgment was made, believing that the deceased was conveying his property to his wife, explained to him that "under the instrument his wife could sell the property if she wanted to," and he made a note of such explanation in his official record. The deceased made no answer to this explanation. The family of the deceased was very unfriendly to the plaintiff, and had accused her of many delinquencies, among others of being a drunkard and of caring nothing for her husband. She had never had any trouble with her husband, and was kind and devoted to him. He always expressed himself as fond of her and of his little girl. On the morning of April 25th, three days after the documents were executed, a sister and two brothers of the deceased forced an entrance into the plaintiff's home by smashing the back door, for the purpose of handing to plaintiff's husband, as they told her, a telegram, and collecting 25 cents for its transmission. On that occasion they took deceased away with them, and the plaintiff never afterwards had an opportunity to confer with her husband alone; for he was always accompanied by some member of his mother's family or a caretaker, presumably employed by them. From the date of the instruments plaintiff never saw her husband sober during the remainder of his life. He died July 1, 1907, at a medical institution, where he was being treated for alcoholism. He left no will. The defendant Mary Marron was unable, when her deposition was taken, and at the trial, several months later, to produce the deed, claiming on both occasions that it had been mislaid in her home, and that she was unable to find it.

The evidence shows that the deceased for a number of years was continually becoming intoxicated. He was drunk and appeared stupid and irrational on April 22d; and yet on that day and in that condition his mother accepted the instruments in question, transferring substantially all of his property to her, and, according to a fair inference from the testimony, without any, or, if any, a totally inadequate, consideration. This left him and his wife and baby, to whom he was fondly attached, with so small a portion of his property that his act may be regarded as an unusual one, and one inconsistent with his duties and obligations to his wife and child, as well as to himself.

Other facts tending to show imposition and undue influence are that Mary Marron failed to produce the documents, so that the signature thereon could be compared with the deceased's usual handwriting, which might afford some inference as to his physical and mental condition at the very time the instruments were executed; and this circumstance we regard as distinctly suspicious. For months the deceased was never permitted to see and confer with his wife alone. Was this because the deceased "did not know his own mind," and that it was feared that his wife would exercise some influence over him inimical to the interest of his mother? It is also worthy of note that the notary public felt called upon to explain to the deceased that if the deed were executed the grantee thereunder could dispose of the property to whomever she pleased, and that the deceased failed to correct the notary's impression that the deed was being made to his wife. All the circumstances taken together are certainly sufficient to cast the burden upon the defendant Mary Marron to show that no imposition was practiced on the deceased.

Woolen & Thornton, in their work on Intoxicating Liquors, say: "The inadequacy of the consideration, or its manifest unfairness, is a weighty factor in securing the annulment of a drunkard's contract."

In Swan v. Talbot, 152 Cal. 142, 94 Pac. 238, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1066, an intoxicated person sold property of the value of about $12,000 for $200. The court held that, while equity would not assist a man to avoid a contract which he had entered into when drunk, merely because he might wish, when in his sober senses, he had not entered into it, still equity will not countenance fraudulent imposition; and gross inadequacy of consideration is always received as evidence of imposition, justifying the interference of equity to set aside the contract.

In Crane v. Conklin, 1 N. J. Eq. 346, 22 Am. Dec. 519, it was declared to be the settled rule that, while equity would not interfere to assist a person to annul his contract on the ground of intoxication merely, nevertheless, if any unfair advantage has been taken of his situation, it will render him proper aid; and it was there further held that where the grantor is intoxicated the inadequacy of the price is direct evidence of fraud.

In Moore v. Moore, 56 Cal. 89, it is said: "The fact of there being no consideration, or a grossly inadequate one, is a circumstance which may be considered in determining the condition of the plaintiff's mind at the time of her signing the deeds. She signed instruments which transferred her entire estate, and thereby reduced herself to a state of destitution. The fact of her having done so without consideration, or any apparent motive, would indicate great weakness or unsoundness of mind. One of the indicia of a weak or disordered mind is that its possessor is quite liable to act against his own plain interest in cases where the act could not be imputed to mistake. * * * Taking an unfair advantage of another's weakness of mind is undue influence, and the law will not permit the retention of an advantage thus obtained."

In Allore v. Jewell, 94 U. S. 506, 24 L. Ed. 260, Field, J., delivering the opinion of the court, says: "It is not necessary, in order to secure the aid of equity, to prove that the deceased was at the time insane, or in such a state of mental imbecility as to render her entirely incapable of executing a valid deed. It is sufficient to show that, from her sickness and infirmities, she was at the time in a condition of great mental weakness, and that there was gross inadequacy of consideration for the conveyance. From these circumstances imposition or undue influence will be inferred."

Generally, when there is weakness of mind in a person executing a conveyance of land, arising from age, sickness, intoxication, or any other cause, although not amounting to absolute disqualification, an inadequate consideration, imposition, or undue influence will be presumed. Richmond's Appeal, 59 Conn. 226, 22 Atl. 82, 21 Am. St. Rep. 85; Fishburne v. Ferguson, 84 Va. 87, 4 S. E. 575; Boyd v. Boyd, 66 Pa. 283; Samuel v. Marshall, 3 Leigh (Va.) 567; Fitch v. Reiser, 79 Iowa, 34, 44 N. W. 214; Woodroof v. Howes, 88 Cal. 184, 26 Pac. 111; Dingman v. Romine, 141 Mo. 466, 42 S. W. 1087; Hays v. Feather, 244 Ill. 172, 91 N. E. 97, 18 Ann. Cas. 538.

The circumstances under which a conveyance was made, the conditions of the grantor at the time, and the injustice to him and his heirs if it is upheld, may cast on the grantee the burden of showing the absence of undue influence or imposition. Bennett v. Bennett, 65 Neb. 432, 91 N. W. 409, 96 N. W. 994.

The other matters discussed in the briefs do not require detailed notice.

For the reasons above indicated, we think the trial court erred in granting the motion for nonsuit. The judgment is therefore reversed.

of unpaid delinquent taxes levied against it in 1897. On December 31, 1898, the property was redeemed by a mortgagee by paying to the county treasurer the amount required for redemption, as certified by the county auditor, and the redemption was entered on the assessment roll of 1898. After July 1, 1899, the tax collector sold the property to the state as for the nonpayment of the second installment of taxes for the year 1898, and on July 5, 1904, issued a deed to the state therefor. The taxes, for the alleged nonpayment of which the sale was made in 1899, under which plaintiff claimed title, became a lien on the property on March 1, 1898, and the amount thereof had been fixed and the assessment and levy completed, before the redemption occurred from the first sale. Held that, since by the terms of Pol. Code, § 3817, any tax for the year 1898 should have been included and paid to effect a redemption on December 31, 1898, if it had not been previously paid, the certificate of the auditor to the redemptioner, specifying the amount due to redeem, constituted prima facie evidence that all other taxes then due had been paid, which was sufficient to overcome the presumption raised by the tax deed that the taxes for which the land was sold were unpaid, so as to sustain a finding that there were no taxes due on the land for which the second sale was made.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by L. I. Boyer against Frank A. Gelhaus and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James H. Boyer and H. M. Anthony, for appellant. F. S. Brittain, for respondent Frank A. Gelhaus. Tobin & Tobin and Stoney, Rouleau & Stoney, for respondent Hibernia Savings & Loan Society. Alexander McCulloch, for respondent Joseph F. Boeddeker.

HALL, J. This is an action to quiet title to certain real property, situate in the city and county of San Francisco, brought by appellant, who bases her title upon a certificate of sale to the state for delinquent taxes and a tax deed executed on behalf of the state to appellant's predecessor in interest, F. J. Ghiselli.

The respondents Gelhaus filed an answer denying the allegations of ownership by plaintiff and a cross-complaint, in which, among other things, they set up that they were in possession of the real property claimed by plaintiff, and were the owners thereof, and prayed for a decree affirmatively quieting their title as against appellant. The court found that appellant was not the owner of the property in suit, and that respondents Gelhaus were, and entered a judgment accordingly quieting the title of respondents Gelhaus as against the claim of plaintiff. The appeal by plaintiff is from this judgment.

The property in question was sold to the state in 1898 for the second installment of unpaid and delinquent taxes levied against the property in 1897. Subsequently, on December 31, 1898, the property was redeemed from such sale by the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, a mortgagee thereof, by the payment to the county treasurer of the amount required for redemption, as certified by the county auditor, and the words "Redeemed December 31st, 1898," were stamped on the assessment roll for the year 1898. Subsequently, on the 1st day of July, 1899, the tax collector sold the property to the state as for the nonpayment of the second installment of taxes for the year 1898, and subsequently, on the 5th day of July, 1904, issued to the state a deed therefor. This deed was introduced in evidence by plaintiff, and is in the usual form. Appellant deraigns her title through this deed.

The defendants Gelhaus, at the beginning of the action and for some time prior thereto, were in possession of the property, claiming under a deed from the administrator of the estate of John McDonald, dated April 3, 1904.

The defendants introduced in evidence a duly certified copy of the recorded certificate of redemption given by the county auditor in pursuance of section 3817 of the Political Code. This certificate contained a statement of the amount of delinquent taxes for the year 1897 for which the property was first sold to the state and the interest and the penalty thereon, and gave the total amount necessary to redeem as $9.86. The statement of the auditor contained no statement of any other taxes that were a lien upon the property at the time said taxes became delinquent, nor of any subsequent tax.

As before stated, the court found that plaintiff was not the owner of the property, and also specially found, among other things, that at the time of the redemption of the property on December 31, 1898, all taxes levied or assessed upon said land for each year since the sale to the state, made in 1898, including the taxes for the fiscal year 1898–99, were paid, and that there was no delinquency of taxes on said property for the second installment of taxes thereon for the fiscal year 1898–99. If these facts find support in the evidence, the judgment should be affirmed, for appellant's title is based upon the sale made as for the delinquency of the second installment of taxes for the year 1898; that is to say, for the fiscal year 1898–99.

[1] Unless there was in fact a delinquency, a sale by the tax collector is unauthorized and void, and the tax deed given in pursuance of such sale conveys no title. Randal v. Dailey, 66 Wis. 285, 28 N. W. 352.

[2] The only evidence introduced by appellant to prove that any taxes for the year 1898 were unpaid was the deed of the tax collector to the state, which recited such fact. Section 3785 of the Political Code, in terms, makes such deed "primary" evidence that "the taxes were not paid." The word "primary," as used in the statute, manifestly means prima facie (see De Frieze v. Quint, 94 Cal. 653-659, 30 Pac. 1, 28 Am. St. Rep. 151), and, of course, such evidence is subject to be controverted. If there is in the record any evidence in contradiction of the presumption of nonpayment of the tax for the year 1898 arising from the tax collector's deed, the finding of the court that such taxes were paid, and that there was no delinquency of taxes on said property for the year 1898, is supported, and the judgment of the court cannot be reversed for want of evidence to support the findings.

We think this evidence is found in the certificate of redemption given by the auditor, upon which the redemption was made on December 31, 1898, from the first sale for unpaid taxes. This statement calls for an examination of the law as to what is necessary to effect a redemption from a sale to the state and the duty of the auditor in relation thereto. After property is purchased by the state for unpaid taxes, it must "be assessed for each subsequent year for taxes until a deed is made to the state therefor, in the same manner as if it had not been so purchased." Section 3813, Pol. Code.

[3] Section 3815 of the Political Code provides that no redemption shall be permitted of property sold to the state for delinquent taxes without payment of all subsequent assessments, costs, fees, penalties, and interest. By "subsequent assessments," as used in this section, we think is meant all taxes levied against the property subsequent to the tax for which the sale was made. That such is its meaning is made quite clear by the language of section 3816 of the Political Code, which provides for the distribution between the state and county of "the original and subsequent taxes and percentages, penalty and the interest paid on redemption."

[4] Section 3817 of the Political Code, as it stood prior to 1905, gave the right to redeem at any time prior to a sale by the state "by paying to the county treasurer of the county wherein the real estate may be situated, the amount of taxes due thereon at the time of said sale, with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum; and also all taxes that were a lien upon said real estate at the time said taxes became delinquent; and also for each year since the sale for which taxes on said land have not been paid, an amount equal to the percentage of taxes for the year upon the value of the real estate as assessed for that year."

From these various sections, it is perfectly clear that under the law no redemption from a sale to the state for unpaid taxes could be effective without payment, not only of the taxes for which the sale was made, but also all subsequent taxes levied against the property up to the time of redemption. In other words, any taxes that were a lien upon the property at the time the taxes became delinquent, for which the sale was made, as well as all subsequent taxes, must be paid to effect a redemption from the sale to the state.

In the case at bar, the taxes, for the alleged nonpayment of which the sale was made in 1899, under which alone appellant claims title, became a lien upon the property upon the 1st day of March, 1898, and the amount thereof had been fixed and the assessment and levy completed before the redemption occurred from the first sale. By the clear terms of the statute, any tax for the year 1898 should have been paid to effect a redemption on the 31st day of December, 1898, if it had not previously been paid.

In order to enable a redemptioner to comply with the requirements of the redemption law, section 3817 of the Political Code, as it stood when the redemption in this case was made, and as it now stands, further provides that "the county auditor shall, on the application of the person desiring to redeem, make an estimate of the amount to be paid, and shall give him triplicate certificates of the amount, specifying the several amounts thereof, which certificates shall be delivered to the county treasurer, together with the money," etc.

The giving of this certificate is an official duty of the auditor. It authorizes the county treasurer to accept redemption according to the face thereof (section 3817, Pol. Code), and is prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein. Sections 1926, 1963, subd. 15, Code Civ. Proc.

As before stated, the certificate given in this case contained a statement of the amount of the original tax for which the property was sold to the state, and gave the total amount necessary to be paid to effect a redemption as the sum of $9.86, which was made up of the original tax, penalties, and interest. The certificate further stated that the statement contained a full and correct statement of all unpaid taxes and penalties thereon up to the day of redemption. If the statement of the certificate be taken as true, it necessarily followed that all the taxes subsequent to the tax for which the first sale to the state was made had been paid before such redemption. In other words, this certificate was prima facie evidence that the tax of 1898, for the supposed nonpayment of which the sale under which appellant's claim was made, was not unpaid and never became delinquent.

The assessment rolls for the year 1898, it was conceded, had been destroyed in the conflagration of April, 1906. The deed to the state, under which appellant claims, and which shows a sale to the state for a sum less than $10, is prima facie evidence that the tax of 1898 was unpaid.

The certificate of the auditor is prima facie evidence that it had been paid. The court found in accordance with the evidence furnished by this certificate; and, in accordance with the well-established rule that, where there is a conflict in the evidence, this court will not interfere with the findings of the trial court, the findings in this case must stand.

There being no unpaid taxes for the year 1898, the sale to the state, under which appellant claims, was void and gave no title.

[5] The appellant, having no title, cannot prevail against one in actual possession. Such possession is sufficient proof of title as against one out of possession, and who establishes no title in himself. Civil Code, § 1006; McGovern v. Mowery, 91 Cal. 383, 27 Pac. 746; Stephenson v. Deuel, 125 Cal. 656-663, 58 Pac. 258; White v. McGilliard, 140 Cal. 654, 74 Pac. 298. Respondents Gelhaus proved their possession without dispute.

Appellant also complains of some rulings of the court in admitting evidence. We have examined these rulings. Such of them as are erroneous could not have affected the result, and will not justify a reversal.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MARTIN. (Cr. 323.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 20, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1160*)—APPEAL—REVIEW—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

The credibility of witnesses is, in the first instance, for the jury, and then, on motion for new trial, for the trial judge, whose determination is conclusive on appeal.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 510½*)—ACCOMPLICE TESTIMONY—CORROBORATION.

The finding near a house, shortly after dynamite was exploded on its porch, of a newspaper, with words thereon in defendant's handwriting, coupled with her denial, when shown it, of all previous knowledge of it or the writing, tending to show a consciousness of guilt, tended to connect her with the commission of the crime, and therefore to corroborate the testimony of the accomplice that, just prior to commission of the crime, he had, at defendant's direction, wrapped the dynamite in a copy of such paper.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 511*)—ACCOMPLICE TESTIMONY—CORROBORATION.

The evidence corroborative of the testimony of an accomplice need not tend to establish the precise facts testified to by him, but, though slight, is sufficient if, in and of itself, it tends to connect accused with the commission of the crime.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 511*)—ACCOMPLICE TESTIMONY—CORROBORATION.

Evidence, on a prosecution for exploding dynamite in a house with intent to injure the inmates, held sufficient to corroborate the testimony of the accomplice, not only that the crime was instigated by defendant, but that she actively aided and abetted its commission.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

Isabella J. Martin was convicted and denied a new trial, and appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 13 Cal. App. 96, 108 Pac. 1034.

Isabella J. Martin, in pro. per. Attorney General Webb and W. H. L. Hynes, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the People.

LENNON, P. J. The defendant in this case, Isabella J. Martin, was charged, in an information filed in the superior court of the county of Alameda, with the crime of felony, as defined in section 601 of the Penal Code. The information in substance charges that on the 19th day of March, 1907, the defendant willfully and maliciously deposited and exploded dynamite in a house which was then occupied as a dwelling house by Frank B. Ogden and his family in the city of Oakland, all with the intent to injure, intimidate, and terrify the occupants of said house.

The defendant was convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment, and this appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

Once before the defendant was convicted of the same offense upon the same information; but upon appeal to this court the judgment was reversed and a new trial ordered. 13 Cal. App. 96, 108 Pac. 1034.

While the same questions of law upon which the first judgment was reversed are not involved in the present appeal, the controlling facts upon which the charge against the defendant was founded and a conviction had are, as shown by the records before us, practically the same in both cases; and, as the opinion of this court, written by Mr. Justice Hall, upon the former appeal contains a clear and concise statement of the immediate circumstances of the crime and the manner of its perpetration, we herewith quote and adopt the statement of facts as therein contained:

"The crime with which defendant was charged was not committed by her in person, but was in fact committed by John B. Martin at her instigation. * * * John B. Martin was, at the time of the commission of the crime, 16 years of age, and, though he had been reared by defendant from babyhood, he was not her child. He was the principal witness for the prosecution, and testified in detail to all the circumstances of the commission of the crime, from which it appears that the defendant had for a considerable time before the commission of the crime contemplated the deed, and with the aid of the witness had made careful preparation therefor. Her motive grew out of the result of some litigation which she had had in a department of the superior court of Alameda county, presided over by Hon. Frank B. Ogden, although the action was not finally tried before Judge Ogden. The witness and defendant discussed the contemplated crime, months before its commission, at Weaverville, in Trinity county, where defendant had a home and certain mining properties. Early in January, 1907, they came to Oakland, Alameda county, where defendant owned a home and other property. Under the house belonging to defendant, and in which she and the witness took up their residence, was stored a quantity of dynamite. This was by the witness taken from under the house by the direction of defendant, and placed upon a shelf to dry. Subsequently a portion of it, about 12 sticks, was made into a bomb by the witness and defendant, for the purpose of dynamiting the residence of Judge Ogden. A long fuse was furnished by defendant and carefully prepared for subsequent use. A bicycle was rented by defendant to enable the witness to escape from the scene of the intended crime. Careful preparations were made to enable an alibi to be proved for the witness in case they were suspected or charged with the crime, and on the night of the 19th of March, 1907, the witness, at the direction of defendant, took the bomb and fuse to the residence of Judge Ogden, about a mile distant from the residence of defendant, in which she remained, and, after observing that the residence of Judge Ogden was then occupied by members of his family (wife, four children, and a maid), placed the bomb upon the front porch of the house, carefully adjusted the fuse, lighted the same, mounted his wheel, and rode away to his home, where the defendant awaited his coming. The explosion occurred before the witness reached his home, and, though badly injuring the dwelling of Judge Ogden, did no harm to the unsuspecting members of the household sheltered therein, other than such as may have arisen from fright and nervous shock at the dastardly crime attempted against their home and, possibly, lives."

[1] In support of her present appeal, the defendant urges the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, and insists also that the trial court erred to her prejudice in its rulings upon the admission and rejection of evidence. Defendant's opening and closing briefs contain in the aggregate some 500 pages of typewritten matter, which is devoted chiefly to a discussion of the weight of the evidence and an attack upon the credibility of the several witnesses who testified upon behalf of the people. It would serve no useful purpose to set out in detail the many minute particulars in which the defendant claims the evidence to be insufficient to support the verdict. It will suffice to say that defendant's contention in this behalf is made up largely of references to slight and immaterial discrepancies and contradictions appearing in the testimony of some of the witnesses, all of which should have been and doubtless were, upon the argument of the case, called to the attention of the jury, and presumably duly weighed and considered by them when deliberating upon the question of the guilt or innocence of the defendant. In any event, the credibility of the witnesses was, in the first instance, a matter solely for the jury to determine; and finally, upon the hearing of the defendant's motion for a new trial, it was the right and duty of the trial judge, in weighing the sufficiency of the evidence upon which the verdict was had, to consider the credibility of the witnesses. The trial judge's determination of the question of such credibility is conclusive upon us.

Of the many objections made by the defendant to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, but one is worthy of more than passing notice; and that involves the point that the evidence shows the chief witness for the people, John B. Martin, to be an accomplice of the defendant, and that his testimony was not sufficiently corroborated to warrant a conviction.

[2-4] It must be conceded that the evidence shows clearly and conclusively that this witness was an accomplice of the defendant; but we are satisfied, after a careful reading of the record, that the evidence offered and received upon the whole case reveals ample corroboration of his testimony and fully justifies the verdict of the jury.

Among the many matters and things testified to by other witnesses, which as a whole tended strongly to support the testimony of John B. Martin, which was to the effect that the defendant instigated the crime and actively participated in its preparation, may be instanced the fact that shortly after the explosion there was found on the Ogden premises a copy of the Bulletin, a San Francisco evening newspaper, upon which was written the words "goode man." After her arrest the defendant was shown the newspaper by Detective Hodgkins, and asked if that inscription thereon was in her handwriting. The defendant denied all knowledge of the newspaper, and disputed that the handwriting thereon was hers. It was subsequently established on the trial by competent and sufficient evidence that the handwriting on the newspaper was that of the defendant. The circumstance that a newspaper containing the handwriting of the defendant was found at the scene of the crime shortly after the explosion may not, in and of itself, have been entitled to any weight as a piece of evidence; but, when considered in conjunction with the defendant's denial of all previous knowledge of the paper or the handwriting thereon, it had a strong tendency, we think, to show a consciousness of guilt on the part of the defendant, and to that extent, at least, tended to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime, and thereby corroborate the testimony of John B. Martin that, just previous to the commission of the crime, he had wrapped the dynamite which caused the explosion in a copy of the Bulletin, at the direction of the defendant.

Other evidence appearing in the record, which also tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense charged against her, is to be found in the testimony of several witnesses, which may be summarized as follows: The defendant, on more than one occasion previous to the explosion, openly manifested her malice and ill will toward Judge Ogden, which finally culminated in the threat that when she got through with the civil case then pending in the department of the superior court of Alameda county over which Judge Ogden presided she would "get" him. The defendant was familiar with the use of dynamite; and some time previous to the Ogden explosion had purchased in Weaverville, Trinity county, 25 pounds of dynamite, a portion of which, it was claimed by the prosecution, she wrapped in a mattress and shipped to her home in Oakland. Shortly after the explosion, the defendant's home in Oakland was searched by detectives, and they discovered, secreted in various parts of the house previously pointed out and designated by John B. Martin, not only dynamite and dynamite caps, but a piece of fuse similar to the fuse found upon the Ogden premises after the explosion. The defendant at first denied any knowledge of the fuse found in her home, but subsequently admitted to the detectives that it belonged to her.

Added to these and to the many other circumstances revealed by the record which point to the guilt of the defendant is the fact that some months after the explosion an anonymous letter was received by Judge Ogden, wherein the writer, referring to the dynamiting of his home, stated, among other things, that Judge Ogden was "nowhere near the true solution of the perpetrator of the dastardly deed. It was not done to revenge the cause you suspect; for I myself heard just such an attack planned and discussed, and this was carried out just as it was planned. It was not their intention to kill you then, only to cause you intense suffering by seeing your family and home destroyed, and your turn will come later on. * * *

When you pass into that other life, you will see that is why the avenger is following hard on your path, only waiting for time and strength to carry out their hellful designs. * * *

I have no means of knowing when the former attempt is to recur for I could not swear they did it, but it was all carried out just as I heard it planned and decided on."

When confronted with this letter by the detectives, the defendant denied all knowledge of it, and expressly declared that it was not in her handwriting. Upon the trial, however, it was fully established by expert evidence that the letter was written by the defendant.

The statute does not require that the evidence necessary to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice shall tend to establish the precise facts testified to by the accomplice; and strong corroborative evidence is not necessary to support a judgment of conviction founded upon the testimony of an accomplice. Even though the circumstances constituting the evidence offered and received in corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice be slight, such evidence is nevertheless sufficient to meet the requirements of the law if, in and of itself, it tends to connect the accused with the commission of the offense. People v. Barker, 114 Cal. 620, 46 Pac. 601; People v. Cleveland, 49 Cal. 577; People v. Clough, 73 Cal. 348, 15 Pac. 5.

Surely the several circumstances hereinbefore enumerated, in and of themselves, tended, in some slight degree at least, to connect the defendant with the crime charged against her, and, when taken altogether, abundantly corroborate the testimony of John B. Martin, not only that the crime was instigated by her, but that she actively aided and abetted its commission.

[5] The defendant complains of the ruling of the trial court, whereby the witness John B. Martin was permitted, over the objection of the defendant, to narrate a conversation which the witness had with the defendant on the evening of the crime and shortly before its commission, wherein the defendant in effect stated to the witness that she would hit him on the head with a sledge hammer, and then put a stick of powder under him and blow him up, if he failed to explode the dynamite on Judge Ogden's porch as she had directed. There was no error in permitting the witness to so testify. Clearly anything that the defendant may have said which had a tendency to show that she induced the commission of the crime charged against her was relevant and material to the issue of her guilty participation therein; and, being relevant and material for that purpose, such testimony was rightfully admitted in evidence, notwithstanding that it may also have tended to prejudice the defendant in the eyes of the jury by showing that she had little, if any, regard for human life, and that she possessed an abandoned and malignant heart.

There is no merit in the defendant's contention that the former judgment of conviction against her was reversed by this court because of the admission upon the first trial of testimony similar to that now complained of. This contention of the defendant is based upon an erroneous conception of the scope and effect of the decision of this court rendered upon the former appeal. The theory of the prosecution upon the first trial was that John B. Martin was not an accomplice of the defendant in the ordinary legal acceptance of the term, because, as it was claimed, he was inspired and compelled to commit the crime charged through fear of immediate death resulting from the duress and menace of the defendant. From this it was argued and successfully maintained upon the first trial that, although John B. Martin had in fact committed the crime, nevertheless, having committed it under the compulsion of the defendant, the law excused him from the criminality of the act, and he could not, as a matter of law, have been prosecuted and convicted as a principal, from which it followed that he was not an accomplice, whose testimony came within the rule requiring corroboration.

In support of this theory, the prosecution was permitted to show, over the objection of the defendant, that, by previous persistent intimidation and threats, the defendant had so completely dominated the will of the witness John B. Martin that he had at various times, prior to the dynamiting of the Ogden residence, committed numerous misdemeanors and felonies at the instigation of and under the coercion of the defendant. This court, in reviewing the evidence presented by the record on the former appeal, in effect found that there was no foundation for the claim that the witness John B. Martin was compelled to commit the crime charged while acting under the duress and menace of the defendant; but that, on the contrary, it was clearly shown that when he committed the crime he was not in any immediate danger to his life at the hands of the defendant; and that the defendant's threat of a future, remote, and contingent infliction upon him of death or great bodily harm did not, in law, constitute such duress and menace as would excuse the crime and dispense with the necessity for corroboration of his testimony.

No question of duress and menace was involved in the evidence offered and received in support of the prosecution's case upon the second trial. On the contrary, the prosecution proceeded solely upon the theory that John B. Martin was an accomplice of the defendant, and that his testimony was fully corroborated. True there was quoted in the former opinion of this court an excerpt from the testimony of John B. Martin given upon the first trial, which shows substantially the same testimony now complained of; but it is clear upon a first reading of our former opinion that the quotation of the testimony referred to was made, not because it was claimed or held that the admission of that precise piece of testimony was error, but solely for the purpose of making clear and emphasizing the point that in dynamiting the house of Judge Ogden the witness John B. Martin could not have been actuated by any fear of immediate danger to his life at the hands of the defendant; and that the only fear, if any, which impelled him to commit the crime was the fear that the defendant might at some future time, and in some remote place, kill him if he failed to do her bidding. Such fear, it was held, did not constitute duress to such an extent, and within the meaning of section 26 of the Penal Code, that it could be invoked as a valid legal defense for the doing of an act which was otherwise criminal. Accordingly it was further held that all of the evidence upon the former trial, relating to the defendant's brutal treatment of the witness John B. Martin, and her instigation of and active participation in numerous other crimes, had not the slightest relevancy to the question of her guilt or innocence of the crime for which she was being tried; and that therefore the defendant's objection to such testimony should have been sustained and her motion to strike out granted.

Numerous other points, many of them relating to the rulings of the trial court upon the admission and rejection of evidence, are presented and discussed in a haphazard way throughout the voluminous briefs of the defendant. Upon a patient and painstaking investigation of the record, we find that some of the objections relied upon were not made at the trial in the lower court, and that all of them are without merit and unworthy of detailed mention or discussion. We are satisfied upon a careful reading of the whole record that the second trial of the defendant was free from error, and that the evidence upon the whole case is amply sufficient to support the verdict and the judgment.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment and the order appealed from be, and they are hereby, affirmed.

REPUBLIC IRON & STEEL CO. v. PATILLO et al. (Civ. 1,016.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 20, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 931*)—PRESUMPTION.

Though the complaint, in an action on a bond given for protection of materialmen and laborers under a contract with a city for street improvement, does not allege, and it is not made the subject of any finding, that the bond was given under authority of the statute, yet, the city being only authorized to act under permission of statutory authority in making the improvement, and the bond being phrased according to the statutory authority, it must be assumed the contract was so made, and the bond given in connection therewith.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 347*)—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—CONTRACTOR'S BOND—ACTION BY LABORER OR MATERIALMAN—FILING OF CLAIM.

Under section 6½, added to the Vrooman street act (St. 1885, p. 147) by St. 1899, p. 23, requiring, in case of a contract for street improvement, the filing of a bond for the benefit of materialmen and laborers, and authorizing any of them, whose claim has not been paid by the contractor, to file with the superintendent of streets, within 30 days from completion of the work, a statement of his claim, and to commence action on the bond within 90 days after filing his claim, such filing is essential to a cause of action, and must be alleged in the complaint and found by the court.

3. BONDS (§ 35*)—STATUTORY BOND—COMMON-LAW OBLIGATION.

A bond given as a statutory bond cannot be considered as a common-law obligation.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 348*)—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—CONTRACTOR'S BOND—ACTION BY LABORER OR MATERIALMAN.

Under section 6½, added to the Vrooman street act (St. 1885, p. 147) by St. 1899, p. 23, authorizing a materialman or laborer, whose claim has not been paid, to file, within 30 days from completion of the work of a street improvement, his unpaid claim, and to commence his action on the contractor's bond within 90 days after such filing, the claim cannot be properly filed till completion of the work; and such action, if before such completion, or before such events as would make a showing of formal completion unnecessary, would be premature.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by the Republic Iron & Steel Company against J. N. Patillo and another.

Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant A. J. Sherer appeals. Reversed.

Arthur G. Baker and Edward Winterer, for appellant. W. W. Butler, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This action was brought against defendants as sureties on a bond given for the protection of materialmen and laborers, under a contract made by the Patillo Contracting Company with the city of Hollywood for the doing of certain street work. Defendant Patillo made default, and defendant Sherer has appealed from a judgment entered against him, and also from an order made denying his motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff in its complaint set out that the Patillo Contracting Company, on or about the 13th of August, 1909, entered into a contract with the street superintendent of the city of Hollywood, a municipal corporation, for the improvement of Highland avenue, a public street within said city; that contemporaneously with the execution of said contract the contracting company, as principal, and defendants, as sureties, executed and delivered to the city of Hollywood their undertaking in writing in the sum of $10,000, a copy of which was attached to and made a part of the complaint. It was then alleged that plaintiff furnished to the contracting company materials of the value of $1,085, for which said contracting company had refused to pay. A demand was alleged to have been made upon the contracting company and upon the defendants, as sureties, prior to the commencement of the action. The complaint contained no allegation as to any claim having been filed with the superintendent of streets of the city of Hollywood on behalf of the plaintiff within 30 days after the work of improvement was completed; neither did it appear from the complaint as to when such work was completed, if at all. Upon trial being had, the court made its findings in favor of the plaintiff, following the allegations of the complaint, and made no finding as to the time of completion of the work, or as to whether plaintiff had filed any claim with the superintendent of streets. In our opinion, these findings do not sustain the judgment.

[1] It must be assumed from the facts found that the city of Hollywood entered into the contract with the Patillo Contracting Company under authority of the statute permitting it so to do, and that the bond upon which appellant was a surety was given pursuant to such statute. Section 6½ of the Vrooman street act (St. 1885, p. 147), as amended in 1899 (Stats. 1899, p. 23), provides that where contracts for street improvement are made by a municipality a bond shall be required to be filed with the superintendent of streets, which bond shall be made to inure to the benefit of any and all persons, companies, or corporations who perform labor or furnish materials to be used in the work of improvement. It is provided further in this section as follows: "Any materialman, person, company, or corporation furnishing materials to be used in the performance of said work specified in said contract, or who performed work or labor upon the said improvement, whose claim has not been paid by the said contractor, company, or corporation, to whom the said contract was awarded, may, within thirty days from the time said improvement is completed, file with the superintendent of streets a verified statement of his or its claim, together with a statement that the same, or some part thereof, has not been paid. At any time within ninety days after the filing of such claim the person, company, or corporation filing the same, or their assigns, may commence an action on said bond for the recovery of the amount due on said claim, together with the costs incurred in said action." While it was not alleged in the complaint, nor made the subject of any finding by the court, that the bond was given under authority of the statute, considering that the municipality was only authorized to act under permission of statutory authority in making the street improvement, and, further, that the bond in its terms was phrased according to the statutory requirement, it must be assumed that the contract was so made and the bond given in connection therewith accordingly. San Francisco Lumber Co. v. Bibb, 139 Cal. 192, 72 Pac. 964.

[2, 3] With these considerations in mind, we then find a failure on the part of plaintiff to allege, and the court to find, that plaintiff had filed any verified statement with the street superintendent, setting forth the amount of its claim, within 30 days from the time the improvement was completed. It was necessary, in order that a cause of action might be stated, for the plaintiff to allege this fact and the court to make a finding thereon. It cannot be said that a compliance with the statutory requirement in this regard would prove of no benefit to the sureties, and that therefore it may be disregarded. The first answer that might be made to such a contention would be that, where street improvement proceedings depend upon statutory provisions as giving authority to make such contracts, persons claiming the benefit of such provisions must make substantial compliance with the requirements thereof. The second answer that may be made is that as to the sureties the filing of the verified claim with the public officer, showing that the bounden principal has failed to pay for materials, furnishes a means of notice to such sureties, and by timely action they may be able to protect themselves, where, without such notice, their remedy might be lost. That the bond, having been given as a statutory bond, cannot be considered as a common-law obligation is held in the case of San Francisco Lumber Co. v. Bibb, supra, and also in the cases of Shaughnessy v. American Surety Co., 138 Cal. 543, 69 Pac. 250, 71 Pac. 701, and Montague & Co. v. Furness, 145 Cal. 205, 78 Pac. 640.

[4] It may be added that, until the street improvement work had been completed, under the terms of the statute, the notice of plaintiff's claim could not have been properly filed; and any action brought on the bond prior to such completion, or before the occurrence of such events as might make a showing of formal completion unnecessary, would be premature.

For the reasons stated, we are of the opinion that the findings do not sustain the judgment, and that it must be reversed. In view of this conclusion, other points made by appellant need not be discussed, further than to say that we have considered the argument advanced to sustain them, and are of the opinion that none of those contentions possess substantial merit.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. MARUYAMA. (Cr. 372.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 20, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1160*)—APPEAL—REVIEW—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A jury finding in a criminal case, approved by the trial court's refusal to grant a new trial, will not be disturbed on appeal, though the evidence sustaining it is weak and unsatisfactory.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3084; Dec. Dig. § 1160.*]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 125*)—JOINDER OF OFFENSES—RAPE.

A single count in an indictment for rape properly charged that the crime was committed with a female under the age of consent, and with force and against her will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 334-400; Dec. Dig. § 125.*]

3. RAPE (§ 52*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

On appeal from a conviction under a count charging rape upon a female under the age of consent, by force and against her will, evidence tending to show that the crime was committed by force may be considered in support of the verdict, on objection that a finding that prosecutrix was under the age of consent was against the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 71-74, 76; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1168*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

On a trial for rape, it was not prejudicial error to permit the prosecution to identify a letter received by a witness from prosecutrix's father, where the letter was merely marked for identification and was not introduced.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 940*)—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—MATERIALITY.

Newly discovered evidence in a prosecution for rape, that prosecutrix was over the age of consent at the time of the offense, was immaterial, where the verdict appears to have been founded, in part at least, upon proof that the assault was committed with force.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

H. Maruyama was convicted of rape. From the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

David C. Clark, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

LENNON, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of rape. He has appealed from the judgment of final conviction, and from the order denying him a new trial.

The information charges the crime in two counts. While the first count proceeds in part upon the theory that the defendant committed an act of sexual intercourse with a female child under the age of 16 years, and not the wife of the defendant, it also charges that the defendant willfully, feloniously, and unlawfully made an assault upon the said female, and by means of force and violence accomplished with her an act of sexual intercourse, against her will and consent. The second count makes no mention of the age of the female; but it specifically states that the crime charged therein arises out of the same transaction upon which the first count is founded, and then proceeds to charge the crime solely upon the theory that it was committed by the defendant by means of force and violence, and against the will and consent of the prosecutrix. The jury found the defendant guilty as charged in the first count of the information.

[1] It seems to be the contention of the defendant that, because the first count of the information, under which the defendant was found guilty, specifically sets forth the age of the female, only the evidence offered and received in proof of her age can be considered in support of the verdict; and that, inasmuch as the testimony adduced at the trial upon the subject of the age of the prosecutrix was, as the defendant claims, doubtful and contradictory, the verdict must be set aside.

The contention of counsel for defendant that the evidence offered to prove the age of the prosecutrix was so weak and unsatisfactory as to be insufficient to support a verdict grounded solely upon the theory that the crime was committed upon a female under the age of consent is but an argument directed against the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses. There was some evidence, however weak and unsatisfactory it may have been, which tended to show that the female assaulted was under the age of 16 years at the time of the assault; and the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses ordinarily are questions, once the verdict of the jury has been rendered, solely for determination by the trial judge in passing upon a motion for a new trial.

[2, 3] If the first count of the information had merely charged the crime to have been committed upon a female under the age of 16 years, there would have been much force in the claim of counsel that, by the verdict of the jury, the defendant was acquitted of the charge contained in the second count. The first count of the information, however, did not confine itself to charging an act committed with a female under the age of consent, but set forth the accompaniment of force and violence and lack of actual consent. It includes and charges much more than the mere fact that the defendant accomplished an act of sexual intercourse with a female child under the age of consent. It charges, also, that he, by means of force and violence, did carnally know and ravish one Masaye Ita, and accomplish with her an act of sexual intercourse against her will and by force. The allegation that the crime was committed with a female under the age of consent was not inconsistent with the allegation that it was committed by force and violence, and against the will and consent of the prosecutrix. Both allegations were properly united in the first count of the information; and therefore the second count was a needless repetition, which might well have been omitted altogether. Under the facts alleged in the first count of the information, the prosecution was not limited merely to proof of the age of the prosecutrix. The jury having found the defendant guilty under a count in the information which in itself completely charged the crime under subdivisions 1 and 3 of section 261 of the Penal Code, the evidence offered upon the whole case which tended to show that the crime was committed by force and violence may be considered in support of the verdict. People v. Snyder, 75 Cal. 323, 17 Pac. 208; People v. Vann, 129 Cal. 118, 61 Pac. 776; People v. Jalles, 146 Cal. 381, 79 Pac. 965. Inasmuch as the evidence offered and received upon the whole case is amply sufficient, irrespective of the age of the prosecutrix, to show that the crime was committed by force and violence, and without the consent of the prosecutrix, it cannot be said that the verdict of the jury was founded solely upon the evidence adduced as to her age, or that it is not supported by the evidence adduced upon the whole case.

[4] There is no merit in the point that the trial court erred in permitting a witness for the prosecution, over the objection of the defendant, to identify a letter which he had received from the father of the complaining witness a few days prior to the commencement of the trial. In response to the objection of the defendant, the district attorney stated that it was not his purpose to introduce the letter in evidence at that time, and that his only purpose was to identify it and have it marked for identification for future use as evidence, if necessary. The district attorney was clearly within his rights in seeking to have the letter identified; and he was not compelled to offer it in evidence immediately upon its identification, or at any other stage of the case. Inasmuch as the letter was never thereafter introduced in evidence, we cannot conceive how the mere fact of its identification could have possibly prejudiced the defendant.

[5] It is contended that the district attorney was permitted, over the objection of the defendant, to exhibit to the jury the undergarments worn by the complaining witness at the time of the assault, without first offering the same in evidence. In that behalf the record, at the pages cited to us, shows merely that during the direct examination of the complaining witness she was permitted, without objection, to identify the undergarments worn by her at the time of the assault, and then to testify, also without objection, as to the manner in which they were torn from her body by the defendant. True the district attorney did not formally offer the garments in evidence; but, inasmuch as it was shown that they were worn by the prosecutrix at the time of the assault, that they were torn by the defendant in making the assault, that they were afterwards produced in court in the same condition as they were immediately after the crime was committed, which would have been a sufficient foundation for allowing them in evidence, the fact that they were not formally offered or received in evidence worked no injury to the defendant. People v. Amaya, 134 Cal. 531, 66 Pac. 794.

[6] Newly discovered evidence was one of the grounds of the defendant's motion for a new trial. The only showing made in that behalf was the filing of the affidavits of two Japanese, to the effect that each of the affiants knew the prosecutrix before she came to the United States, and knew her age, and that she was then, on November 24, 1911, of the age of 17 years and 6 months.

[7] This showing was wholly insufficient to warrant or justify the trial court in granting a new trial. Presumably the verdict of the jury was founded, in part at least, upon evidence that the assault was committed with force and violence, and against the will of the prosecutrix. In this view of the verdict, it is readily apparent that the age of the prosecutrix was of no consequence upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial. Testimony as to her age was not material in the face of the verdict, which was sufficiently supported by the proof of violence. Moreover, the alleged newly discovered evidence was at best accumulative, and would not in any event have been sufficient in and of itself, even if uncontradicted, to justify an acquittal of the defendant in the face of the evidence bearing upon other ingredients of the crime.

[8] In addition to all of this, there was absolutely no showing made that with reasonable or any diligence the testimony contained in the affidavits could not have been produced at the trial.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 20, 1912.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 121*)—SALE OF STOCK—ACTION FOR PRICE—PLEADING.

In an action for the price of certain corporate stock, it was not necessary that the complaint should allege that the contract sued on was founded on a consideration.

2. PLEADING (§ 7*)—MATTERS OF PRESUMPTION.

4. SALES (§ 340*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—SELLER'S REMEDY.

A seller of personal property, on the buyer's refusal to take the same and pay the price, may retain the property for the buyer and sue for the purchase price; acting as the buyer's agent, he may resell the property, and then recover the difference between the contract price and the price obtained at the resale; or he may treat and keep the property as his own, and recover the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place of delivery.

5. SALES (§ 369*)—CONTRACT—BREACH—SELLER'S REMEDY.

6. CORPORATIONS (§ 121*)—SALE OF STOCK—BREACH OF CONTRACT—ACTION—NATURE.

Plaintiff sued for breach of a contract to purchase certain stock, alleging that defendants promised to purchase the stock for $1,000 after one year from February 11, 1905, in the event plaintiff desired to sell, and that on February 11, 1906, plaintiff notified defendants that he desired to sell at that price, and tendered the stock, duly indorsed for transfer, but that defendants refused to pay for the same, notwithstanding plaintiff had kept and performed all of the conditions required of him by the contract. Held that, while such agreement at its inception was but a mere unilateral offer to purchase, lacking in mutuality, yet plaintiff's allegation that on the expiration of the time specified he promptly exercised his option to sell by acceptance of the offer to purchase, and then made an immediate tender of the stock, duly indorsed for transfer, showed a transformation of the offer into an unconditional contract of purchase and sale, so that, if after that time title vested at any time in the defendants, plaintiff could treat the transaction as closed and sue for the price.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 504, 505; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

7. CORPORATIONS (§ 121*)—SALE OF STOCK—CONTRACT—BREACH—ACTION.

Civ. Code, § 1411, provides that an offer to perform an executory contract for the purchase and sale of personal property is tantamount to a performance, and vests title to the thing sold in the buyer; that title is transferred by an executory contract of sale when the seller prepares the thing sold for delivery, and offers it to the buyer with the intent to transfer the title. Held that, where plaintiff averred that defendants agreed to purchase certain stock from him after a year from February 11, 1905, in the event plaintiff desired to sell, and that on that date plaintiff notified defendants that he desired to sell at the price stated, and tendered the stock, duly indorsed for transfer, to defendants, such offer to perform was sufficient to vest the title in defendants, so as to authorize plaintiff to sue for the price.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphey, Judge.

Action by A. Cuthill, Jr., against G. L. Peabody and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Welles Whitmore, for appellant. Ira S. Lillick, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered and entered in favor of the defendants upon an order sustaining defendants' demurrer to plaintiff's third amended complaint, without leave to amend.

The plaintiff sought to recover from the defendants the sum of $1,000 as the purchase price of 100 shares of the corporate capital stock of the Sunset Dredging & Development Company, which stock, it is alleged, the defendants contracted to buy from plaintiff.

The contract sued on is not alleged in the complaint to have been expressed in writing; nor is it pleaded in hæc verba. The gist of the action, however, is to be found in those allegations of the complaint wherein, in substance, it is averred that the defendants promised and agreed to purchase said stock from plaintiff for the sum of $1,000 "after one year from February 11, 1905" in the event that plaintiff desired to sell the same; that on February 11, 1906, plaintiff notified defendants that he desired to sell the specified stock at the price stated, and thereupon tendered the stock, duly indorsed for transfer, to the defendants, but that they refused to purchase or pay for the same, as agreed, notwithstanding that the plaintiff had kept and performed all of the conditions required of him by the contract.

It is apparent that the defendants' demurrer was sustained upon the ground that the facts pleaded did not constitute a cause of action.

In support of the demurrer, it is urged that the complaint is defective in not alleging that the contract in suit was founded upon an adequate or any consideration.

[1, 2] As a matter of pleading, the plaintiff was not required to allege that the contract sued on was founded upon a consideration. To be valid under the statute of frauds, the contract must have been in writing, and the law presumes that such a contract was in writing. Presumptions of law need not be pleaded; and in the present case the presumption that the contract was in writing necessarily followed the allegation of its making. Brennan v. Ford, 46 Cal. 7; Emerson v. Bergin, 76 Cal. 202, 18 Pac. 264; Broder v. Conklin, 77 Cal. 336, 19 Pac. 513; Regan v. Justice's Court, 75 Cal. 255, 17 Pac. 195; Barnard v. Lloyd, 85 Cal. 131, 24 Pac. 658; Bradford v. Joost, 117 Cal. 204, 48 Pac. 1083.

[3] Every contract expressed in writing carries with it the presumption of a consideration for its execution; and the burden of showing a want of consideration is upon the party who seeks to avoid the contract. Civ. Code, §§ 1614, 1615; Williams v. Hall, 79 Cal. 606, 21 Pac. 965; Henke v. Eureka Endowment Association, etc., 100 Cal. 429, 34 Pac. 1089; Rogers v. Schulenberg, 111 Cal. 281, 43 Pac. 899. Presumptively the contract sued on in the case at bar was expressed in writing; and, that being so, the further presumption that it was founded upon a consideration necessarily follows as a matter of law; and therefore it was not necessary to a good complaint that the consideration for the contract should be specifically pleaded.

The defendants' contention in this regard is based in part upon the assumption that the plaintiff is seeking relief by the remedy of specific performance, and that therefore plaintiff's complaint should allege and show, not only an adequate consideration for the contract, but that, as between the parties thereto, it was fair and just.

The complaint, however, contains none of the essentials of a cause of action for the specific performance of a contract for the purchase of personal property; and as it is readily apparent from the allegations of the complaint that the plaintiff is not seeking specific performance of the contract, it will be neither necessary nor profitable to follow counsel for defendants in his discussion of what is required to constitute a good complaint in an action for specific performance.

Plaintiff's complaint evidently proceeds upon the theory that the contract for the sale of the stock was fully executed upon the exercise of the option to sell, and that when delivery of the stock, duly indorsed for transfer, was tendered to the defendants, title to the same at once became vested in them, and that upon their refusal to pay the plaintiff, electing to consider the stock as sold, was entitled to recover the purchase price thereof.

[4] Ordinarily the vendor of personal property, upon the refusal of the vendee to take the property and pay the agreed price therefor, may resort to one of three remedies, viz.: (1) Standing on the sale, the vendor may retain the property for the vendee and sue for the purchase price; (2) acting as the agent of the vendee, the vendor may resell the property, and then sue to recover the difference between the contract price and the price obtained on the resale; or (3) the vendor may treat and keep the property as his own, and recover from the vendee the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place of delivery. 2 Sedg. on Dam. (8th Ed.) § 753; Lewis v. Greider, 49 Barb. (N. Y.) 606; Polen v. LeRoy, 30 N. Y. 549; Dustan v. McAndrew, 44 N. Y. 77.

[5] Of course, in a case where the title to the property contracted for has not passed to the vendee, the vendor, upon a breach of the contract, would have no cause of action for the purchase price. In such a case the vendor would be compelled to recoup his loss, if any, solely by an action for damages founded upon a breach of the vendee's contract to accept and pay for the property. Civ. Code, § 3311.

If, in the present case, the sale was completed, and the title to the property sold had actually, or in contemplation of law, passed to the defendants, plaintiff was within his rights in electing to sue for the purchase price of the stock; and the sufficiency of the facts stated in the complaint to constitute a cause of action for the recovery of the purchase price, rather than for damages for breach of contract, depends upon whether or not the pleaded facts show a completed sale, with title to the property sold in the defendants at the time the action was instituted. Civ. Code, § 3310; Lassing v. James, 107 Cal. 348, 40 Pac. 534; Bement v. Smith, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 493.

[6] While it may be conceded, as contended by counsel for defendants, that the contract in controversy was at its inception but a mere offer to purchase, and therefore unilateral and lacking in mutuality, nevertheless if it be a fact, as alleged in the complaint, that plaintiff promptly, upon the expiration of the time specified in the contract, exercised his option to sell by an acceptance of the offer to purchase, and then made an immediate tender of the stock, duly indorsed for transfer, the original contract was thereby and thereupon transformed from a mere offer to purchase into an absolute, unconditional binding contract of purchase and sale; and from that time on, if title to the stock had vested in the defendants, the plaintiff was justified in treating and suing upon the completed transaction as if it were an ordinary contract of purchase and sale. Civ. Code, § 3310; Keller v. Ybarry, 3 Cal. 147; Lassing v. James, supra; Los Angeles, etc., Co. v. Wiltshire, 135 Cal. 658, 67 Pac. 1086; Cook on Stockholders, § 334; Bement v. Smith, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 493; Sedg. on Dam. 282; Struthers v. Drexel, 122 U. S. 487-493, 7 Sup. Ct. 1293, 30 L. Ed. 1216.

[7] It seems clear to us that the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint are sufficient to show that title to the stock was transferred to and vested in the defendants. By the provisions of section 1411 of the Civil Code, an offer to perform an executory contract for the purchase and sale of personal property is tantamount to performance, and vests the title to the thing sold in the vendee. That section in substance provides that the title to personal property is transferred by an executory contract for the sale thereof when the seller prepares the thing sold for delivery, and offers it to the buyer with the intent to transfer the title thereto to the buyer. That, in substance, is what the plaintiff alleges he did in the case at bar; and if it be true, as we think, that the defendants' original offer to purchase was merged into a completed contract of sale by the plaintiff's acceptance of the defendants' proposal, and that a tender of delivery vested title in the defendants, then it must follow that the plaintiff's complaint states a cause of action for the purchase price of the stock. Orr v. Bigelow, 20 Barb. (N. Y.) 21; Bement v. Smith, supra; Lassing v. James, supra.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to overrule the defendants' demurrer and require them to answer.

KEEFE v. KEEFE et al. (Civ. 1,095.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 20, 1912.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 86*)—ADEQUACY OF OTHER REMEDIES.

The contract on which one conveyed to his mother his interest in real estate, that she would return it to him at her death, entitles him to specific performance, she not having done so, and not having sold the land; the remedy at law being inadequate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 223, 224; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 36*)—STATUTE APPLICABLE.

Though the agreement on which one conveyed land to his mother, that at her death she should return it to him, was oral, yet under it, the land being impressed with the qualities of a resulting trust in the hands of those to whom she devised it, the four years' limitation, and not the two years' limitation, for action on an oral contract applies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 168-181; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

3. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 122*)—RETROACTIVE OPERATION.

The amendments of Civ. Code, § 1624, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, to require contracts of a certain nature to be in writing, are not retroactive, with the effect of making void a prior oral contract, valid when made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 271; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

4. WILLS (§ 58*)—CONTRACT TO DEVISE.

The rights of one with whom his mother agreed that at her decease she would leave certain property to him are the same as though she expressly agreed to make a will in his favor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 164, 165; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

5. PLEADING (§ 72*)—COMPLAINT—PRAYER.

A complaint showing plaintiff may be entitled to judgment in damages states a cause of action, though its allegations do not show he is entitled to the relief demanded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 143, 144; Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

6. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 58*)—GROUNDS.
Objection that a complaint does not state a cause of action is not available on motion for nonsuit.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 241*)—OBJECTIONS BELOW—NONSUIT.

Variance, not having been specified as one of the grounds of motion for nonsuit, is not available in support of a judgment of nonsuit on appeal therefrom. It should have been called to plaintiff's attention that he might remedy it.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Charles Ignatius Keefe against Elizabeth A. Keefe and others. Judgment for defendants; plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Arthur W. Perry and Henry Conlin, for appellant. Bartlett & Langdon and Cullinan & Hickey, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon an order of nonsuit in an action to enforce specific performance of an agreement alleged to have been made between plaintiff and his mother, Susan Keefe, deceased, where she promised to make a certain provision for him in her will.

Michael Keefe, the plaintiff's father, died intestate leaving at the time of his death two parcels of valuable real estate in the city and county of San Francisco, which estate was community property. One-half of his property was given his widow, Susan Keefe, and the other one-half descended to the five children of Michael and Susan Keefe. As one of such children, plaintiff's interest in the estate was therefore one-tenth.

At the time of the death of Michael Keefe, the plaintiff was in military service to the United States, and stationed in the Philippine Islands. With a view to looking after his interest in the estate, he secured his discharge from the army, went to San Francisco, called upon his mother, the administratrix of the estate, and demanded his share of the property left by his father. The property was still in probate, undistributed, and this request, of course, could not be complied with. The next day, at the request of Susan Keefe, she and the plaintiff met at the office of her attorney. There were also present her attorney, and her daughters, with whom she was at the time living, and who are the principal beneficiaries under her will. After considerable conversation, the plaintiff was ultimately persuaded to make a transfer of his interest in his father's estate to his mother for her better maintenance and protection during her life, with the understanding that upon his mother's death his share in his father's estate would be returned to him.

Susan Keefe died in San Francisco March 12, 1909, leaving a last will and testament, according to the terms of which she in effect failed to carry out her contract with the plaintiff. Her will was subsequently, to wit, April 6, 1909, admitted to probate, and on April 14, 1911, this action was commenced.

Upon the trial thereof, as before stated, a judgment of nonsuit was entered against the plaintiff. The motion for nonsuit was made upon the following grounds: (1) That the cause of action asserted by the complaint on the contract alleged and sought to be established and specifically enforced is barred by section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. (2) That the contract sought to be established and specifically enforced is within subdivision 7 of section 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure. (3) That the contract alleged is not specifically enforceable.

Taking up the last ground of the motion first, defendants contend in effect that equity ought not to interpose and grant relief in this case, because the contract is vague and indefinite, and because the plaintiff may be fully and adequately compensated in money for the breach of the alleged contract.

The testimony shows that immediately upon the plaintiff's arrival in San Francisco he, at the suggestion of his mother, met her at the office of her attorney; that the attorney asked him if he had received a letter requesting him to deed his share of his father's estate to his mother, and, upon receiving a reply in the affirmative, asked him what he was going to do about it. Plaintiff replied that he was going to take his share of the estate; whereupon his mother commenced to cry, and said, "Charlie, are you going to take my property? * * * Charlie, you will be getting old one of these days, and if you take your share you will only squander it. Let me have it, and I will give it back to you on my death." He told his mother that upon those conditions she could take it. At this point the attorney came forward with the deed, and said: "Charlie, remember, now, this share that you are giving to your mother will be given back to you on her death." "These are the conditions," said the plaintiff, "upon which I am going to give it to my mother."

The attorney, who was a witness for the plaintiff, testified that at this meeting he explained to plaintiff that the latter's two sisters had conveyed, or were going to convey, their interests to their mother, and it was desired that he should do likewise, in order that his mother might have an income for the rest of her life sufficient to keep her comfortable; that to this plaintiff was agreeable, but that he did not want the property sold. In reply the witness informed him that his mother considered the land in question a fine piece of property, producing a good income, and had no idea of selling it; that nevertheless, if plaintiff conveyed his share to her, it would be hers absolutely, and if so advised she might sell it. In effect the plaintiff still objected; but when he was informed that, if he persisted in receiving his share, his mother would not hold the land with him, and that it could be sold in partition proceedings, he finally acquiesced in making a deed to her, with the understanding that the share so conveyed should be returned to him on his mother's death.

Prior to receiving a conveyance of their interest in the land from all of her children, the mother made a will in which she stated that it was proposed that her sons and daughters should deed to her their five-tenths interest in their father's estate, and in the said will she devised and bequeathed to each of her children, who should thus convey to her their said interest, a one-tenth interest in her estate. This will was subsequently revoked, and another one executed in which the mother left all her property to her daughters.

[1] We think the contract disclosed by the evidence is neither uncertain nor unenforceable in equity. Even if Susan Keefe had sold the land perhaps, under a fair interpretation of the contract, the plaintiff would have been entitled to a one-tenth interest in the proceeds; and possibly in that event the proceeds would have been in such shape that an action at law would have been entirely adequate. But under the circumstances presented by the evidence it is quite clear, we think, that Susan Keefe agreed to return to the plaintiff, at the time of her death, his one-tenth interest in this land, provided she had not in the meantime sold the same. She did not sell the property; she failed to keep her contract, which is definite, certain, and valid. He was therefore entitled to some remedy; and, as land was the subject-matter of the agreement, as well as of this suit, the inadequacy of the legal remedy is well settled, and the jurisdiction of equity firmly established. Cordano v. Feretti, 15 Cal. App. 670, 115 Pac. 657; 2 Pom. Eq. Rem. § 745.

[2] As before indicated, this action is based upon an oral contract; and, if it is governed by the provisions of section 339, limiting the time to commence actions on such contracts to two years, it is, of course, barred. But under the terms of the contract the property involved is impressed with the qualities of a resulting trust in the hands of the defendants. Duvall v. Duvall, 54 N. J. Eq. 581, 35 Atl. 750; Best v. Gralapp, 69 Neb. 811, 96 N. W. 641, 99 N. W. 837, 5 Ann. Cas. 491; 2 Pom. Eq. Rem. § 746; 1 Underhill on Wills, § 286. See cases cited in note to Johnson v. Hubbell, 66 Am. Dec. 787. In such a case an action may be brought at any time within four years. Hecht v. Slaney, 72 Cal. 363, 14 Pac. 88; Piller v. S. P. Ry. Co., 52 Cal. 42; Chapman v. Bank of

Cal., 97 Cal. 155, 31 Pac. 896; Nouguls v. Newlands, 118 Cal. 102, 106, 50 Pac. 386.

[3] Since this contract was made, sections 1624 of the Civil Code and 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure have been amended so as to require contracts like this one to be in writing; and at the trial defendants insisted that this contract came within those sections as amended. They have not pressed the point in this court, and may be deemed to have abandoned it, as well they might; for it is wholly without merit. The case was not within the sections as they read at the time this contract was made. Stewart v. Smith, 6 Cal. App. 152, 91 Pac. 667. And certain it is that the amendments should not have a retroactive effect, and operate to make void a contract valid at the time of its execution. 29 Am. & Ency. of Law, 814; 20 Cyc. 281.

[4] There is no merit in the suggestion that there was no agreement to make a will. It is sufficient that Susan Keefe promised to leave the property to the plaintiff at her decease. Best v. Gralapp, supra.

[5, 6] One other matter is suggested in the brief of respondent, which we will notice. While it may be that the allegations of the complaint do not show that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief demanded, still, if it shows, as is admitted by the defendants, that he may be entitled to a judgment in damages, it follows, of course, that the complaint states a cause of action. Swan v. Talbot, 152 Cal. 142, 94 Pac. 238, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1066. But, even if the complaint did not state a cause of action, this objection could not be availed of on a motion for nonsuit. Pacific Pav. Co. v. Vizeleck, 141 Cal. 410, 74 Pac. 352.

[7] If the allegations of the complaint and the proof do not correspond, there is a variance; but, the defendants not having specified this as one of the grounds of their motion for nonsuit, we cannot here consider it for the first time. The attention of the plaintiff should have been called to the supposed defect, so that he might have an opportunity to remedy it, if he desired. 1 Hayne on New Trial and Appeal [Revised Ed.] §§ 115, 116, pp. 561 and 577.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 95*)—EXECUTORS' SALE—EXCUSE FOR DELAY.

Where plaintiff's action to set aside an executors' sale, made in good faith for value to an innocent purchaser, was not brought until nearly 20 years after she reached her majority and 33 years after the sale, her mere want of knowledge of the sale, when all the proceedings were of record and could have been discovered by inquiry, did not excuse her long delay, nor prevent the action from being barred by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1573, 1574, providing that no action shall be brought to set aside an executor's sale, unless commenced within three years after final settlement, or discovery of the grounds for setting it aside, or within three years after the removal of any legal disability; and it was immaterial whether the purchaser was in possession of the land.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 517*)—COLLATERAL ATTACK—CONFIRMATION OF EXECUTORS' SALE.

The confirmation of an executors' sale by a court of competent jurisdiction in a decree finding that the sale was without notice, but interpreting the will to authorize sale without notice, was not subject to collateral attack in a suit instituted long afterwards to set aside the sale, nor could the correctness of such interpretation of the will be inquired into; it being essential to any such attack and inquiry to consider the terms of the will—a course not permitted in a collateral proceeding.

All intendments are in favor of the validity of the judgments of courts of general jurisdiction and of the jurisdiction of such courts to render a particular judgment.

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 138*)—SALE—NOTICE.

An executors' sale of land pursuant to Probate Act (St. 1851, p. 470) § 177, in effect in 1872, which provides that notice shall be given by an executor of the sale of a testator's estate, unless there are special directions given in the will, in which case he shall be governed by such directions, and also pursuant to a will which makes no specific directions as to whether the sale shall be with or without notice, but provides that the executors, within a reasonable time and when they think it advisable to do so, shall sell the property, is not invalid, though no notice of the sale is given.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Mary C. Bagley against the City and County of San Francisco and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John Hubert Mee, for appellant. Olney, Pringle & Mannon and Page, McCutchen, Knight & Olney, for respondent Walker. Edwin T. Cooper, for respondent Bennett. A. H. Redington, for respondents Redington. Solomon Bloom, for respondent David C. Bloom. Stoney, Rouleau & Stoney, for respondents Solomon Bloom and others.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought to quiet title to certain real property in San Francisco, and the judgment in favor of defendants was rendered upon an agreed statement of facts. It appears that, on November 9, 1869, one Charles F. Hamilton and Monroe Greenwood became the owners of the premises by virtue of a deed from the city and county of San Francisco. Hamilton died on November 14, 1872, leaving a will, by which he disposed of all of his personal property and directed, in a codicil thereto, that his executors sell all of his real property in the city and county of San Francisco and invest the proceeds thereof in United States government bonds for the benefit of his widow, Mary C. Hamilton, and his only child, Mary C. Hamilton, now Mary C. Bagley, plaintiff herein. The will was admitted to probate on December 3, 1872, and the executors, acting under the authority contained in said codicil proceeded, on March 3, 1875, to sell the real property at private sale and without any notice to the public. The executors rendered to the court a proper return and account of the sale, showing that they had sold to Monroe Greenwood, for the sum of $3,991, the various tracts of land described in the return, and they prayed for an order of confirmation. At the hearing of the return, on March 19, 1875, after proper notice given, the court appointed Timothy D. Reardon attorney to represent the minor heir in the proceeding and made its decree, adjudging that "said sales were duly made under the powers conferred on said executors under the will of deceased, and that the same are hereby confirmed, approved, and declared valid, and said executors are hereby authorized and empowered to execute conveyances of said land to said purchaser upon receiving the purchase price aforesaid." The court found that "said sale was at private sale, and no notice of the time or place of said sale was given previous to the sale," and "that the executors were fully authorized and empowered by said will to sell the estate of the deceased without any order of court, and that said sales were legally made and fairly conducted, and that the sums bid for said lots were not disproportionate to the value thereof, and that a sum exceeding such bids by at least 10 per cent. cannot be obtained." A deed of the interest of said estate to Monroe Greenwood was executed by the executors on the 25th day of March, 1875, and recorded in the office of the county recorder on April 2, 1875. The defendants thereafter, by payment of what was considered the full value of said property and without knowledge of any claim of plaintiff, succeeded to all the right, title, and interest of Greenwood in and to the premises in controversy. On April 29, 1875, a decree of final distribution was made in the estate of Hamilton, which, after distributing certain personal property not involved herein, distributed all of the rest, residue, and remainder of the property of the decedent, whether then known or discovered, to the widow of deceased and plaintiff herein, share and share alike; no specific mention being made in said decree of any real property. A certified copy of said decree was recorded the same day in the county recorder's office. Monroe Greenwood and his successors in interest have paid all taxes levied or imposed upon the property and also all street assessments.

With the exception of the pieces claimed by W. P. Redington, George M. Rolph, and Margaret Jane Walker, the property involved has at all times been vacant, open, unfenced, uncultivated, and unused. On December 1, 1907, W. P. Redington and George M. Rolph inclosed by a substantial fence the land claimed by them, and, between the 1st day of July and the 1st day of November, 1907, Margaret Jane Walker built substantial improvements upon the lot claimed by her, of the value of $11,000; but these improvements were made without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff. Plaintiff made no claim to any of the property until February 1, 1905, and since that date she has asserted her right to an undivided one-fourth interest therein. As to her claim, the various defendants had no knowledge, other than such knowledge as was imparted by the public records of the various documents set forth in the agreed statement of facts. At the time of the said probate sale, plaintiff was of the age of four years. She reached her majority in 1889, and she brought this action 19 years thereafter, to wit, on the 11th day of January, 1908.

The answers denied plaintiff's title, averred ownership in defendants, pleaded the statute of limitations as embodied in sections 318, 343, and 1573 of the Code of Civil Procedure, set up the facts in reference to said probate sale, and presented, also, the defense of laches and estoppel.

All the various contentions made and argued by counsel in their exhaustive briefs revolve about the vital consideration as to the legal effect of the said probate sale made by the executors to Greenwood. In fact, appellant's cause is grounded upon the proposition that "the attempted sale in probate to Monroe Greenwood was a nullity, for the reason that it was made at private sale and without notice as required by law." The basis for the contention is that the law in force at the time of the death of Hamilton controlled the proceeding, and that its mandate required the executors to give notice of the sale. Section 177 of the Probate Act (St. 1851, p. 470), in effect at that time, November 14, 1872, directed that, "if the testator shall make provision by his will, or designate the estate to be appropriated for the payment of his debts, the expenses of administration or family expenses, they shall be paid according to the provisions of the will and out of the estate thus appropriated, so far as the same may be sufficient," and the following section, 178, as amended by St. 1861, p. 645, provided that "when such provision has been made, or any property directed by the will to be sold, whether for payment of debts, or expenses, or for any other purpose, the executor or administrator with the will annexed may proceed to sell without the order of the probate court but he shall be bound, as an administrator, to give notice of the sale, and to return accounts thereof to the court, and to proceed in making the sale in all respects as if it were made under the order of the court, unless there are special directions given in the will, in which case he shall be governed by such directions; but in all cases, no sale shall be valid unless confirmed by the court under the rules prescribed in cases of sales of real estate by an administrator." The clause of the will involved herein is: "And I declare it to be my desire that my executors within a reasonable time, and when they think it advisable to do so, to sell all my real estate in the city of San Francisco, and invest the proceeds from such sale in United States government bonds." It is contended that this does not amount to a direction for the sale of any real property, and, since there is no provision in the will for the payment of debts, expenses of administration, or family allowance, the case is not brought within the exception that obviates the order of sale by the court and the notice required by the statute; or, at any rate, if said language of the will is construed as equivalent to a direction to sell, it was still necessary to give the proper notice to make the sale valid.

Against this view thus generally stated are opposed various contentions of respondents, among them, that the action is barred by section 1573 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that, having received the purchase money for the said probate sale, appellant is deemed to have ratified the proceeding, and it is now too late for her to question it; that the failure to give notice of said sale is not a defect that can be taken advantage of in a collateral attack; that the law in effect at the time of sale, and not that at the time of the death of the testator, applies, and under said law no notice was required; and that, under a fair construction and reasonable application of said section 178 of the Probate Act, as it stood in 1872, the sale must be held to be regular and valid.

Said section 1573 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads as follows: "No action for the recovery of any estate sold by an executor or administrator, under the provisions of this chapter, can be maintained by any heir or other person claiming under the decedent, unless it be commenced within three years next after the settlement of the final account of the executor or administrator. An action to set aside the sale may be instituted and maintained at any time within three years from the discovery of the fraud, or other grounds upon which the action is based." Section 1574, following, provides that "the preceding section shall not apply to minors or others under any legal disability, to sue at the time when the right of action first accrues; but all such persons may commence an action at any time within three years after the removal of the disability."

[1] As we have seen, 19 years elapsed after plaintiff ceased to be a minor before she brought the action, and this was 33 years after said probate sale. It thus appears that plaintiff is unmistakably brought within the clearly expressed inhibition of said statute of limitations, unless it can be said that, by reason of the want of actual knowledge of the claim of respondents, the bar of the statute does not operate against her. The portion of the stipulated facts in point is as follows: "The said Monroe Greenwood and his grantees and his successors in interest after him claimed ownership of said real property under said will and probate proceedings and other documents hereinbefore set out, but as to said claims plaintiff had no knowledge, other than such knowledge as can be imputed to her from the existence of the records hereinafter set out and referred to, * * * until the commencement of this action." It might be claimed, therefore, that, since plaintiff acquired knowledge of the probate sale within 3 years of the beginning of the action, this circumstance constitutes one of the "other grounds upon which the action is based," and that she is thus brought within the exception provided for in said section 1573. But the want of actual knowledge of the sale does not justify her long delay in bringing the action. The burden was obviously cast upon her to excuse her ignorance of the proceedings in her father's estate. They were matters of public record, and it was her legal duty, at least after reaching her majority, to make inquiry concerning them. If she had so inquired, the result would have been the discovery of the fact that this identical property was sold in 1875, for its full value, by the executors of her father's estate, and she would have known that, in order to maintain an action to recover said property, or any portion of it, she must proceed not later than 1892. The situation, in brief, is simply this: With the means of knowledge available, and without offering any excuse for her failure to make inquiry, plaintiff waits for nearly 20 years after reaching her majority and then institutes proceedings to set aside a sale made to an innocent purchaser for value by the executors of her father's estate in the utmost good faith and by virtue of a purported power in the will, and afterwards confirmed by a solemn decree of the court. No judicial tribunal, with proper regard for vested interests and that wise public policy which fosters the stability of titles, should allow her want of actual knowledge of the adverse claims to operate, under such circumstances, to protect her from the bar of the statute. In Dennis v. Bint, 122

Cal. 39, 54 Pac. 378, 68 Am. St. Rep. 17, the action was to recover possession of a tract of land and to set aside a sale thereof made in probate, and it was stated in the opinion by Commissioner Britt, referring to the same statute of limitations, that "it is further claimed that the case is taken from the operation of the statute by the averment that the grounds of the action were discovered within a year next before the commencement of the suit. Aside from other considerations which may bear on this point, the statement of the complaint is insufficient for the purpose claimed, because unaccompanied by any explanation of the failure to acquire knowledge earlier—so as regards the adult plaintiffs, at least." If a mere allegation in the complaint of the want of knowledge is insufficient, clearly a stipulation of like import falls short of meeting the requirement of the rule. The Chief Justice, in his concurring opinion, discusses the matter at length, and declares that "under this section [1574, supra] I think it appears from the complaint that the action of the two plaintiffs herein, who were more than three years past their majority when the original complaint was filed, was barred, and that the ruling of the court sustaining the demurrers as to them was correct, and that the judgment as against them should be affirmed upon this ground alone. They are not saved by their allegation that the facts upon which their action is founded came to their knowledge within three years of the commencement of the action, because they offer no explanation or excuse for their ignorance."

In Moore v. Boyd, 74 Cal. 171, 15 Pac. 671, it is said: "For the purposes of the statute of limitations, if the means of knowledge exist, and the circumstances are such as to put a man of ordinary prudence on inquiry, it will be held that there was knowledge of what could have been readily ascertained by such inquiry. This rule is applied both in equity (New Albany v. Burke, 11 Wall. 107 [20 L. Ed. 155]; National Bank v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 576 [25 L. Ed. 815]) and at law (Bailey v. Glover, 2 Wall. 349 [22 L. Ed. 636]; Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 141 [25 L. Ed. 807])."

The effect of the corresponding section 190 of the Probate Act received consideration in the early case of Harlan v. Peck, 33 Cal. 515, 91 Am. Dec. 653. The only substantial difference between the language of that section and the provision before us is that the former required the action to be brought within three years next after the sale, instead of the settlement of the final account as now. In the Harlan Case the court, through Mr. Justice Sanderson, said: "Whether this language embraces sales which are made under order of the probate courts which are void for the want of jurisdiction, or only such sales as are merely voidable, is the question. There is nothing in the policy or language of the statute which excludes void sales from its operation. The policy of the statute is to quiet titles to real estate sold by order of the probate courts. In view of that policy merely, there can be no distinction between sales which may be termed void for the want of jurisdiction and those which are voidable only. Nor is there anything in the language of the statute which creates such a distinction. * * * To the phrase in question there is added no qualification; and hence, if it restricts the limitation at all, it excludes all sales which are not 'according to the provisions of the chapter,' which includes voidable as well as void sales." The authority of this case is recognized in subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court, and it would probably be admitted as decisive of the controversy, were it not for some expressions used in the opinion found in Gage v. Downey, 94 Cal. 241, 29 Pac. 635, and in Campbell v. Drais, 125 Cal. 253, 57 Pac. 994. But those cases in their facts are so dissimilar to the case at bar that they can be of little, if any, assistance here. The distinction is clearly pointed out by respondents, and it is manifest that these cases are not inharmonious with the other decisions of the Supreme Court.

In the Gage Case the defendants did not claim under the probate sale at all. They set up a sale to a man by the name of Carlisle, with whom they were not in privacy. The sale to Carlisle was unquestionably void, and the contention of defendants was that plaintiff could not recover of them because there had been a void probate sale to a stranger, which sale had remained untacked for more than three years. The decision is grounded upon the well-known doctrine that the statute of limitations creates a personal privilege that may be waived, and that, in order to be available, it must be claimed by one upon whom the privilege is conferred.

While not actually determined by the court, it seems to have been conceded that if the action had been against Carlisle he might have urged successfully the statute of limitations; the court stating: "Here it is conceded that no title vested in Carlisle under the probate sale, and that the facts exist which, under this section of the Code, deprive plaintiffs of the right to bring an action for the recovery of the land"—that is, as against Carlisle. Appellant calls attention to the fact that in the Gage Case, supra, the purchaser under the probate sale had not taken possession of the property, and that this circumstance was considered of some importance by the court. But it is obvious that the court was considering this particular statute of limitations in connection with the question of title. The purpose was to make the position plain that a void sale of itself could not create and it would not ripen into title, no matter how much time had elapsed, but that, under the provisions of the statute, it could be set up simply as a bar to prevent the assertion of title in another. It occurred, however, to the author of the opinion that, if possession were taken under a void sale, then the purchaser might assert title in himself. This is true, because occupancy confers a species of title which may be purchased and sold, and for the recovery of which an action may be maintained against one having no better title (section 1006, Civ. Code; King v. Gotz, 70 Cal. 240, 11 Pac. 656); and possession, when adverse, as is well known, may ripen into a perfect title. This accounts for the expression in the opinion: "It appears that Carlisle never entered into possession of this land under his purchase, and to hold that, under the circumstances as here depicted, the interest of the heirs was transferred to Carlisle would be novel in the extreme; but we do not deem it necessary to discuss that question." The case does not decide that, in order to take advantage of this statute of limitations, the purchaser must enter into actual possession of the property. This would be adding something that the Legislature has not provided. Of course, there may be circumstances where the question of possession would affect the application of the statute, but to agree with appellant's contention here would be to exclude unoccupied land altogether from the operation of said section 1573 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We can find no warrant for this position.

In the Campbell Case, supra, it was held that the probate sale to one Hewitt was void. He held and occupied the premises for a few days and, on March 11, 1874, he conveyed the land to one Cross, who occupied it till February, 1876, when he conveyed the whole in severalty to one Church, who had entered into possession of the property and was occupying it at the time of the trial. While Cross was in possession, he allowed the widow of John A. Campbell, deceased, to build a house upon a portion of the land and to occupy it with her minor children, and in 1876 Church married the widow, and the children continued to live there with Church and their mother. They were raised and treated by Church substantially as if they had been his own children, and he recognized their interest in the property, and, before the execution of the mortgage under which appellants claimed, he said to all the plaintiffs that they owned one-half of the property, and he told the mortgagee that the children owned one-half and called his attention to an abstract of title showing that fact, and the mortgagee thereupon agreed to take the mortgage with the knowledge that, although it covered the whole title to the land, yet it probably would be good for only an undivided one-half. All the plaintiffs had attained their majority a little more than three years, and the final account of the administration of the estate of Campbell had been settled more than three years, before the commencement of the action. It was therefore argued that the action was barred by section 1573 of the Code of Civil Procedure; but the Supreme Court held that it had no application, since "plaintiffs had no cause of action against Church, for he acknowledged their title and was holding for them as a tenant in common, and they could not have litigated their title in the foreclosure suit because they held by a paramount title, and not under the mortgagor."

Neither of these cases can be said to favor the addition of a new element to the said statute, or to manifest a purpose on the part of the Supreme Court to depart from the plain and unequivocal language of the legislative intent.

[2] But the contention of appellant in effect is that the executors, by reason of their failure to give notice of the sale, did not properly exercise the power committed to them by the will. This question, however, as already indicated, was determined by the court in a solemn judgment confirming the sale, and it cannot be again litigated in this collateral proceeding. There is no dispute that the statute required the court to determine whether the sale was valid. By virtue of the decree, whose terms have already appeared, the court did determine that the sale was legally made, and that the executors, in making the sale, properly exercised the power conferred upon them by the will of the deceased. It cannot be doubted that the court had jurisdiction to render this decree. The will had been admitted to probate; it contained a direction to the executors as to the sale of the real property; they had proceeded to make a sale, and had filed in the court a proper return, which, after due notice, came on for hearing. The court found, it is true, that no notice of the sale was given by the executors; but the court so interpreted the will that no notice was required, and appellant now seeks, more than 30 years thereafter, to reverse that ruling. The only possible question of controversy before the court was the proper construction of the will, as to whether it authorized the executors to sell without notice. The court determined that it clothed the executors with that power, and if we are to attribute to judgments their necessary incidents it must be held that the construction of the will can no longer be open to dispute. If the decree showed upon its face that it was necessarily invalid, a different question might be presented; but it cannot be declared, from an inspection of the decree, that the judgment was even erroneous—much less that there was any want of jurisdiction on the part of the court. To reach even the conclusion that the court committed an error in confirming the sale, we must travel beyond the decree and consider the terms of the will; in other words, a part of the evidence upon which the court based its judgment. This is not permitted in a collateral proceeding. Emery v. Kipp, 154 Cal. 83, 97 Pac. 17, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 983, 129 Am. St. Rep. 141, 16 Ann. Cas. 792. But if we were to do so the result would be, under well-established principles, to leave the judgment undisturbed and unaffected by this action.

[3] Of course, "all intendments are in favor of the validity of judgments of courts of general jurisdiction, and the jurisdiction of such courts in rendering a particular judgment is conclusively presumed to have been acquired, unless the record itself shows to the contrary." Morrissey v. Gray (Sup.) 124 Pac. 246.

There would be more plausibility in appellant's contention if there were no pretense of power to sell conferred by the will, and her claim would undoubtedly possess merit if such power were prohibited by law; but no situation of that kind is presented.

The two cases cited by respondents, Richardson v. Butler, 82 Cal. 174, 23 Pac. 9, 16 Am. St. Rep. 101, and Zilmer v. Gerichten, 111 Cal. 73, 43 Pac. 408, affirm the principle that is applicable here to the said judgment of confirmation. In the former, the action being to quiet title, one of the contentions was that notice of the probate sale was not posted as required by law; but the Supreme Court, through Mr. Justice McFarland, said: "The probate court, in its order confirming the sale, declared that the notice was posted in three public places. Respondent introduced evidence against the objection of appellants, with intent to show that one of the places was not a public place, within the meaning of the Code. But surely the court, having jurisdiction of the proceeding, could, within that jurisdiction, find the fact that the place was a public place; and such finding cannot be attacked collaterally." Furthermore, we may adopt as peculiarly appropriate in this case the following language of the court: "It may be remarked that there is no pretense that the sale under which appellants claim was in fact fraudulent, or without adequate consideration, or in any way unfair. To the objections made to it may well be applied that often abused word 'technical'; and we do not think they are sufficient to overturn, for want of jurisdiction, the solemn judgment of a court, or to destroy a title to realty honestly acquired."

In the Zilmer Case, supra, it is said that, "conceding, however, that the proceeding for confirmation of the sale was irregular as claimed, and that notice of the sale was not published for the time required by the order of the court, yet these irregularities or errors in the exercise of unquestionable jurisdiction would not invalidate the sale nor the administrator's deed to the extent of making them vulnerable to the collateral attack made upon them in the court below. Jurisdiction existing, any order or judgment is conclusive in respect to its own validity in a dispute concerning any right or title derived through it, or anything done by virtue of its authority."

The vice of appellant's argument, let it be repeated, is in the assumption that the court confirmed the sale in the face of an affirmative showing that the notice required by the statute was not given; whereas the truth is the court determined that, under the provisions of the will, no notice was required, and thus was effect given to the intent of the testator as found by the court. This judicial construction of the will is as effective now as it would be if it had been made in a decree of distribution, instead of an order confirming the probate sale.

In the cases cited by appellant, there was either a direct attack upon the judgment, or else it appeared that the court had no jurisdiction, either of the person or of the subject-matter; and hence the judgment was void.

In Townsend v. Tallant, 33 Cal. 45, 91 Am. Dec. 617, the order to show cause why the sale should not be made was not published four weeks as required by the statute. The statute indubitably required such publication, and the probate court, in its order confirming the sale, expressly found that the order to show cause had been duly advertised for three weeks. It was held that the order confirming the sale was without jurisdiction, and could be collaterally attacked. The court said, through Mr. Justice Shafter: "The sale being void, there was no subject-matter upon which the order of confirmation could act. If the court had no jurisdiction to order the sale, it had none to confirm it. Where there is no power to render a judgment or to make an order, there can be none to confirm or execute it, or none, at least, without the help of legislation." The order to show cause is the process in this probate proceeding, and it is manifest that a compliance with the mandate of the statute as to its service is as indispensable to the jurisdiction of the court as an obedience to the requirement of the law as to jurisdiction of the person, where reliance is had upon the publication of summons in an ordinary action.

So in Smith v. Olmstead, 88 Cal. 582, 26 Pac. 521, 12 L. R. A. 46, 22 Am. St. Rep. 336, there was a sale under a power conferred by the will of one Z. B. Smith, deceased; but it was properly held that the sale did not transfer an interest upon which the will did not operate; that the pretermitted child succeeded "immediately by operation of law to the same portion of the testator's real property as if no will had been made; that as to such portion the testator is to be regarded as dying intestate, and its succession is directed by law, and not by the will. And as a necessary legal consequence of this contention, it would follow that every provision in the will directly or indirectly attempting to dispose of such portion of the estate, except for the discharge of the decedent's debts, or other charges accruing in due course of administration, is inoperative as against such child." The court concluded that "the order of confirmation imparted no validity to the sale in this case; it only adjudicated that the power contained in the will had been followed, and that the sale was for a fair price." If we accept this as a correct statement of the effect of the order of confirmation, it is manifest that it sets at rest the disputed point here, as the vital question is whether the "power contained in the will has been followed."

Again, it would seem that the manner in which the power of sale shall be exercised—in other words, the mode of procedure for the execution of the authority conferred on the executors—should be determined by the provisions of the statute in force at the time of the sale, rather than by the law as it existed at the time of the death of the testator. The position of appellant is that at the time of the death of Hamilton the title to the real property vested in his devisees, subject only to such conditions of administration as the statute imposed at that time, and that the Legislature could not enlarge those conditions or divest or impair the title of said devisees by subsequent legislation. The theory is sound; but it is believed that it has no application to the situation here. In brief, whether, technically speaking, there was or not an equitable conversion of the real into personal property at the time of the death of the testator, it is at least true that the devisees took the real estate subject to the power of sale vested in the executors, and the amendment of the statute left this interest unaffected, but dispensed with the necessity for giving notice of the sale, thereby simply changing the form of procedure for the enforcement of a right or the exercise of a power that was created by the will. The law, as it existed at the time of the sale, provided that "when property is directed by the will to be sold, or authority is given in the will to sell property, the executor may sell any property of the estate without order of the court, and at either public or private sale, and with or without notice, as the executor may determine; but the executor must make return of such sales, as in other cases; and if directions are given in the will as to the mode of selling, or the particular property to be sold, such directions must be observed. In either case no title passes unless the sale be confirmed by the court."

The case in principle is not unlike Murphy v. Farmers', etc., Bank, 131 Cal. 115, 63 Pac. 368, 731, where it was held that "a subsequent statute, permitting a mortgage of the unadministered estate to pay the debts, passed after the death, does not create a new burden, nor interfere with the vested rights of the heirs, but provides merely for a change in the form of the burden, which is within the power of the Legislature."

The cases cited by appellant, as pointed out by respondents, relate to statutes which increased the instances in which the power of sale might be exercised, or enlarged the powers of the executor conferred by the will. An example is afforded in the leading case of Brenham v. Story, 39 Cal. 179. At the time of the death of the intestate in that case, the law allowed the sale of the real property of an estate only for the purpose of paying the debts of the deceased, for the support of the family, or for the expenses of administration. While the estate was being administered, the Legislature passed a special act authorizing the administrator, at his discretion, to sell any portion of the real estate of the deceased held or owned by him at the time of his death as in the judgment of the administrator would best promote the interest of those entitled to the estate. A sale under this act was held to be invalid, for the obvious reason that it impaired the vested rights of the heirs. The court said: "Upon the death of the ancestor, the heir becomes vested at once with the full property, subject to the liens we have mentioned; and, subject to these liens and the temporary right of possession of the administrator, he may at once sell and dispose of the property, and has the same right to judge for himself of the relative advantages of selling or holding that any other owner has. His estate is indefeasible, except in satisfaction of these prior liens; and the Legislature has no more right to order a sale of his vested interest in his inheritance, because it will be, in the estimation of the administrator and the probate judge, for his advantage, than it has to direct the sale of the property of any other person acquired in any other way."

[4] But, conceding that the sale must be tested by the law of procedure as it existed at the time of the death of Hamilton, still, under a reasonable construction of the power of sale conferred by the will, it cannot be held that the sale was invalid. The act, as it was in 1872, provided, as we have already seen, that the executor was bound to give notice of the sale, "unless there are special directions given in the will, in which case he shall be governed by such directions." While there are no specific directions as to whether the sale shall be with or without notice, it is fairly inferable that the testator intended to leave this for the executors to determine. He expressed his desire that his executors, "within a reasonable time and when they think it advisable to do so," sell the property. The discretion to sell when they should consider it advisable plainly implies an option to sell without the delay that would be caused by giving notice. As to this, the case of Larco v. Casaneuava, 30 Cal. 560, is somewhat instructive. The land in controversy there was sold under a power conferred by the will, as follows: "I hereby appoint my brother, Francisco Casaneuava, my executor of this my last will, with power to sell, dispose of and convey all my said property, both real and personal, for the benefit of my said sister, without obtaining any order of any court therefor." The law then, as far as notice of the sale is concerned, was the same as in 1872, and there was no more explicit direction in said will as to the manner of sale than in the case at bar. It was held, however, that the sale was valid without regard to a compliance with the provisions of the statute; the court saying: "The language is broad and general, and clearly shows that the intent of the testator was to withdraw his estate from the operation of the probate act and vest in his executor full power to convert in his own way the estate into cash for the benefit of his sister." The specific point that the sale was made without notice does not appear to have been urged, but the record shows that an objection was made to the sale, on the ground that there was not shown "a compliance with the law in any respect as to sales by executors," and therefore the deed was void. The logic of the decision, though, necessarily involves the proposition that, under such donation of power to the executor, he is not required to give any notice of the sale. The language of the power here is somewhat different, but it seems equally potent to clothe the executors with authority to sell the real estate at their discretion.

It may be said, finally, that there is respectable authority for holding that the want of notice of the sale is not jurisdictional, and does not invalidate the order of confirmation. In Blackman v. Mulhall, 19 S. D. 534, 104 N. W. 250, the Supreme Court of South Dakota held that "the failure to publish notice for the required time did not render the proceedings void, but only irregular, and this irregularity does not affect the validity of the sale in this collateral proceeding."

In McNair v. Hunt, 5 Mo. 309, the Supreme Court of Missouri declared that, although the law required notice of the sale to be given, yet, in the absence of notice, the sale was merely voidable, and could not be questioned in a collateral suit.

In Matheson's Heirs v. Hearin, 29 Ala. 210, the court declared that a certain sale made by the administrator under a "purported order of the orphan court was a judicial sale; and that, although there may be irregularities in it, such as the omission of the administrator to give the notice of it directed by law, it is not void, and cannot be collaterally impeached for such irregularities."

In Burris v. Kennedy, 108 Cal. 331, 41 Pac. 458, it is held that, under the statute, the filing of a petition for an order of sale and the giving of notice of the hearing of the petition are jurisdictional and essential to the power of the court to order the sale; but if the court has thus acquired jurisdiction errors afterward in the exercise of it, however gross, will not render the decree invalid, and that if the court erred in ordering a private sale, instead of a public sale, as it ought to have done, this was mere error, and did not affect the validity of the sale. Here, as we have seen, no order for the sale was required, and the foregoing case would seem to be authority for the position that the fact of the sale being private—that is, without notice—is not jurisdictional. There is, of course, a distinction between this circumstance and the service of the order to show cause why an order of sale should not be made. The latter is without doubt a jurisdictional matter.

For further discussion of the question of jurisdictional defects, reference may be had to the following cases: Dennis v. Winter, 63 Cal. 16; Richardson v. Butler, 82 Cal. 174, 23 Pac. 9, 16 Am. St. Rep. 101; Smith v. Biscailuz, 83 Cal. 359, 21 Pac. 15, 23 Pac. 314; Zilmer v. Gerichten, 111 Cal. 73, 43 Pac. 408; Ions v. Harbison, 112 Cal. 260, 44 Pac. 572; Matter of Devincenzi, 119 Cal. 498, 51 Pac. 845.

It is believed that no substantial reason has been or can be advanced why a court of equity should disturb these titles that have been unquestioned for so many years, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

SCHWARTZ v. CALIFORNIA GAS & ELECTRIC CORPORATION et al.

(Sac. 1,827.)

Rehearing Denied Aug. 31, 1912.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 140*)—INJURY TO HORSE—
INSTRUCTIONS—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

In an action for injuries to a horse, caused by its stepping on a broken insulator which, it was claimed, defendant's employes dropped while working on one of its poles, where the undisputed evidence showed that the insulator, at the time of the accident, was 60 feet in one direction and 72 feet in the other direction from any pole of defendant's, an instruction that defendant was not liable, unless its employes negligently placed the insulator on the premises and at the point where the horse was injured, was improperly denied, and a modification thereof, only requiring a finding that it was negligently placed at some point where injury might result, was improper, since the evidence justified an inference that the insulator had been moved between the time it was dropped and the time of the accident.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 371, 377; Dec. Dig. § 140.*]

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 62*)—INJURY TO HORSE—
PROXIMATE CAUSE—INTERVENING CAUSE.

If an employe of defendant negligently dropped on plaintiff's premises a glass insulator, but it was afterwards picked up by some one else and moved to the place where plaintiff's horse was injured by stepping on it, the negligence of the employe was not a proximate or concurring cause of the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 76-79; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

3. NEGLIGENCE (§ 62*)—PROXIMATE CAUSE—INTERVENING CAUSE.

A negligent act, which would not have resulted in injury except for the intervention of an independent cause, does not give rise to a cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 76-79; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 191*) — INSTRUCTIONS—CHARGES ON FACTS.

In an action for injuries to a horse, caused by its stepping on a broken insulator, a requested instruction that defendant was not liable, unless its employé negligently placed the insulator at the place "where the evidence shows said horse was in fact injured," was not improper as a charge on the facts, since it did not assume any fact as proven, but stated what must be shown to justify a verdict for plaintiff.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; N. A. Hawkins, Judge.

Action by Eliza J. Schwartz against the California Gas & Electric Corporation and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Wm. B. Bosley and John P. Coghlan (Chas. W. Thomas, of counsel), for appellants. Arthur C. Huston and Harry L. Huston, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought to recover damages for injuries to a horse, known as "Joe Terry," belonging to plaintiff, caused, it is alleged, by the horse stepping upon or against an insulator dropped by an employé of defendants upon a tract of land in Yolo county, known as the "Van Zee Place," occupied by plaintiff at the time of such injuries. The jury gave a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $6,475.00, for which amount judgment was entered. An appeal was taken by defendants from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. Two decisions have been rendered on these appeals by the District Court of Appeal for the Third district, the judgment and order being reversed by the first decision on account of error of the trial court in refusing an instruction as requested by defendants, and giving the same in a modified form; and, a rehearing having been granted by said court, the judgment and order were affirmed by the second decision. An application for a hearing in this court was then granted.

We are of the opinion that the first decision of the District Court of Appeal was correct. It is essential to a proper understanding of the question presented in the matter of said instruction that a statement be made as to some of the facts.

The defendants maintained and operated an electric transmission line, consisting of poles, crossarms, wires, and insulators along certain highways in Yolo county, and the line passed the Van Zee place just outside the city of Woodland. In the summer and early autumn of the year 1906, the line was reconstructed by defendants, new insulators put in on many poles, and every alternate pole removed, making the distance between poles 264 feet, instead of 132 feet, which was the distance prior to the reconstruction. At the time of this work, the Van Zee place was occupied by one L. E. Hutchings. A portion of this place consisted of an inclosed parcel of land fronting on the road, on which was a house, and another adjoining inclosed parcel, on which was a barn. The land inclosed with the barn was known as the barnyard or corral. The land inclosed with the house was known as the houseyard and old vineyard. The vineyard portion fronted on the road, and contained some 10 or 12 rows of vines, varying, according to the testimony of Mr. Schwartz, the husband of plaintiff, from two inches to three feet in height. The inclosed portion containing the vineyard was not used by Mr. Hutchings for stock. Some time in November, 1906, plaintiff leased from Mr. Hutchings the two parcels of land we have referred to, and went into occupancy thereof. On April 10, 1907, plaintiff's husband turned the horse into this old vineyard portion while his stall was being cleaned. A few minutes later, the stall having been cleaned, he went after the horse to take him back. He testified: "As I started to halter him, he bit at me, and I stepped back. I stepped back and corrected him for attempting to bite me. I held the halter for him to put his nose in, and the horse, in stepping back to put his nose in the halter, moved back and came in contact with something, which I found afterwards was a broken insulator." The insulator was similar to those in use on defendants' line at the time the reconstruction work was done, some of which were then removed. They had an 11-inch porcelain top, shaped something like a saucer, and a glass center, about 9 inches long, and weighed about 12 pounds. Mr. Schwartz said that the saucer part of this insulator was whole, and laid next to the ground. The result of the contact of the horse with this insulator, the glass part of which was broken, was, according to Mr. Schwartz, that the horse was severely cut on the right hind foot between the hoof and the fetlock. The horse was a stallion and valuable only for breeding purposes, and there was testimony sufficient to sustain a conclusion that he was thereby rendered useless for such purposes. There was testimony, given by one William Weight, who was over 80 years of age, and who was employed by Hutchings on the Van Zee place at the time of such reconstruction work in the summer and autumn of 1906, to the effect that he saw one of the men engaged in such work drop an insulator from the crossarm of one of the poles into this vineyard, and that the insulator fell into the vineyard at the northwest corner, some seven or eight feet from the fence. This testimony was given some two years after the accident to the horse. He said that he saw the insulator in the vineyard many times thereafter, "passed it nearly every day," but did not pick it up, because it did no harm there, and that they were not using the vineyard for stock. It was clearly established that the horse was injured in the northwest corner of the vineyard, and Mr. Schwartz said that the insulator was at a point two or three feet from the north fence and between six and ten feet from the west fence, which was the road fence. Evidence introduced by the defendants was very clear to the effect that at the time this work was done by the defendants the nearest pole to the northwest corner of the vineyard on one side was 60 feet and on the other side 72 feet. Mr. Hutchings, then and for many years prior occupant of the place, testified in effect that there had been no change in the poles, except that every other pole was taken out; and his testimony and that of Mr. Ashley, taken together, is clearly to the effect already stated. This evidence was in no way contradicted, except in so far as it was inferentially contradicted by the evidence of Mr. Weight, to which we have already referred.

In the light of these facts, which we have stated as strongly in favor of plaintiff as the record warrants, the District Court of Appeal in its first opinion declared in part as follows:

"Many points are made for a reversal of the judgment. Most of them are without merit, some of them probably involve error without prejudice; but one necessitates, as we view it, a new trial of the action.

[1] "Defendants requested the court to instruct the jury as follows: 'You cannot find for the plaintiff in this case, unless you believe from the evidence: (1) That plaintiff's horse was injured by an insulator, the property of defendants. (2) That the employes of defendants negligently placed said insulator on the premises where, it is claimed, said horse was injured, and at the point where the evidence shows said horse was in fact injured.' As given by the court, the second subdivision was modified to read as follows: 'That the employes of defendants negligently placed or permitted said insulator to remain on the premises where, it is claimed, said horse was injured, and at a point where the evidence shows some injury might result.'

"In the language of appellants: 'As proposed, this instruction limited responsibility to the placing of the insulator at the point where the horse was injured. The modification made the defendants liable if they placed it anywhere on the premises.'

[2] "The proposed instruction was based upon the theory that an intervening, independent agency may have been the proximate cause of the injury. It seems plain that if appellants carelessly dropped the insulator upon the premises and did not remove it they would be guilty of negligence; but after it was dropped, if somebody else picked it up and moved it to this spot where the damage was done, it was the negligence of the latter that proximately caused the injury.

[3] "It would not be a case of correlative and concurring causes, but of proximate and remote agencies independent of each other. The rule is well settled that 'an injury is not actionable which would not have resulted from the act of negligence, except for the interposition of an independent cause.' Chicago, etc., Ry. Co. v. Elliott, 55 Fed. 949 [5 C. C. A. 347, 20 L. R. A. 582]; Cole v. German Savings & Loan Society, 124 Fed. 115 [59 C. C. A. 593, 63 L. R. A. 416]; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Schriver, 141 Fed. 550 [72 C. C. A. 596, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 678].

"In the Cole Case, supra, it appears that the plaintiff entered and passed along a hall in the building of the defendant to take the elevator, the well or shaft of which opened into the hall. A boy, who was a stranger to her and to the defendant, hurried past her in the hall, pushed the sliding door of the well of the elevator, which was open from one to ten inches, back as far as it would go and stepped back. The plaintiff supposed the boy was the operator of the elevator, and stepped in. The elevator was at an upper floor in charge of its regular operator, and plaintiff fell to the bottom of the well and was injured. The hall was so dark that it was difficult, but not impossible, to see the elevator when it was at the lower floor; and when it was not there nothing but darkness was visible in the well. It was held that the negligent acts and omissions of the defendant were not, and those of the strange boy were, the proximate cause of the injury. "The latter constituted an independent, intervening cause which interrupted the natural sequence of events between the negligence of the defendant and the injury of the plaintiff, insulated the defendant's negligence from the plaintiff's hurt, broke the causal connection between them, and produced the injury.' The negligence of the defendant in that case, as stated by the court, consisted of permitting such a degree of darkness in the hall, of allowing boys to ride upon and sometimes operate the elevator, of neglecting to provide a lock for the door, which would prevent any one from unlocking it from the outside, and of permitting the door to stand open from one to ten inches. Defendant there was indeed guilty of gross negligence; but it was held not to be the proximate cause of the injury.

"In Berry v. S. F. & N. P. R. R. Co., 50 Cal. 435, it was held that the injury done to plaintiff's wheat by the hogs of third persons was not the direct damage resulting from the trespass of defendant in destroying a portion of plaintiff's fences, by reason of which the hogs obtained access to said premises.

"In Lofthus v. De Hall, 133 Cal. 214 [65 Pac. 379], the action was brought to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff, an infant seven years of age, from falling into a cellar of defendants, situated on a vacant lot in the city of Los Angeles. The defendants were the owners of the lot, which was located in a populous and thickly settled quarter of the city. Upon the lot had stood a house, which had been removed leaving upon the premises a cellar partially filled with debris. The premises were left in an open and unguarded condition. The plaintiff lived in the neighborhood of the lot, and, upon the day of the accident, was engaged with other children in playing around the cellar, and while so engaged was by her younger brother pushed into the cellar, sustaining the injuries complained of. It was held by the court that his act was the proximate cause of the injury, and that 'it was not in her play and as part of her play and in ignorance of the danger of her play, but she was injured by the violence of her little brother in a matter apart.' The foregoing are a few of many cases illustrating the operation of an independent, proximate cause producing injury, and they seem to be in harmony with the principle embodied in said proposed instruction here.

"Of course, if there were no evidence in the record tending to support said theory, the court's action would be adjudged entirely without prejudice. While there was no direct evidence that any third party moved said insulator, circumstances do appear from which a rational inference might be drawn to that effect; and therefore it was a proper question to submit to the jury. The only witness who testified that he saw the insulator fall from the pole was one William Weight, an old man past 80, who admitted his eyesight was bad. He testified that he was employed on the Van Zee place during the summer and forepart of the fall of 1906, when it was occupied by Lee Hutchings. 'During that time men worked on the electric pole line. They were changing insulators and putting up wires, and one of the men dropped an insulator into the northwest corner of the vineyard. The man was on a crossbar when he dropped the insulator, which was as large as a cuspidor.' Other evidence shows clearly that the nearest pole to the northwest corner of the vineyard was 60 feet, and in another direction there had been one 72 feet from the corner. The insulator weighed 12 pounds, and the poles were 30 feet high. It was therefore quite a probable inference that within the eight or nine months intervening before the accident some other party moved the insulator, as it could not have 'dropped' to a point on the ground sixty or seventy feet from the foot of the pole.

[4] "To this complaint by appellants of the action of the court in refusing said instruction, the only answer made by respondent is as follows: 'The modification of instruction 18 was proper, because the instruction as proposed was erroneous, in that it was an instruction as to the facts. The language of subdivision 2 of the instruction was a straight statement that the evidence shows that the horse was not injured.' In this respondent is clearly in error. The instruction is altogether hypothetical; it does not assume any fact as proven, but states what must be shown to justify a verdict for plaintiff. The point seems to be a vital one in the case, and it is believed that the defendants were entitled to the instruction, and for this reason the judgment and order are reversed."

Learned counsel for plaintiff ably and earnestly assailed this opinion and the consequent judgment of reversal in their petition for a rehearing in the District Court of Appeal, and in their brief filed subsequently in this court; but we believe that it correctly disposes of this appeal. Some of the points so made by counsel are sufficiently disposed of by such opinion. We are of the opinion that the requested instruction was not an instruction as to the facts, and that it correctly stated the law applicable in view of the testimony. We are satisfied that none of the instructions given the jury substantially covered the subject-matter of the requested instruction, in so far as the same referred to the question of an intervening, independent agency. We do not consider Merrill v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 158 Cal. 499, 111 Pac. 534, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134, in any way opposed to our conclusion herein.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

SLOSS, J., deeming himself disqualified, does not participate herein.

HALL v. CLARK. (L. A. 2,860.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 3, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—REVIEW—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A finding on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3935-3937; Dec. Dig. § 1002.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 228*) — NEGLIGENCE—DIRECTIONS TO EMPLOYÉ.

An employé is not warranted in obeying a direction involving danger to him, unless he acts under duress or coercion, if the danger is so obvious and serious that no ordinary prudent person of similar age and experience would obey the order; and this rule is unchanged by Civ. Code, § 1970, as amended in 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 119), which provides that knowledge by an employé injured by the defective or unsafe character of machinery, etc., shall not bar recovery for injury caused thereby, unless it appears that he fully understood the dangers incident to the use of the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 670, 671; Dec. Dig. § 228.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—NATURE OF QUESTION.

Ordinarily it is a jury question whether an injured employé was guilty of contributory negligence in obeying an order which involved danger to him; but the facts of the particular case may make it a question of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1089-1132; Dec. Dig. § 289.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 245*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—OBEDIENCE TO ORDER.

A teamster was guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law, in obeying an order to drive his team and wagon into an excavation about four feet deep, where the embankment was perpendicular at that point, and there was a runway at another point, down which he could have driven safely.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George E. Church, Judge.

Action by C. H. Hall against Wesley Clark. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Anderson & Anderson and Gibson, Trask, Dunn & Crutcher, for appellant. E. B. Drake, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In an action for damages for personal injuries, plaintiff had verdict for $1,600, and judgment was given him for that amount. This is an appeal by defendant from such judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Substantially, the case made by the complaint was as follows: Plaintiff was in the employ of one Crandall, a contractor, as a teamster, and was in charge of a three-mule gravel wagon of Crandall. Under a contract with Crandall, defendant had charge and control of plaintiff and his mule team and wagon, using them in making an excavation in a lot of land on the corner of Pico street and Vermont avenue, in the city of Los Angeles. While plaintiff was engaged in this work on May 14, 1909, he was negligently directed and required by defendant's foreman, in charge of the work, to drive said team and wagon into said excavation, which was about four feet deep, and by reason of obeying said order the wagon became uncoupled, and its bed fell upon him, causing the injuries for which compensation is claimed. At the time the said foreman directed him to drive into said excavation, plaintiff by reason of his inexperience in such work, did not fully understand, comprehend, and appreciate the danger of so doing, while said foreman, by reason of his long experience in such business, did realize and know such danger. The answer of defendant denied the allegations of the complaint and set up the defense of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff.

While it is suggested by appellant that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, that point is not pressed. It is earnestly claimed, however, that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the verdict, in that it shows, as matter of law, that plaintiff either was guilty of contributory negligence, or assumed the risk of injury in doing the act resulting in the accident.

Plaintiff was 26 years of age, and testified that he had driven a team all his life practically, hauling wood, rock, and sand, handling a horse and wagon, and that he knew pretty well about horses and wagons on good roads, but that he had only about two weeks' experience in excavating. The dimensions of the excavation where he was working at the time of the accident were 57x84 feet. His duty was to drive his team into this excavation, there help load his wagon with earth, and drive out with his load. A driveway or "runway" into the excavation existed, along which the wagons could safely be taken down. Plaintiff's wagon was what was called a "patent gravel wagon" with four wheels. There was a front running gear and a king bolt which held the front gear to the remainder of the wagon. The wagon was not over 10 feet long, exclusive of the pole. The three mules were worked abreast. Plaintiff had worked at this place for three days before the accident. According to his testimony, the accident occurred as follows: Seated on his empty wagon, he was about to drive into the excavation by a runway on the easterly side of the excavation, when defendant's foreman told him to drive around to a place on the southerly side. When he reached that place, the foreman told him that there was the place he wanted him to drive down. He said that there was no runway, no "slanting place" there, but "just a straight embankment" $3\frac{1}{2}$ or 4 feet deep. "It was almost straight up and down." He stopped his team and asked the foreman: "Where? Off here?" The foreman answered, "Yes." He said, "I can't drive off there." The foreman asked him, "Why?" and he said, "It will hurt the mules." The foreman answered: "Never mind that. That is where I want the wagon over there." Thereupon he drove over the edge. Two of the mules were "almost wild" and "did not need any persuading to make them go." The mules "jumped off"; the front gear of the wagon very naturally dropped down when the wheels thereof no longer had earth upon which to rest, and in some way became uncoupled from the rest of the wagon, which followed the front gear over the edge; the plaintiff jumped from his seat, and the wagon turned over, pinning him to the ground and breaking one of his legs.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

He further testified: "I didn't consider it was a dangerous place if the foreman instructed me to drive in it. I relied on him and his direction." Plaintiff's testimony was corroborated as to the direction given him by the foreman by two witnesses.

[1] On the part of the defendant there were several witnesses, including the foreman. Their evidence was to the effect that no such direction was ever given to the plaintiff as was testified to by him and his witnesses; that, in fact, plaintiff was proceeding to drive into the excavation near a driveway, when the foreman called to him, "Come around the corner and go into the driveway straight," and he answered, "This is all right," and went on down into the excavation, with the result already stated. So far as the number of witnesses, at least, was concerned, the preponderance of testimony on that point was with defendant. In view of the verdict of the jury, however, we must accept as true the testimony of plaintiff and his witnesses in regard to the matter of direction by the foreman, and have stated the substance of the evidence given in behalf of the defendant solely to show that there was nothing therein to support a conclusion in favor of plaintiff. The verdict must find its whole support in the testimony of plaintiff and his witnesses, the material parts of which we have stated.

For the purposes of this appeal, we have, then, a case in which the plaintiff, an adult and a teamster of experience, in obedience to the direction of the defendant's foreman in charge, deliberately drove his three-mule team and empty gravel wagon over the edge of an excavation at a point where the side of the excavation was practically perpendicular and from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 feet high, when he actually had knowledge of these conditions and was not acting under such circumstances as would warrant a conclusion that he was acting under coercion or duress.

[2] It is thoroughly settled that an employé is not warranted in following the direction of an employer, except where he acts under what, under the law, amounts to duress or coercion, where the danger to be encountered in doing so is at once so obvious and so serious that no ordinarily prudent person of similar age and experience, situated as was the employé, would have obeyed the order; and that, where the rules as to contributory negligence and assumption of risk are such as they were in this state at the time of this accident, the employé receiving personal injuries by reason of following such direction cannot recover damages therefor from his employer. See 1 Labatt on Master and Servant, § 442. It is not disputed by counsel for plaintiff that this was the law in this state prior to the amendment of section 1970, Civil Code, in 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 119), by which the Legislature added to that section, among other things, a provision that knowledge by an employé injured by the defective or unsafe character of any machinery, etc., shall not be a bar to recovery for any injury caused thereby, unless it shall also appear that such employé "fully understood, comprehended, and appreciated the dangers incident to the use of" the same. This amendment did not change the rule we have stated. If the danger is so obvious and serious that no ordinarily prudent person of similar age and experience, situated as was the employé, would have done the act, even though ordered by his employers to do it, it is manifest that the situation is such that the employé will not be heard to say that he did not fully understand, comprehend, and appreciate the danger incident to the doing of the act. As said by this court in Limberg v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 127 Cal. 598, 600, 60 Pac. 176, 177 (49 L. R. A. 33): "He cannot be allowed to close his eyes to the danger, and thereafter say, 'I did not know it was dangerous.'" We are cited to no case and know of none that is opposed to the view we have stated above.

[3, 4] While the question whether the situation is such, under the evidence, as to compel the application of this rule is ordinarily one for the jury, rather than one of pure law for the court, there are cases where the admitted facts are such that but one conclusion can reasonably be arrived at therefrom, and the question is one of law for the court. For instance, if an adult employé of ordinary intelligence was told to drive his team over a perpendicular embankment 10 or 12 feet high, and he, with full knowledge of these conditions, voluntarily obeyed and thereby received injuries, no one would be bold enough to suggest that a verdict of a jury awarding him damages therefor could be upheld by the courts, if properly brought in question. It would be held, as matter of law, that the situation was such that he was precluded from recovery, both by reason of contributory negligence and voluntary assumption of risk. The physical facts actually known to him would be such that his mere statement that he did not consider it a dangerous place, and that he relied on the person directing him, would be ineffectual for any purpose. By reason of his admitted knowledge of all the facts, no other conclusion would be possible than that he fully understood, comprehended, and appreciated the danger incident to the act. While here, according to plaintiff's testimony, there was a difference in the height of the embankment from that spoken of in the illustration just made, the difference is not so great, in our judgment, as to affect the legal situation. We think the admitted facts of this case are such as to bring it within the rule we have already stated. They are such as to require the conclusion, as matter of law, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in obeying the order that he testified was given to him by the foreman. The case is not to be distinguished in its material facts from Lindsey v. Hollerback, etc., Co. (Ky.) 92 S. W. 294, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 830. No case has been cited by learned counsel for plaintiff that appears to us to support a contrary conclusion. The nearest case in point among those cited by him is that of Haley v. Case et al., 142 Mass. 316, 7 N. E. 877. But it appears to us that there were facts in that case which might reasonably be held to take it out of the operation of the rule that we have enunciated. The court in that case recognized the rule to be as we have stated it, saying: "As the plaintiff was of full age, and an experienced teamster, if the danger of driving the horses with the van under the gateway was well known to him, he cannot recover, although he was acting under the immediate personal direction of Dodge. The fear of the plaintiff that he would be discharged from his employment, if he did not obey the orders of Dodge, his employer, would not justify him in running a risk which was well known to him, and then, if injured, in recovering damages from his employer."

In view of our conclusion on this point, it is unnecessary to consider any of the other points discussed in the briefs.

The judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial are reversed.

MEGARRY v. MEGARRY et al. (Sac. 1,947.) (Supreme Court of California. Aug. 3, 1912.) TRUSTS (§ 89*)—SALE or TRUST—EVIDENCE.

In an action to have the plaintiff declared the sole owner of a business, evidence held not to show that there was a sale of the business to plaintiff by his father, but rather that he was made a trustee for his brothers and sisters as to their interest in the property.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by James Megarry against Mary Megarry and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. U. Goodman and Leon Samuels, for appellants. L. G. Harrier and W. T. O'Donnell, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. By his complaint in this action, plaintiff sought a decree adjudging that he is the sole owner of a certain grocery business in the city of Vallejo, Solano county, "conducted at No. 310 Georgia street, under the name of James Megarry & Company [the term 'business' including the stock in trade, money on hand, accounts and good will thereof]," and perpetually restraining defendants from interfering therewith "by claiming or asserting any control or dominion over the same, from taking possession of, or attempting to take possession of, said property, or any part thereof, or from making any claim of ownership therein adverse to this plaintiff." The complaint contained the allegations usual in complaints to quiet title to real property, and alleged that the plaintiff was in the sole possession of said business. The defendants by their answer denied various allegations of the complaint, including those relating to the ownership of the property. The issues so made were tried, and the trial court found in accord with the allegations of the complaint and gave judgment as prayed therein. This is an appeal by defendants from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Passing certain claims apparently made for the first time on the oral argument in this court, we will consider the claim made in the briefs to the effect that there is not sufficient support in the evidence for the conclusion of the trial court that plaintiff is the sole owner of the property in question.

The defendants are Arthur Megarry, Mary Megarry, and Letitia Megarry, sole surviving brother and sisters of plaintiff, and Mary Megarry and Letitia Megarry, as executrices of the last will of Walter Megarry, a deceased brother of plaintiff. The persons named, including plaintiff, were children of William Megarry, who died March 15 or 17, 1891, and his wife, Elizabeth Megarry, who died in the year 1901. The father left surviving him, in addition to the children already named, two other sons, John and William. At the time of his death the children were of the following ages, viz.: Plaintiff 22 years, John 19, William 15, Walter 13, Mary 11, Arthur 9, and Letitia 7.

The father was then engaged in the grocery business, under the name of William Megarry, and also owned some land, lots 8 and 16, block 215, and lot 10 and the west half of lot 14, block 268, Vallejo. So far as appears, the sole source of income of the family was the grocery business. The only evidence as to the then value of the grocery business was that of plaintiff, to the effect that the stock was worth not over $1,500, and that the business then did not amount to $1,500. Plaintiff was then working in the store, and had been so working for some 12 years. John and William were also working in the store.

On March 12, 1891, the father, who was then confined to his bed by his last illness, with the aid of a notary public, attempted to make disposition of his property. He executed a deed of gift to his wife, conveying to her his real property, and executed what was called a "bill of sale" of the grocery business, according to the testimony of the notary and plaintiff, to plaintiff for a consideration of $10. This instrument was never recorded and has been lost; but the evidence is sufficient to support a conclusion that it was in part in the form of a bill of sale, and that $10 was in fact paid by plaintiff to the father at the time. It may also be assumed that the evidence was sufficient to show that the instrument was at once delivered to plaintiff by the notary, together with the deed to the mother, although plaintiff in one place testified that it was delivered after the death of his father. According to plaintiff's testimony, there was a "memorandum" on the "bill of sale," written by the notary, being "a request that I take care of my mother and raise my brothers and sisters, and educate them to the best of my knowledge, and so far as the business would go." He further testified that "my father gave me that bill of sale with the understanding that I was to keep the family together and support them with that business;" that he told me to "support my mother, educate the children, take care of them to the best of my ability with the business, what I got out of it;" and that he thought it was placed in his name "for the benefit of the entire family."

Upon the death of the father a few days later, plaintiff changed the name under which the business was conducted to "James Megarry & Co." It has ever since been conducted under this name, and undoubtedly plaintiff has always been at the head of the business. William and John continued to work in the store with plaintiff until they died; William dying in the year 1899, and John dying in the year 1901. In the meantime, the other brothers, Walter and Arthur, had come into the store, and continued there until Walter died in 1910.

Plaintiff married in the year 1900. Up to that time the following conditions existed, viz.: All of the family lived together in the family home. None of the brothers received any salary from the business. Each of them took what money he needed for clothes, etc., from the drawer. There was never any account kept of these withdrawals. When the mother wanted any money, it was given to her. There was also taken from the store such supplies as were needed for the family home. The business was apparently well and profitably managed. In 1897 the property occupied for store purposes was purchased from funds accumulated by James Megarry & Co.; some $6,000 to $8,500 being paid therefor, and the title being placed in the name of the mother. Valuable improvements, costing some $5,000, were added thereto, likewise from the funds of James Megarry & Co. A dwelling home for the family was also constructed at a cost of about $5,000 by James Megarry & Co.

When plaintiff married, he commenced, and has ever since continued, to take from the business $15 a week and his groceries.

The remainder of the family continued to live together. Walter and Arthur took $35 a week "home to the family," and the family was provided from the store "with everything—vegetables, meat, and everything they wanted." No account was ever kept of these things. These conditions continued to the time of Walter's death.

Neither John nor William was ever married. No probate was had on the estate of either.

In 1901 the mother died. On May 29, 1901, she executed a deed of trust covering the land conveyed to her by her husband and the property subsequently purchased and improved by James Megarry & Co. for the benefit of her five surviving children, each to share equally in the rents, issues, and profits for the term of 10 years, and each to have an undivided one-fifth at the expiration of said 10 years. Plaintiff was one of the trustees, as well as beneficiaries, under the deed, and subscribed and acknowledged execution of the same. This, it will be observed, included the real property purchased and improved for the store purposes from the funds of James Megarry & Co. By a written statement addressed to the appraisers of the estate of Walter Megarry, deceased, plaintiff acknowledged Walter to have been the owner of an undivided one-fifth of this property, as well as of the other real property covered by the trust deed.

After the real property occupied for store purposes was acquired by purchase in 1897, no rent was paid therefor by plaintiff or any one else on account of the grocery business until the death of Walter in 1910. But the taxes on said property and other property of the Megarry estate, as well as all bills for improvements, etc., were paid out of the funds of James Megarry & Co.

While plaintiff was undoubtedly the active factor in the management of the business, we can see nothing in his testimony to indicate that he ever assumed, at any time prior to Walter's death, to be the sole owner thereof. The bill heads described the firm as "Jas. Megarry & Co.," and the letter heads, in addition, declared them to be "Grocers, Wine and Tea Merchants." The checks were signed, "James Megarry & Company by James Megarry." The application for United States internal revenue licenses contained the names, as members of the firm, of the brothers and sisters at first, and afterwards the names of the brothers alone; the sisters having requested that their names be not attached "to a liquor license." In some instances, plaintiff individually entered into contracts; the special instances shown being a purchase of certain store fixtures for $250, and the contract for carpenter work on the extension added to the building on the property purchased in the name of the mother. Everything done by plaintiff was entirely consistent with the idea that the grocery business was purely "a family affair," and many things done were absolutely inconsistent with any other theory. Up to a very short time before the death of Walter, certainly there was nothing to indicate to any of the others that plaintiff claimed to be the sole owner of the business.

A few months before the death of Walter, trouble arose among the members of the family, and there was some talk of arranging a settlement as to the property. At that time, according to Mary, each of the brothers and sisters claimed one-fifth of the business, while plaintiff claimed one-half. It does not appear that at that time plaintiff did anything indicating that he claimed to own the whole of the business.

Walter died in July, 1910. A few days before his death, he executed a will, subsequently admitted to probate, giving all of his property to his two sisters. Plaintiff was dissatisfied with the provisions of this will, and told his sisters that he owned absolutely the business of Jas. Megarry & Co. On August 20, 1910, he submitted to the appraisers of the estate of Walter a written statement, prepared and signed by himself, as to the firm of Jas. Megarry & Co., showing the property thereof, including $14,000 cash, to be worth $24,000, and the owners to be as follows: James Megarry one-half, Mary Megarry one-eighth, Arthur Megarry one-eighth, Lettie Megarry one-eighth, and Walter Megarry, deceased, one-eighth. This statement plaintiff claims to have made in view of certain pending arrangements for a compromise between himself and his sisters and Arthur, which he then thought would result in the compromise being made. Various writings, several of which were in the handwriting of plaintiff, were in evidence, showing his acquiescence in any arrangement by which he should be given one half of the business, while the other half was divided among the others. Owing to the advice of the attorneys for the sisters, the sisters refused to sign any agreement for a compromise. This action was commenced December 9, 1910.

We believe that we have stated the case as favorably as it can be stated for plaintiff on his own testimony, and are of the opinion that no warrant is to be found in such evidence for a conclusion that plaintiff is the sole owner of the property in question. Clearly there was never any sale of the business by the father to plaintiff. The transaction, as shown by plaintiff's own testimony, was a transfer in trust for the benefit of the family, which trust plaintiff accepted and has honestly and efficiently performed, without attempted repudiation of any kind, up to the moment of Walter's death. As we have substantially said, his conduct during all these years has been entirely inconsistent with any other idea than that the business was the property of the family, and that he was managing it for the benefit of the family, including, of course, himself. Even after the death of Walter, he apparently never seriously made claim to be the absolute owner of the whole business until about the time of the commencement of this action; and this claim was apparently brought about by reason of the refusal of the others to consent to what he considered a reasonable adjustment of the respective claims in regard to this business, in view of the part he had played in making a success thereof and bringing it to its present prosperous condition. There was natural justice in plaintiff's claim that he should be given, in view of what he had done in building up the business, and the small amount he had taken therefrom by way of compensation for his work, a larger share than any of the others; and if courts were invested with the power to apportion this property in accord with their views as to what would be fair, under the circumstances, regardless of rules of law, we would unhesitatingly declare the proposed adjustment offered by plaintiff to be one that should be approved. But we cannot escape the conclusion upon the evidence before us that the surviving brother and sisters and the estate of Walter are each equally interested with plaintiff, as beneficial owners at least, in this property. It may be true that plaintiff is entitled to be awarded some compensation for his services as trustee, payable out of this property; but this is a question not presented in this proceeding, and one that we do not attempt to determine. The conclusion that the plaintiff is the sole owner, free of all lawful claim by the defendants, is not supported by the evidence.

In view of our conclusion on the point discussed, we deem it unnecessary to discuss other matters suggested in the briefs.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Vincent Neale, special administrator, etc., against Robert H. Morrow. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Vincent Neale, in pro per. R. H. Morrow and Garber, Creswell & Garber, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment given in favor of defendant in an action upon a promissory note. The judgment was based upon an order of the superior court, made September 6, 1910, sustaining an objection interposed by defendant at the time the action came on for trial that the supplemental and amended complaint of the plaintiff on file in said action does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The supplemental and amended complaint was filed September 18, 1903. A demurrer was interposed thereto on November 9, 1903, the grounds thereof being (a) that the same "does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against this defendant"; (b, c) that the cause of action set forth is barred by the provisions of sections 337 and 342 of the Code of Civil Procedure; (d) that said complaint is uncertain in a certain respect, specifying it. On February 23, 1904, the superior court made an order "that said demurrer be, and the same is hereby, sustained, with leave to the plaintiff to amend his said amended and supplemental complaint within ten (10) days." Plaintiff failed to amend, and judgment was thereupon given in favor of defendant. From this judgment an appeal was taken to this court. The appeal was decided by this court on February 2, 1907. The judgment given herein was as follows: "The judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to overrule the demurrer and allow the defendant to answer." The only question discussed by the court in its opinion was that presented by the objection that the alleged cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. See Neale v. Morrow, 150 Cal. 414, 88 Pac. 815. On the going down of the remittitur from this court, the trial court overruled the demurrer in accord with the mandate of this court, and the defendant subsequently served and filed his answer. The case was set for trial, and when it was regularly called for trial the defendant made his objection that such complaint, which had not been changed in any respect since its filing on September 18, 1903, did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. As already stated, this objection was sustained by the trial court, and thereupon judgment was given for the defendant.

Upon this appeal defendant, conceding that all the questions as to the statute of limitations are settled by the decision of the court on the former appeal, endeavors to support the action of the trial court by pointing out certain particulars in which it is claimed that such complaint fails to state a cause of action. We see no escape from the conclusion that the sufficiency of this complaint against any objection that it fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in whatever form such objections may be made, is res adjudicata by the judgment given on the former appeal. In the language used in Phelan v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 39, 45, "it is a final adjudication, from the consequences of which the court cannot depart, nor the parties relieve themselves." Under the circumstances here existing, it can make no difference that this court in its opinion on such appeal confined its discussion to the question of the effect of the statute of limitations. The question of the sufficiency of the complaint against the objection of want of facts to state a cause of action was presented by the demurrer, and was necessarily presented by the appeal to this court. If the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, the ruling of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer was correct, and the judgment should have been affirmed, even though the objections based on the statute of limitations were not well taken. See People v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 76 Cal. 29, 43, 18 Pac. 90. The judgment of this court reversing the judgment of the lower court, with directions to the lower court to overrule the demurrer, was necessarily an adjudication that the demurrer was not well taken; in other words, that the complaint did state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against defendant; that the cause of action therein set forth was not barred by either sections 337 or 342 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and that the complaint was not uncertain. As we have said, it can make no difference that the contentions now made were not discussed in the opinion. They were adjudicated against defendant by the judgment given by this court; for such adjudication was "actually and necessarily included therein or necessary thereto." Section 1911, Code Civ. Proc. Section 434 of the Code of Civil Procedure has no application whatever to the matter under consideration. So far as pertinent, it simply provides that an objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action is not waived by a failure to demur on that ground. The trial court was without power to consider such objections as are here urged, for the simple reason that this court had rendered an adjudication thereon that forever concludes the matter.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Minna Foerst against John Kelso. From an order granting plaintiff's application to supply a destroyed judgment roll in the action, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. In February, 1901, plaintiff filed in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco an amended complaint stating a cause of action for damages. In March, 1901, defendant filed his answer. The cause was tried with a jury, which, on December 12, 1905, rendered its verdict in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $7,000. Judgment was entered in accord with said verdict on December 14, 1905, and the judgment roll in said action was made up and certified by the clerk on the same day. Within 10 days after the rendition of such verdict, defendant served and filed his notice of intention to move for a new trial on some or all of the grounds specified in section 657, Code of Civil Procedure, stating in such notice that the motion would be made upon a bill of exceptions. Within the requisite time, his attorney served on plain-tiff's attorneys his proposed bill of exceptions, and subsequently and in due time plaintiff's attorneys served on defendant's attorney amendments to said proposed bill of exceptions. At this stage, neither said proposed bill of exceptions, nor said proposed amendments, having as yet been filed among the papers of the case, and the same apparently being in the possession of the attorney of defendant, and no bill of exceptions having been settled, and said motion for a new trial being still pending, came the great conflagration of April 18 and 19, 1906, by which all of the records and files in said cause, and also all papers relating thereto in the office of said attorney for defendant, including said proposed bill and proposed amendments, and the shorthand reporter's transcript of the proceedings which such attorney had, were destroyed. Attorney for defendant, in his affidavit made November 9, 1910, which is not contradicted, states that the shorthand reporter who took down in shorthand the proceedings in said cause is dead, and that he believes it impossible to obtain another transcript of such proceedings, and that the evidence taken at the trial has passed from his memory, and that he cannot now state even the substance thereof. On November 3, 1910, plaintiff made her application to said superior court, in accord with the provisions of the act of June 16, 1906 (Stats. 1906, Extra Session, p. 73), for the restoration of court records "lost, injured or destroyed by conflagration or other public calamity," for an order reciting the substance and effect of the judgment roll in said action. After proper proceedings had, this application came on for hearing November 18, 1910. It was admitted that the judgment roll, as set forth in the application to restore such records, was correctly set forth, with the exception of a minor detail, which was corrected. The affidavit of defendant's attorney, the material facts stated in which have already been set forth, was read in evidence. Defendant's attorney claimed, both in his affidavit and at such hearing, that either the motion for a new trial should be granted, or that plaintiff's motion for restoration should be denied, on the ground that the granting of the same would give plaintiff an unfair advantage over defendant and leave defendant without any adequate remedy, as it was impossible for defendant to supply a new proposed bill of exceptions to be used on his motion for a new trial, and that the granting of such motion would be a violation of his rights under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The trial court overruled the objections of defendant and made the order petitioned for by plaintiff, viz., "an order reciting what was the substance and effect" of such destroyed judgment roll. This is an appeal from such order, and from the judgment in said action as recorded on the restoration proceedings December 1, 1910.

Nothing is said in defendant's brief about an appeal from the judgment. We do not understand that it was intended to appeal from the judgment entered December 14, 1905, which is the only judgment in the case, and the time for appeal from which had expired several years prior to the taking of this appeal. The judgment referred to in the notice of appeal is one recorded and entered on December 1, 1910, on which date the order of the court, reciting the contents of the lost judgment roll, including the judgment, was recorded by the clerk of the court, the order of restoration. No judgment was entered on that day, but only an order reciting the contents of a lost judgment roll, including a judgment that had been entered on December 14, 1905. Practically the appeal is only from the order of the court restoring the records sought by plaintiff to be restored. There is no appeal from any order refusing to grant the defendant a new trial; nor does it appear that the trial court has acted upon any such motion. It simply regarded the facts stated in support of the demand of defendant for a new trial as an insufficient objection to the restoration of the record, and overruled the same.

So far as appellant bases any claim for a new trial upon the provisions of an act entitled "An act providing for the disposition of actions and proceedings in which bills of exceptions and statements on motion for a new trial have been lost or destroyed by conflagration or other public calamity," approved March 23, 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 998), his claim would appear to be without force, in view of the express provision contained therein that "the motion provided for by this act must be made within thirty days after the loss or destruction of such records; provided, that in any case now pending such motion may be made at any time within sixty days after the passage of this act." No demand or motion based on facts warranting such action under this act was made until November 11, 1910, and no request was made to the court until November 18, 1910.

[1] But we are satisfied that no question as to the effect of the judgment roll when restored, or as to the right of defendant to relief by or on account of the facts set up by him in the affidavit of his attorney, was involved on the application for restoration of the record, or is involved on this appeal.

[2] A somewhat similar question was presented in Estate of Jones, 17 Cal. App. 327, 119 Pac. 670, in which a petition for hearing in this court was denied. The opinion of the District Court of Appeal in that case succinctly and clearly states the law applicable on such applications, so far as this matter is concerned. Substantially it is held that the sole object of such a proceeding as this is to restore a record; that the obvious purpose of such a proceeding is to permit a person apparently having some interest in a lost record, even though his interest is, perhaps, doubtful, to have the same restored, so that it may afford conclusive evidence of its contents and obviate the necessity of resorting to secondary evidence in any litigation that may arise to enforce rights or obligations established by such record; that the ends of justice would not be promoted by complicating the question of restoration of the records with other issues, and that as a rule the regularity or legal effect of the record will not be considered; that questions affecting the judgment, other than those which appear on the face of the record sought to be substituted, should not be investigated in such a proceeding; and that in such a case the record should be restored substantially as it was, even if voidable, and the other party left to make whatever defense, not appearing from the face of the record, that might exist precisely as he could, had the record not been destroyed. Whatever rights or remedies defendant had at the time of this application for restoration, by reason of the matters set up in the affidavit, plaintiff was nevertheless entitled to such restoration, and the trial court did not err in making the order therefor.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 32*)—
LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION—PETITION FOR REVOCATION—RIGHT TO PETITION FOR.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1383, which provides that when letters of administration have been granted to one other than the surviving husband or wife, child, parent, brother, or sister any one of them, or their nominee, may obtain revocation of the letters, and be entitled to administration, an incompetent relative cannot nominate a competent one; and hence, where decedent's living brother was incompetent to serve as administrator under section 1369, because he was a nonresident, he could not authorize his son, who was competent to serve, to petition for revocation of letters of administration issued to the son of a deceased brother of decedent.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Lawrence Martin, deceased. From an order denying a petition to revoke letters of administration issued to Clarence Martin, John Martin appeals. Affirmed.

Percy S. King and J. R. Pringle, for appellant. C. N. Riggins, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The deceased died intestate, and Clarence Martin, a nephew and heir (being a son of a deceased brother of deceased), was appointed administrator of his estate on October 19, 1911. Letters of administration were issued to said Clarence Martin on October 24, 1911. On November 29, 1911, John Martin, a son of Andrew Martin, who is a brother of deceased and one of his heirs, at the written request of his father, filed his petition, under section 1383, Code of Civil Procedure, for the revocation of such letters of administration issued to Clarence Martin, and asking that he (John Martin) be appointed administrator of said estate. Said Andrew Martin, father of said petitioner, is in all respects competent to serve as administrator, except that he is a nonresident of the state, being a resident of Ireland. For this reason he is neither competent nor entitled to serve as administrator. Code Civ. Proc. § 1369. The petitioner himself is a resident of this state and in all respects competent. The lower court, finding that Andrew Martin was incompetent to be appointed by reason of nonresidence, concluded that petitioner had no right, under section 1383, Code of Civil Procedure, to a revocation of the letters theretofore granted to Clarence Martin; the theory being that such section authorized the revocation of letters only upon the petition of a relative who is himself competent to serve as administrator, or upon the petition of a competent nominee of such a relative who is himself competent. It therefore denied the petition. This is an appeal by said petitioner from the order denying his petition.

Section 1383, Code of Civil Procedure, provides: "When letters of administration have been granted to any other person than the surviving husband or wife, child, father, mother, brother, or sister of the intestate, any one of them who is competent, or any competent person at the written request of any one of them, may obtain the revocation of the letters, and be entitled to the administration, by presenting to the court a petition praying the revocation, and that letters of administration may be issued to him." The words "who is competent, or any competent person at the written request of any one of them," were inserted in this section by amendment April 16, 1880. Amendments to Codes 1880, p. 80. Sections 1384 and 1385, Code of Civil Procedure, provide for the notice and hearing on such petition; and the latter section provides that, "if the right of the applicant is established, and he is competent, letters of administration must be granted to him, and the letters of the former administrator revoked." By section 1369, Code of Civil Procedure, it is provided that "no person is competent or entitled to serve as administrator or administratrix" who is (1) under the age of majority, (2) not a bona fide resident of the state, (3) convicted of an infamous crime, (4) adjudged by the court incompetent to execute the duties of the trust by reason of drunkenness, improvidence, or want of understanding and integrity.

It is not disputed that Andrew Martin, by reason of his nonresidence, was not "competent or entitled to serve as administrator" (section 1369, Code Civ. Proc.), and that he was therefore not entitled to personally petition, under section 1383, Code of Civil Procedure, for the revocation of the letters theretofore granted to Clarence Martin. Does section 1383, Code of Civil Procedure, give his nominee any greater right in the matter than he himself has? Was it the intent of the framers of the amendment of 1880 to that section to give to a relative named therein the right, under the circumstances set forth therein, to clothe any competent person, not otherwise entitled to administer, with the authority to obtain a revocation of the letters previously issued to another and a grant of letters to himself, although he (such relative) could not ask for such revocation or be appointed administrator by reason of his own incompetency? This is the question presented by this appeal.

The meaning of section 1383, Code of Civil Procedure, in this regard is not entirely free from doubt; but we are of the opinion that the lower court was correct in its conclusion that the section authorizes the revocation of letters already granted only upon the petition of one of the designated relatives who is competent to serve as administrator, or the petition of a nominee of such a one, i. e., the nominee of one who is himself competent to serve as administrator. Taking the section as it stands, without regard to other sections of our probate act, and looking solely to its general purpose, such would appear to be a fair construction of its provisions. The general purpose of the section has been declared to be to allow a prior right to letters to be asserted against one who has obtained a grant of letters by virtue of a secondary right; to permit the former administrator to be superseded by a person of another and superior claim. See Estate of Wooten, 56 Cal. 322, 326; Estate of Aldrich, 147 Cal. 343, 345, 81 Pac. 1011. It is solely in the interest of the person having such prior right or belonging to such superior class. But if the relative is incompetent under the laws of this state to obtain letters or serve as administrator, he has no prior right to letters over the person theretofore appointed, and does not belong to a superior class in the matter of the right to letters. This being the situation, the Legislature provides for the initiation of proceedings for revocation when letters have been granted to any other person than to a husband or wife, child, father, mother, brother, or sister of the deceased "by any one of them who is competent, or any competent person at the written request of any one of them."

The right to obtain such revocation is solely for the benefit of the relative. It is limited by express terms, in the first instance, to such of the designated relatives as are themselves competent; and the words "at the written request of any one of them" may well be construed as referring solely to those described in the last preceding clause, viz., "any one of them who is competent," thus giving the competent relative the right to act either directly or through a nominee.

When we consider the section in the light of the well-settled law as to the rights of such relatives, other than a surviving husband or wife, on an original application for letters of administration, this would appear to be almost the necessary construction. Section 1365, Code of Civil Procedure, specifies the persons "entitled to administer," and the order in which they are severally entitled, being: "1. The surviving husband or wife, or some competent person whom he or she may request to have appointed. 2. The children. 3. The father and mother. 4. The brothers. 5. The sisters," etc. It is thoroughly settled that, except in the case of a surviving husband or wife, the competent nominee of a relative who is incompetent by reason of nonresidence is not "entitled" to letters, on an original application for letters, by virtue of his nomination by such relative. See Estate of Beech, 63 Cal. 458; Estate of Muersing, 103 Cal. 585, 37 Pac. 520; Estate of Kelly, 57 Cal. 81; Estate of Morgan, 53 Cal. 243. It is thus clear that the competent nominee of a nonresident child, father, mother, brother, or sister of the deceased would not have been entitled by reason of such nomination to letters of administration as against Clarence Martin at the time the latter was appointed, if he had then filed his petition asking for such letters; and this because of the incompetency of the person nominating him. The cases cited make this clear, and the fact is not disputed by learned counsel for appellant. It is unreasonable to assume, in the absence of language clearly compelling such a conclusion, that the Legislature intended that such a nominee should have the absolute right to insist on the revocation of letters, the issuance of which neither he nor the person nominating him could have successfully opposed in the first instance. Especially is this true when we bear in mind that the purpose of section 1383, Code of Civil Procedure, is, as we have said, to allow a prior right to letters to be asserted against one who has obtained a grant of letters by virtue of a secondary right.

Much reliance is placed by appellant on the fact that the amendment to section 1383 was made within a few weeks after this court decided the case of Estate of Cotter, 54 Cal. 215, wherein it was held that the surviving husband or wife of a deceased person, though incompetent to serve on account of nonresidence, nevertheless is entitled to nominate a suitable person for administrator, who would thereupon become entitled to letters on an original application in preference to any of the other persons named in section 1365, Code of Civil Procedure. This section has already been referred to. The decision referred to was based upon the express language of subdivision 1 of that section, which gives the first right to letters to "the surviving husband or wife, or some competent person whom he or she may request to have appointed." It was said that this statute "does not make the right of the surviving husband or wife to nominate depend upon the matter of residence." But the Legislature was dealing with an entirely different question in amending section 1383, Code of Civil Procedure, viz., the right to a revocation of letters already granted at the instance of one having a prior right; and we do not think that the language used by it in such amendment was such as to warrant a conclusion that it was endeavoring to apply the rule declared in the Cotter Case to applications for revocation. Especially is this true when we consider that no amendment was made, conferring upon the nominee of any heir, other than the surviving husband or wife, the right to letters of administration in place of said heir upon the original granting of letters.

It may be that there is no good reason why any heir should not be placed in the same position in the matter of obtaining letters in the first instance as is the surviving husband or wife; that is, with the absolute right to nominate in his place, even if incompetent by reason of nonresidence, some competent person to act in his place, who shall have the same right to letters that he would have if a resident of the state. That, however, is a matter within the legislative domain. As has been said by this court, "there have been, at various times, so many amendments to the Code concerning the right of administration that it is quite difficult to extract a harmonious system." Estate of Kelly, 57 Cal. 81. We cannot claim that our construction of section 1383, Code of Civil Procedure, makes our system in this regard absolutely harmonious; but as many, if not more, discordant notes would be found if the construction contended for by appellant should be adopted.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 6, 1912.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 5, 1912.)1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 979*)—NEW TRIAL (§ 68*)—WILLS (§ 155*)—WANT OF EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

The granting of a new trial for want of evidence to support the verdict is usually a matter almost entirely within the discretion of the trial court, which will not be reversed in the absence of abuse of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3871-3873, 3877; Dec. Dig. § 979;* New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 135-140; Dec. Dig. § 68;* Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 375-381; Dec. Dig. § 155.*]

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 9*)—SEPARATE ISSUES.

It is within the power of the trial court, where there is more than one issue of fact in a case, and such issues are distinct and separable in their nature, to order a new trial of one issue and refuse it as to the others.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

3. NEW TRIAL (§ 170*)—SEPARATE ISSUES—SEVERANCE.

Where a new trial is granted as to one of two separate issues, it authorizes a re-examination only of the issue on which the new trial has been ordered; the moving party's remedy as to the others being limited to an appeal from the part of the order denying the motion as to them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 337; Dec. Dig. § 170.*]

4. WILLS (§ 166*)—EVIDENCE—FRAUD—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

Evidence held to sustain a verdict finding that a will offered for probate had not been procured by fraud or undue influence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 421-437; Dec. Dig. § 166.*]

5. WILLS (§ 153*)—FRAUD—UNDUE INFLUENCE—PROMISE TO DISTRIBUTE.

A will executed on the faith of a promise that the sole beneficiary would distribute certain of testatrix's estate among certain charities is not procured by fraud or undue influence; but if, after testatrix's death, the donee fails or refuses to perform the promise the donee and the property may be charged with a trust in favor of the intended beneficiaries.

6. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EXCLUDING EVIDENCE.

The court, having given instructions in a will contest concerning unsoundness of mind in introducing the subject of undue influence, charged that unsoundness of mind and undue influence were entirely distinct grounds for denying the probate of a will; that a person might be the victim of undue influence, whether at the time sound or unsound in mind; and that, if the jury found the testatrix was of unsound mind at the time of the execution of the will, then it was entirely immaterial whether the principal beneficiary exercised any undue influence over her in the matter of the execution of the will, because unsoundness of mind would incapacitate her to execute the will, "influence or no influence." Held, that such instruction was not objectionable as authorizing the jury, after finding unsoundness of mind, to conclude that they need not consider the evidence relating to undue influence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 613-623; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EFFECT OF EVIDENCE.

A request to charge in a will contest that two former wills were admitted as tending to raise a probability of undue influence, and that they were limited to that purpose, was improper, being a charge as to the effect of evidence.

8. WILLS (§ 331*)—CONTEST—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that two former wills were admitted in evidence to show the state of mind of testatrix toward the beneficiaries therein named, and not specifically to show that she made the will in controversy while of unsound mind, or through undue influence or fraud, was not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 782-784, 786, 787; Dec. Dig. § 331.*]

9. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUEST TO CHARGE—INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN.

Where, in a will contest, the court charged that in considering the issue of undue influence the jury should take into consideration the age and mental and physical condition of testatrix as shown by the evidence, that an influence which she was too weak to resist, and which destroyed her free agency and prevented the free and voluntary action of her judgment, amounted to undue influence, and that undue influence was the control of another will over that of testatrix, whose faculties had been so impaired as to submit to that control, such instruction covered a request to charge that the amount of undue influence which would invalidate a will varies with the strength or weakness of testatrix's mind and will, and the influence which would subdue or control a mind naturally weak, or which had become impaired by age, weakness, disease, or any other cause, might have no effect to overcome or mislead a mind naturally strong and unimpaired by any of the causes stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

10. EVIDENCE (§ 350*)—DOCUMENTS—NURSE'S CHART.

A nurse's chart or memorandum of the pulse of testatrix and her symptoms during her last illness was not legal evidence of the facts stated therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1388-1397; Dec. Dig. § 350.*]

11. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Where, in a will contest, it was shown that a nurse's chart showing testatrix's symptoms and pulse during her last illness had been lost, but there was no proof that it was willfully destroyed or suppressed, or that it was kept for or delivered to proponent, such facts did not furnish a basis for a refused instruction that evidence willfully suppressed was presumed to be adverse to the party suppressing it.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; George H. Buck, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Jeanette L. Everts, deceased. A writing purporting to be decedent's will having been offered for probate, certain legatees in an alleged will bearing prior date contested such probate. From an order granting proponent's motion for a new trial on the issue of insanity,

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes and denying contestants' motion for a new trial on the issues of undue influence and fraud, contestants appeal separately. Affirmed.

Chas. M. Cassin and Benj. K. Knight, for appellants. Stratton, Kaufman & Torchiana, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Jeanette L. Everts died in Santa Cruz county on January 16, 1911. On January 19, 1911, a petition for the probate of a writing, dated January 13, 1911, purporting to be her will was filed. A will previously executed had given certain legacies to the contestants above mentioned. They appeared and filed a contest of the will of January 13th. The grounds of contest were, first, that the decedent was of unsound mind when said paper was executed; second, that it was procured by undue influence; third, that it was procured by fraud. The issues were tried by a jury, which found that the decedent was of unsound mind as alleged, but that the will was not procured by fraud or undue influence. Thereupon the proponent and contestants moved separately for a new trial of the issues decided against them respectively; the proponent asking a new trial of the issue as to insanity, the contestants for a new trial of the issues as to undue influence and fraud. The court granted the motion of the proponent and ordered a new trial of the issue as to insanity, and, denying the motion of contestants, refused a new trial of the questions of undue influence and fraud. The contestants appeal separately from each order; the appeal from the order relating to the issue of insanity being case No. 6,073, and that from the order upon the issues of undue influence and fraud being case No. 6,072.

[1] The granting of a new trial for want of evidence to support the verdict is usually a matter almost entirely within the discretion of the trial court. Such order will not be reversed, unless an abuse of discretion appears. Estate of Motz, 136 Cal. 560, 69 Pac. 294; Bjorman v. Ft. B. R. Co., 92 Cal. 501, 28 Pac. 591. The record contains no substantial evidence that the testatrix was of unsound mind or otherwise incompetent to make a will at the time of the execution of the will in question. The court very properly ordered a new trial of that issue.

[2, 3] It is within the power of the trial court, where there is more than one issue of fact in a case, and such issues are distinct and separable in their nature, to order a new trial of one issue and refuse it as to the others. San Diego L. & T. Co. v. Neal, 78 Cal. 64, 20 Pac. 372, 3 L. R. A. 83; Duff v. Duff, 101 Cal. 4, 35 Pac. 437; Mountain, etc., Co. v. Bryan, 111 Cal. 38, 43 Pac. 410. These cases declare, also, that when such new trial is granted it opens for examination only the issue upon which it is ordered; that the determination of the other issues remain in the record; and that they cannot be retried. The only remedy of the moving party as to those issues is to appeal from the part of the order denying the motion for a new trial as to them. This the appellants have done in this case. If we affirm that part of the order denying the new trial as to fraud and undue influence, the findings on those issues will stand unaffected, and the new trial to follow in the lower court must be confined to the question of the unsoundness of mind of the decedent.

[4] The decedent left but one heir at law, namely, the proponent, Sarah M. Chapman, her daughter. By the instrument of January 13, 1911, here offered for probate, the decedent gave all her property to her daughter, appointed her executor without bonds, and revoked all former wills. On December 3, 1909, she made a will giving the contestants, 10 in number, legacies amounting to $17,000, and to other persons and institutions legacies amounting to $13,300, her summer home to her cousin, Etta Alfred, for her life, and the residue to her said daughter. The contestant, Harry J. Bias, who was designated as executor in said former will, was the only natural person among the contestants who were named therein as legatees. His legacy of $2,000 was said to be for past services and for his services as executor. The other contestants are benevolent and religious societies and corporations. The value of the estate is about $75,000.

The undue influence, as alleged, consisted of the importunities, advice, solicitations, and representations of Sarah M. Chapman and others acting for her, whereby the will and purpose of the decedent to leave part of her property to others was overcome, and she was caused to make the will giving it all to said daughter. The fraud, as alleged, consisted of promises and representations, said to have been made by and for Sarah M. Chapman to the decedent, that if the decedent would execute the will in question leaving all her property to said Sarah, she, the said Sarah, would distribute a part of the same among certain nieces and cousins of the decedent and certain churches and charitable institutions, according to the wish and intent of the decedent, which promises, it is alleged, were made without any intention of performing them, and by means thereof she was induced to and did make said will.

So far as the point that the verdict against the contestants on these two issues is contrary to the evidence is concerned, no extended discussion is required. A perusal of the record shows that at least the great preponderance of the evidence was against the contestants. There was no satisfactory evidence of undue influence. The circumstances proven to show it were all readily susceptible of an innocent explanation. On the subject of fraud, the evidence was wanting upon the important element of fraudulent or bad intent. There was evidence that the decedent desired to give a considerable part of her estate to certain churches and societies and to other relatives, and also that she wished to place it all in control of her daughter for distribution of that part according to her desires; that the daughter was informed of these desires, and promised the decedent that, if the will was made giving it all to her unconditionally, she would carry out those desires; and that the will was made upon the faith of this promise. But there is no substantial proof of bad faith on the part of the daughter, or of the allegation that she made such promise without any intention of performing it. She did not testify; but her counsel stated that she did not deny the promise, and that she intended to perform it. The only evidence of any consequence that might be supposed to indicate a contrary purpose is the testimony of the representatives of one of the contestant churches, who, the second day after the funeral of the testatrix, half playfully reminded the daughter of a promise she had a few hours before expressed to carry out her mother's wishes concerning the intended beneficiaries of the estate, to which the daughter answered: "You know my heart; but I am making no promises." It appeared, however, that at that time she had not seen the previous will, and was not fully advised as to the details of her mother's wishes; that she had received advice from her attorney in the meantime; and that she then again avowed her intention to carry out her mother's desires. The jury, on this evidence, was entirely justified in finding that the will was not procured by fraud.

[5] A will executed upon the faith of such a promise, honestly made, cannot be said to be procured by fraud or undue influence. If, after the death of the testatrix, the donee fails or refuses to perform the promise, a different question arises and, although the will stands unaffected, the donee and the property may be charged with a trust in favor of the intended beneficiaries. De Laurencel v. De Boom, 48 Cal. 585; Estate of Brooks, 54 Cal. 475; Curdy v. Berton, 79 Cal. 426, 21 Pac. 858, 5 L. R. A. 189, 12 Am. St. Rep. 157.

[6] The court instructed the jury that undue influence and unsoundness of mind were entirely distinct grounds for denying probate of a will; that a person might be the victim of undue influence, whether at the time sound or unsound in mind; and that, if they found that the testatrix was of unsound mind at the time of the execution of the will, then it was entirely immaterial whether or not the daughter "exercised any undue influence over her in the matter of the execution of the will," because unsoundness of mind itself would incapacitate her to execute the will, "influence or no influence." The appellants contend that the jury, after finding that such unsoundness of mind was established, would conclude from this instruction that they need not consider the evidence relating to undue influence, and that, in effect, it did prevent, or may have prevented, them from considering that evidence. The contention is not tenable. This statement was made immediately following the instructions concerning unsoundness of mind and in introducing the subject of undue influence. It was correct in point of fact. It does not purport to tell the jury that it would, in the event stated, be unnecessary or immaterial for them to consider the evidence as to undue influence, or to find upon that issue. The court proceeded to instruct the jury fully upon the question of undue influence, and in effect directed the jury to consider the evidence relating to it, to decide the issue according to the evidence, and to return a verdict thereon. The jury must be presumed to have obeyed these directions. There is nothing in the record, or even in the evidence, to indicate the contrary.

[7] There was no error in refusing the requested instruction to the effect that the two former wills were admitted for the purpose of tending to raise a probability of undue influence, and that they were limited to that purpose. Such an instruction was improper, being an instruction as to the effect of evidence.

[8] The instruction that these two former wills were allowed in evidence for the purpose of showing the state of mind and feeling of the testatrix towards the beneficiaries therein named, and not specifically to show that she made the will while of unsound mind, or through undue influence or fraud, is not erroneous. It was for the jury to determine what feeling or state of mind toward those beneficiaries was indicated by these wills, and, having done so, to decide whether it did or did not tend to prove the facts stated. An instruction, to the effect that it did prove those facts, by the court would have invaded the province of the jury.

[9] The court refused instruction 7, asked by appellants, containing this passage: "The amount of undue influence which will be sufficient to invalidate a will must, of course, vary with the strength or weakness of mind and will of the testator; and the influence which would subdue or control a mind naturally weak, or which had become impaired by age, weakness, disease, or any other cause, might have no effect to overcome or mislead a mind naturally strong and unimpaired by any of the causes above stated." That the propositions stated are correct is self-evident. But it does not follow that they should have been given to the jury as an instruction by the court. The jury must decide all questions of fact arising from the evidence, at least where there is a substantial conflict. Where there is no such conflict, the court may direct a verdict, but otherwise it may instruct only as to the law. The instruction is argumentative to a degree to which the court need not go. Where proper instructions on the point are given, a reversal should not follow either the giving or refusal to give such a proposition as an instruction. In other charges the jury was told that in considering the issue of undue influence they should take into consideration the age and mental and physical condition of the testatrix, as shown by the evidence; that an influence which she was too weak to resist, and which destroyed her free agency and prevented the free and voluntary action of her judgment, amounted to undue influence; that undue influence was the control of another will over that of the testatrix, whose faculties have been so impaired as to submit to that control. We are of the opinion that the contestants suffered no substantial injury from the lack of fuller instructions on the precise point.

[10.11] The nurses in attendance on the testatrix at the time of the execution of the will kept a chart or memorandum of her pulse and symptoms. This was lost; but there is no evidence that it was willfully destroyed or suppressed, or that it was kept for or delivered to the proponent. It was not legal evidence of the facts stated in it. Estate of Flint, 100 Cal. 399, 34 Pac. 863. Consequently it did not furnish a basis for the instruction that evidence willfully suppressed is presumed to be adverse to the party suppressing it, which was asked by contestants and refused.

A number of other rulings and proceedings at the trial are objected to as erroneous. None of them, in our opinion, could have affected the case to the prejudice of the contestants, or are of sufficient merit or importance to require discussion.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

The affidavit or affidavits upon which a contempt proceeding is based constitute the complaint; and, unless they charge acts constituting contempt, the court is without jurisdiction to proceed.

2. DIVORCE (§ 269*)—ALIMONY—CONTEMPT—AFFIDAVIT—SUFFICIENCY.

An affidavit to punish for contempt of an order requiring a husband to pay his wife's counsel fees and monthly sums for her support pending a divorce suit brought by her was not insufficient for failing to state that a copy of the order for such payment was personally served on him, or that he knew of the order, where the affidavit recited that he appeared in all the proceedings, and at all the times and dates mentioned in the affidavit, and that the order was made on a specified date.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 756-763; Dec. Dig. § 269.*]

3. DIVORCE (§ 269*)—ALIMONY—CONTEMPT—EVIDENCE—MATERIALITY.

In a proceeding to punish a husband for contempt of an order in a divorce suit, proof of service of a copy of the order was immaterial, where it was undisputed that he was present when the order was made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 756-763; Dec. Dig. § 269.*]

4. CERTIORARI (§ 58*)—REVIEW—MATTERS NOT SHOWN BY RECORD.

Objection on certiorari to review a conviction of contempt that petitioner's counsel was not permitted to read his affidavit at the hearing of the order to show cause cannot be considered, where the certified record fails to indicate any such state of facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Certiorari, Cent. Dig. § 146; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

5. WITNESSES (§ 60*)—COMPETENCY—HUSBAND AND WIFE.

Pen. Code, § 1322, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 1, which disqualify a wife to testify against her husband in certain cases, does not prevent her from testifying against him in a proceeding to punish him for contempt of an order requiring him to make her certain payments pending suit by her for divorce.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 167-173; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

6. DIVORCE (§ 269*)—TEMPORARY ORDERS—CONTEMPT—PROCEEDINGS TO PUNISH.

A proceeding to punish for contempt of an order in a divorce suit requiring a husband to make certain payments to his wife, while similar in some respects to a prosecution for a criminal offense, is properly entitled in the style of the divorce proceeding itself, and not as a separate action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 756-763; Dec. Dig. § 269.*]

7. DIVORCE (§ 269*)—CONTEMPT—PROCEEDINGS TO PUNISH—JUDICIAL NOTICE OF PROCEEDINGS.

In a proceeding to punish a husband for contempt of an order made in a divorce suit against him, requiring payments to his wife, the court takes cognizance of pendency of the main cause; and it is unnecessary to set forth in the affidavit to punish for the contempt the fact of such pendency, nor the provisions of the order violated.

Department 2. Petition by G. W. Mitchell, Jr., for certiorari against the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco and another to review contempt proceedings. Writ discharged.

Rehearing denied; Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

F. H. Dam, for petitioner. Arthur E. Nathanson, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Certiorari directed to a judge of the superior court to the end that this court might examine the proceedings whereby the petitioner, G. W. Mitchell, Jr., was found guilty of contempt.

[1.2] It appears from the record that an action for divorce was pending in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, in which Edith Mitchell was plaintiff and this petitioner was defendant. On or about September 25, 1908, after due proceedings, the court ordered the payment of certain counsel fees and also monthly sums for the support of said plaintiff, Edith Mitchell, pendente lite. Thereafter, upon the affidavit of Edith Mitchell being filed, the court issued an order requiring G. W. Mitchell, Jr., to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt of court because of his failure to comply with the direction to pay alimony and counsel fees. After a hearing he was found guilty, and it was adjudged that he be imprisoned in the county jail of the city and county of San Francisco for the term of five days. Petitioner contends that the court never obtained jurisdiction of the proceeding because of the defects in the affidavit. The rule upon this subject in California is well settled. "The affidavit or affidavits upon which the contempt proceeding is based constitute the complaint; and, unless they, upon their face, charge facts constituting a contempt, the court is without jurisdiction to proceed." Hutton v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 159, 81 Pac. 410. The same rule was announced in Batchelder v. Moore, 42 Cal. 415; Overend v. Superior Court, 131 Cal. 284, 63 Pac. 372; Rogers v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 91, 78 Pac. 344; Otis v. Superior Court, 148 Cal. 130, 82 Pac. 853; Frowley v. Superior Court, 158 Cal. 226, 110 Pac. 817. Petitioner's first and principal objection to the affidavit is that it fails to state that a certified or any copy of the order for the payment of alimony was personally served upon him, or that he had actual knowledge of the signing and filing of said order, or of its contents. The affidavit, however, contains a recital "that the defendant has duly appeared in the above-entitled action in all the proceedings therein, and at all the times and dates herein mentioned." This is followed by the statement that on September 25, 1908, "upon due proceedings therefor first had and obtained, the above-entitled court duly made its order, ordering and directing that the said G. W. Mitchell, Jr., pay to the said Edith Mitchell, certain sums by way of allowance for maintenance and attorney's fees pendente lite. This language amounts to an allegation that defendant was present when the order was made. It was consequently unnecessary to allege or to prove that he had been served with notice of the original order. Ex parte Cottrell 59 Cal. 418; In re McCarty, 154 Cal. 537, 98 Pac. 540.

[3] An effort was made to show by the affidavit of one Reinicke, made during the progress of the hearing, that he had served upon G. W. Mitchell, Jr., a copy of the order for the payment of allowance for maintenance and counsel fees shortly after it was made. Petitioner makes objection both to the introduction of this affidavit and the denial to him of the right to cross-examine Reinicke, and also asserts that the affidavit is insufficient to show service of the order according to law. We find it unnecessary, however, to determine these matters, because the undenied allegation of defendant's presence at the time of the making of the order rendered a showing of service of notice upon him entirely unnecessary.

[4] Complaint is made that his counsel was not permitted to read petitioner's affidavit on the day of the hearing of the order to show cause. The certified record fails to indicate any such state of facts; consequently we cannot consider the point.

[5-7] Petitioner also insists that, the proceeding to punish him for contempt being in the nature of a criminal prosecution, it cannot be inaugurated nor supported by the affidavit of his wife. In this behalf he cites section 1322, Penal Code, and section 1881, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure. His position, briefly stated, is that the proceeding to punish for contempt of court one who disobeys a lawful order is a criminal proceeding designed to "vindicate the dignity and authority of the court" (Ex parte Gould, 99 Cal. 362, 33 Pac. 1112 [21 L. R. A. 751, 37 Am. St. Rep. 57]); that therefore it is not "a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed" by the husband against the wife; and that if we regard it as a civil proceeding the result will be the punishment of the offending party by imprisonment for debt. If this were an independent prosecution unconnected with the civil action to which the husband and wife are parties, there would be much force in petitioner's argument; but the right of the wife to testify in an ancillary proceeding of this sort has never been questioned. This proceeding, although partaking of some of the characteristics of a prosecution for a criminal offense, is properly entitled in the style of the divorce proceeding itself, and not as a separate action. The court takes cognizance of the pendency of the main cause, and there is no necessity of setting forth in the affidavit that fact or "the provisions of the order which has been violated." Ex parte Ah Men, 77 Cal. 200, 19 Pac. 380, 11 Am. St. Rep. 263. It has been held that the sections limiting the right of one spouse to give testimony against the other should receive a liberal construction. People v. Langtree, 64 Cal. 256, 30 Pac. 813; People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 13, 112 Pac. 720, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1193. A construction refusing to a wife, suing for a divorce, a right to institute this ancillary proceeding by her affidavit and to sustain it by her testimony would be most illiberal and strained. The purpose of the affidavit is not merely to set in motion the machinery of the law for the punishment of the delinquent litigant. Its prayer is that he be required to show cause why he has not complied with the court's command. This clearly differentiates the proceeding from the ordinary criminal prosecution and emphasizes its quality as something ancillary to the divorce action and subject to the rules with reference to the competency of witnesses in that cause.

Let the writ of review be discharged.

We concur: LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

DENNIS v. GORDON. (L. A. 2,937.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 5, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 671*)—RECORD—CONSIDERATION OF EVIDENCE—"BILL OF EXCEPTIONS" AND "STATEMENT OF THE CASE."

An order denying a new trial recited that the motion was presented on all the grounds stated in the notice of intention to move for new trial, and upon the statement of the case previously settled. The record contained a bill of exceptions in which the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings was specified, but the order denying the new trial did not clearly state that the grounds on which the motion was based were those specified in the settled statement; the document referred to as a statement of the case being denominated on its face as a "bill of exceptions." Held that, since the expressions "bill of exceptions" and "statement of the case" would be considered synonymous when necessary to accomplish the ends of justice, the recital in the order that the motion was presented on the statement of the case previously settled would be deemed sufficient evidence that the objections set forth in the statement were the grounds of the motion, so as to authorize a consideration of the evidence on appeal, though the copy of the notice of intention printed in the transcript was not authenticated by a bill of exceptions, and therefore could not be considered, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 661, 951, 952.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 340*)—REVIEW OF EVIDENCE—JUDGMENT—NOTICE.

A party wishing to take advantage of the fact that notice of the entry of judgment was served, in order to prevent a consideration of the evidence on appeal from the judgment taken more than 60 days after its entry, must show that such notice was served more than 60 days before the taking of the appeal; otherwise the appeal will be considered as having been taken under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 941a, 941b, 941c—the latter two sections providing that the sufficiency of the evidence is reviewable in the same manner as if the appeal had been taken within 60 days of the entry of judgment under section 939.

3. PARTNERSHIP (§ 94*)—DUTY OF PARTNERS.

By Civ. Code, §§ 2410, 2411, the relation between partners is declared to be confidential, and, with respect to the firm property and business, each is a trustee of the other and bound to act in the highest good faith toward the other, and may not obtain any advantage by the slightest misrepresentation or concealment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 141; Dec. Dig. § 94.*]

4. PARTNERSHIP (§ 99*)—GENERAL PARTNER—DUTY TO FIRM—PERSONAL ATTENTION.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 2436-2438, relating to partners, a general partner, who agrees to give his personal attention to the partnership business, may not engage in any other business which gives him an interest adverse to that of the firm, or which prevents him from giving to the firm business all the attention which would be advantageous to it; but with such exception he may engage in any other business without being accountable to the firm for the profits thereof.

5. PARTNERSHIP (§ 328*)—GENERAL PARTNER—ENGAGING IN OTHER BUSINESS—EVIDENCE.

In an action for an accounting between partners, evidence held to warrant findings that, as to certain corporate stock and other property acquired by defendant during the existence of the partnership, it was obtained with his own funds and effort, without misrepresentation or concealment or injury to the firm, and that he was not therefore required to account for any part of the value thereof to complainant.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by G. C. Dennis against F. V. Gordon for an accounting. From so much of a judgment as denied plaintiff an undivided half interest in property which defendant claimed to own individually, and from an order denying the plaintiff's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Woodruff & McClure and Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, for appellant. Haas, Garrett & Dunnigan, Hunsaker & Britt, and W. E. Mitchell, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Dennis and Gordon were partners, doing business under the firm name of Dennis-Gordon Company. The partnership was formed in September, 1907, and was dissolved by mutual consent on January 31, 1910. Dennis thereupon demanded of Gordon an accounting of the partnership business, which was refused. This action was then begun to compel such accounting. An account was rendered, and after it was settled by the court judgment was given, declaring that certain property standing in the name of Gordon was partnership property, and that Dennis was the owner of an undivided half thereof, and that certain other property in the name of Gordon or his wife was his individual property, in which Dennis had no interest. Dennis appeals from that portion of the judgment which is in favor of Gordon. He also moved for a new trial, and he appeals from an order denying the motion.

The property adjudged to belong to Gordon was, first, 17½ shares of the Wellman Oil Company; second, 75,000 shares of the Western Crude Oil Company and 1,500 shares of the 32 Oil Company; and, third, 100,000 shares of the Hale-McLeod Company. The contention of Dennis is that, although the money paid by Gordon in the acquisition of this property was his own, and not the money of the firm, yet because he did not inform Dennis fully of the facts concerning it, so that Dennis could take an equal share, and, because a part of the consideration upon which Gordon acquired it was services performed and to be performed by Gordon in bettering the property, Gordon was not acting in good faith, and holds the property as trustee for the firm and as firm assets. The findings on this point are in general terms, as to each of said parcels, that it is not a part of the assets of the firm. There were special findings to the effect that Gordon paid $1,000 for the property which he exchanged for the shares in the Western Crude Oil Company and in the 32 Oil Company, and that before buying any of the shares he offered to take Dennis in with him on the deal, but that Dennis refused. It is claimed that these findings are not sustained by sufficient evidence.

[1, 2] There is no merit in the preliminary objection of Gordon that the evidence cannot be considered. The order denying a new trial recites that the motion for a new trial was "presented upon all the grounds stated in the notice of intention to move for a new trial herein, and upon the statement of the case heretofore settled." A copy of the notice of intention is printed in the transcript; but it is not authenticated by a bill of exceptions. Hence it cannot be considered as a part of the record on appeal. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 661, 951, 952. But the record contains a bill of exceptions in which the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain these findings is specified. The order denying the new trial does not clearly state that the grounds upon which the motion was made were those specified in the settled statement, and the draftsman apparently failed to observe that the document referred to as a statement of the case is denominated on its face as a "bill of exceptions." But such orders are to be liberally construed, and substance, rather than form, is the essential thing. A bill of exceptions setting forth the evidence and proceedings taken at the trial, such as the one in this record, is in no wise distinguishable from a statement of the case. Wherever it is necessary for the ends of justice to do so, we will consider the expressions as synonymous. A recital in the order that the motion was presented upon the statement of the case heretofore settled will be deemed sufficient evidence that the objections set forth in the statement were the grounds of the motion. The misnomer, whereby the bill was referred to as a statement, will be disregarded. Furthermore, upon this point it is to be observed that the record does not show that any notice of the entry of the judgment was ever served upon Gordon's attorneys of record. The party wishing to take advantage of the fact that it was served, for the purpose of preventing a consideration of the evidence on appeal from the judgment taken more than 60 days after its entry, must show that such notice was served more than 60 days before the taking of such appeal. Otherwise the appeal will be considered as having been taken under sections 941a, 941b, and 941c of the Code of Civil Procedure. In such a case, by sections 941b and 941c, the sufficiency of the evidence is reviewable in the same manner as if the appeal had been taken within 60 days of the entry of the judgment under section 939.

The Dennis-Gordon Company was formed without capital. Its business was to be the buying and selling of oil, bonds, stocks, oil leases, and real estate, either for others on commission, or on its own behalf, and the promoting of oil companies and the improvement of oil lands. The principal part of its business, however, was the business of selling property for others on commission. It was successful and profitable; but the profits received in money were immediately divided between them. Only a small amount of money was kept on hand, apparently for the purpose of paying current expenses. The agreement of partnership was oral. It contemplated the buying of lands by the firm as a part of the business; but, as there was no capital and no agreement that either should contribute money to the business, it would follow, necessarily, that if any property was bought by or for the firm requiring any considerable sum of money, a new agreement concerning it would have to be made before either would be obliged to contribute of his individual funds for that investment. Such new agreement might be made informally, as, for example, if either bought property for the firm and the other, after knowledge thereof, acquiesced therein, or made no objection thereto. In that case there would be an implied agreement by each to contribute such additional funds as might be required therefor.

It is conceded that Gordon did not use any partnership funds in acquiring the properties in question, and that the money he paid therefor was his individual property. The only grounds upon which it is claimed that the property belongs to the firm are, as before stated, that Gordon paid the consideration in part by the performance of services in and about the properties; that his attention thereto prevented him from giving due attention to the firm business; and that he obtained the consent of Dennis that it should not be bought on firm account by concealing from Dennis the real character of the property, or by failing to inform him thereof.

The shares in the 32 Oil Company, in the Western Crude Oil Company, and in the Hale-McLeod Company were all obtained in exchange for interests in certain oil lands held by Gordon and transferred by him to those companies. The 32 Oil Company shares were procured by the transfer of a one-fourth interest in a part of section 32, those of the Western Crude by the transfer to it of a one-fourth interest in a part of section 4, and those in the Hale-McLeod Company by the transfer to it of an interest in lands in sections 28, 34, and 24. These lands were not all in the same township and range; but their particular location is not important. The fact of the exchanges of these lands for stocks is of no consequence. The material inquiry is with regard to the acquisition by Gordon of the interests in the lands. If such interests became firm assets, then the stocks received in exchange would also be firm assets.

The lands were all government lands, subject to location and acquisition as mineral lands, on condition that oil was discovered therein. The lands in section 32 and section 4 had been located as mineral lands by one McMurtry; but no discovery had been made, and they were entirely undeveloped. One McLeod had obtained control thereof, and had induced Wheat and Wilson to take each a one-fourth interest with him, and was endeavoring to get a fourth man to take another one-fourth interest. The agreement with McMurtry was in the name of McLeod's wife. McLeod had agreed to drill certain wells thereon for the discovery of oil in consideration of this contract. These three parties then proposed to Gordon to transfer to him a one-fourth interest with them in the enterprise, he to pay one-fourth of the expenses, estimated at $1,000, and to assist in obtaining other parties to drill the wells. The plan was to erect derricks preparatory to drilling, and then make leases to others, who would complete the wells and discover the oil.

Gordon informed Dennis of this proposition, stating to him that the land had to be developed; that it was government land, not proved up; that it was a wildcat proposition and very much of a gamble; and that it would take $1,000 if they went into it together; and proposed that if he would go in for one-half of it they would take it for the firm. Dennis refused to go into it, and said, in substance, that the firm should not go into it; that he was without funds to invest in it himself; and that he would not go into anything in which McLeod was interested. Upon this refusal of Dennis, Gordon, on his own behalf, agreed with McLeod, Wheat, and Wilson to take a one-fourth interest with them on the terms proposed. Mrs. McLeod thereupon assigned to Wheat, Wilson, and Gordon each a one-fourth interest in the land. She apparently held the other one-fourth as trustee for McLeod. The four then began the erection of derricks for drilling wells, and sought to find persons who would take leases and drill the same. These were the services referred to as part of the consideration given by Gordon for the property. It does not appear that much of Gordon's time was spent therein, or that it seriously interfered with his proper attention to the affairs of the Dennis-Gordon Company. Gordon's share of the outlay was $1,000. Before expending more, they succeeded in obtaining lessees, who proceeded with the work and drilled the wells. Oil was found, and the land at once became valuable. The services of Gordon in this enterprise were all performed after he had made the proposal to Dennis, above stated, and after Dennis had refused to go into it. If this refusal was not procured by concealment or misrepresentation, the consent of Dennis that Gordon might go into it on his own account and his refusal to allow the firm to take a part in it would estop him from claiming that Gordon's subsequent reasonable attention to the new enterprise, not materially interfering with his attention to the firm business, should nevertheless inure to the benefit of the firm.

[3, 4] The law governing partnerships is settled by the Civil Code. The relation between partners is confidential. With respect to the firm property and business, each is trustee of the other. Section 2410. In the conduct of the business, each must act in the highest good faith toward the other, and may not obtain any advantage over him by the slightest misrepresentation or concealment. Section 2411. A general partner, who agrees to give his personal attention to the partnership business, may not engage in any other business which gives him an interest adverse to that of the firm, or which prevents him from giving to the firm business all the attention which would be advantageous to it. Section 2436. Except as thus bound, he may engage in any other business without being accountable to the firm for the profits thereof. Sections 2437, 2438.

[5] The evidence shows that the statements made by Gordon to Dennis respecting the property were true. The land was undeveloped; it was not known that it contained oil; and if none was discovered all the money and effort expended in it would be a total loss. It was truly a gamble and a speculation. The value afterwards shown to be in the property was practically all the result of the money expended and the exertions of the interested parties after they had made their agreement. There is nothing to indicate that Gordon had any greater knowledge of the existence of oil in the land than Dennis had. The latter had not had as much experience as Gordon in the development of oil land, it is true. But he had had some experience in such matters, and had made some deals in oil lands. He does not claim that he was so destitute of common knowledge on the subject that he did not know that a mineral location was valueless if there was no mineral in the land, and that, in order to make an undeveloped oil location on government land of any value, both money and time had to be expended in discovering the oil believed to be contained in it. The information he received was therefore sufficient for him to understand that if he and Gordon went into the speculation together they would have to give to it time and services, as well as money, and that Gordon must do the same if he alone went into it with the other parties. The refusal of Dennis to take an interest, and his consent that Gordon alone should do so, was equivalent to an agreement that Gordon should do his part in assisting the independent concern without giving the Dennis-Gordon Company any claim or account thereof.

The evidence does not compel the conclusion that Gordon was acting in bad faith, or with the intent to deter Dennis from taking an interest in the property. The finding of the court implies that he acted in good faith, and we must take it as true. No effort at concealment is shown to have been made by Gordon; nor is there anything indicating that he did not believe that the land and its prospects were as he represented it to Dennis when he asked him to take a share therein. No money of the firm was used. The fact that the $1,000 which Gordon paid was soon returned to him out of the profit is not material. Having the right, under the circumstances, to acquire the interest for himself, he was entitled to the profit as his own. It follows from all these considerations that the court below properly found that the stock for which these lands were exchanged was not a part of the firm assets.

There is no substantial ground for the claim that the Hale-McLeod Company stock is firm assets. McLeod had obtained some interest or right in the three sections, above mentioned, by an agreement with the original locators that he would protect the locations for them by doing the necessary development work. Several months after the transaction hereinbefore set forth had occurred, McLeod offered Gordon a one-fourth interest in this contract with the locators, for the sum of $2,100. He also offered to loan Gordon the money to pay for this interest. Gordon informed Dennis of the offer of the interest and proposed to let him in on the deal on the same terms; but he did not say anything about McLeod offering to loan him the money. He informed him, however, of the condition of the land, the plan contemplated for development and discovery of oil, and that it was his opinion that it was good property, and that they would make money on it, either in cash, or by acquiring shares in some corporation to be formed with the land as capital. Dennis thereupon stated that he had no money to invest, and refused to go into it. There is no evidence that Gordon devoted any time or attention whatever to this enterprise. As a partner of Dennis, he was under no obligation to use his own credit in borrowing money to loan to Dennis to enable Dennis to go into the deal, either as a member of the firm, or on his own account. With respect to new enterprises in which the firm had no interest, he was not bound to pay money for Dennis as a contribution for Dennis to the enterprise. If he had advanced such money, the transaction would have been an individual matter between them, and not a part of the firm business. There is no evidence of any concealment by Gordon respecting this property. So far as he appears to have been concerned with it, the business was in no wise adverse to the interests of the firm. No reason appears why he could not buy an interest in it without taking it as firm property.

The shares in the Wellman Oil Company were not firm assets. They were obtained in the following manner: The Western Crude Oil Company, after Gordon became a stockholder therein, obtained a large block of stock in the Wellman Oil Company. It desired to raise funds for its own development work, and for that purpose offered to its stockholders the Wellman stock at a fixed price in proportion to their holdings of the Western Crude stock. Gordon took 17½ shares at the price named and paid his own money for them. It was a mere investment of his own funds. His relations to the firm did not make it his duty to offer the property to the firm, or to buy it for the firm. It was in no way connected with the firm business, nor adverse to its interests.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DELHANTIE. (Cr. 1,740.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 6, 1912.)

1. GRAND JURY (§ 38*)—STENOGRAPHERS—QUALIFICATIONS.

A stenographer, selected under Pen. Code, § 925, to report grand jury proceedings, need not be the official reporter of the superior court; and Code Civ. Proc. §§ 270, 271, relating to official reporters, are inapplicable.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1166*)—TESTIMONY BEFORE GRAND JURY—SERVICE OF COPY.

The requirement of Pen. Code, § 925, for service upon accused, within five days after the discharge of the grand jury which indicted him, of a copy of the stenographic report of testimony taken before the grand jury is directory; and noncompliance therewith is not reversible error, in the absence of prejudice to accused, where the copy is served within a reasonable time and early enough to enable him to properly make such defense as he has to the matters shown thereby.

6. GRAND JURY (§ 40*)—STENOGRAPHIC REPORT OF TESTIMONY—TRANSCRIPTION—TIME.

A reporter, appointed under Pen. Code, § 925, to report testimony taken before a grand jury, may make a certified transcript after the grand jury has been discharged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Grand Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 83-85; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

7. HOMICIDE (§ 127*)—MURDER—INDICTMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

An indictment, charging that accused on a specified day, at and in a specified county, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously, and with malice aforethought, killed and murdered a specified person, being contrary to the form, etc., of the statute, sufficiently charges murder.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 192-194; Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170½*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—CROSS-EXAMINATION OF ACCUSED.

Where one accused of murder testified that he did not remember of having attacked decedent or another person, it was not prejudicial error to permit the district attorney to ask him, on cross-examination, if he did not remember lying in wait in an alley for such other person.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3129-3135; Dec. Dig. § 1170½.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170½*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—CROSS-EXAMINATION OF ACCUSED.

It was not prejudicial error to permit one accused of murder to be asked, on cross-examination, if, when he stabbed decedent and "knew that he was a dead one," accused did not remember leaving, as against objection that the question improperly assumed that accused knew decedent was dead.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3129-3135; Dec. Dig. § 1170½.*]

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 479*)—EXPERTS ON SANITY—QUALIFICATIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

Physicians showed sufficient observation of accused to qualify them to testify to his sanity, where they had acted as commissioners on examination of accused for insanity, and where one of the physicians had had accused under his observation for an hour or more six days prior to such examination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1067, 1068; Dec. Dig. § 479.*]

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 452*)—EXPERTS ON SANITY—QUALIFICATIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

A state prison warden was sufficiently acquainted with accused to qualify him, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10, to give an opinion as to accused's sanity, where the warden had had accused in his custody for about three years next preceding the date of the particular offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1053-1055; Dec. Dig. § 452.*]

12. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a trial for murdering a fellow convict, it was not prejudicial error to permit the district attorney to ask the warden of the prison whether decedent had the reputation of being a "busybody," where defendant's witnesses testified that decedent was a "stool pigeon" and a trouble maker.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court. Marin County; E. T. Zook, Judge.

Edward Delhantie was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

George H. Harlan, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas P. Boyd, Dist. Atty., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The defendant was charged by the grand jury of Marin county, by indictment presented in the superior court on March 1, 1912, with the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed in said county on February 16, 1912. His trial in the superior court was commenced on April 8, 1912, and resulted, on April 11, 1912, in a verdict of "guilty of a felony, namely, murder in the first degree." On April 15, 1912, judgment of death was pronounced. This is an appeal by defendant from such judgment.

1. When the matter was under investigation by the grand jury, that body appointed one F. O. Sirard as a reporter to report the testimony taken. Mr. Sirard was present as such reporter during the taking of the testimony by the grand jury, and took down such testimony in shorthand. The grand jury presented the indictment in this case on March 1, 1912, and on the same day was finally discharged by the court from further attendance. Mr. Sirard failed to certify as correct or present any long-hand transcript of such testimony until March 8, 1912, and no copy of the same was served on defendant prior to said day. It further appeared that such testimony was not transcribed before the discharge of the grand jury.

Section 925, Penal Code, provides in part, as follows: "The grand jury, on the demand of the district attorney, whenever criminal causes are being investigated before them, must appoint a competent stenographic reporter to be sworn and to report the testimony that may be given in such causes in shorthand, and to transcribe the same in all cases where an indictment is returned. If an indictment has been found against a defendant, a copy of the testimony given in his case before the grand jury shall be served upon him within five days after the discharge of the grand jury, or if the grand jury has not been discharged, at least five days before the cause is set for trial. * * * No person other than those specified in this and the succeeding section is permitted to be present during the session of the grand jury, except the members and witnesses actually under examination. * * *"

It is not claimed that a copy of the testimony was not served upon the defendant in ample time to enable him to prepare for trial, or that he suffered any prejudice whatever from the failure to serve him with such copy within five days after the discharge of the grand jury.

[1-3] Based upon the facts we have stated, a motion was made to set aside the indictment, on the ground that it was not found, indorsed, and presented as prescribed in the Penal Code, in that (1) no copy of the testimony was served on defendant within five days after the adjournment of the grand jury; (2) that the grand jury never caused the person appointed as stenographic reporter to transcribe such testimony; (3) that the testimony was not taken down by an official reporter qualified or appointed as required by sections 260, 270, and 271, Code of Civil Procedure; and (4) that a person was permitted to be present during the session of the grand jury and when the charge embraced in the indictment was under consideration, other than as provided in section 925, Penal Code, viz., said F. O. Sirard. The last specification is based entirely on the claim that Mr. Sirard was not such a person as could be appointed by the grand jury as reporter, for, of course, the "competent stenographic reporter," who may be appointed under the provisions of section 925, Penal Code, and is in fact appointed and sworn, is one of the persons specified in that section who may be present. There is nothing to indicate that Mr. Sirard was not "a competent stenographic reporter," and the section authorizes the selection by the grand jury of any competent stenographer. It is not essential that the one selected be the official reporter of the superior court; and sections 270 and 271 of the Code of Civil Procedure have no application. What we have said disposes of the third, as well as the last, specification. The other two specifications have nothing to do with the matter of the finding, indictment, and presentation of the indictment, and are not available on a motion to set aside an indictment. Section 995, Pen. Code. The motion to set aside the indictment was properly denied. Similar objections were made on a motion in arrest of judgment; but they were not available thereon. Section 1185, Pen. Code.

[4] It is insisted that by reason of the facts we have stated, the superior court was without jurisdiction to proceed with the trial of defendant upon this indictment. We are unable to perceive any merit in this claim. The jurisdiction of the superior court was not dependent upon compliance with the provisions of section 925, Penal Code. It obtained jurisdiction of the cause for all purposes by reason of the presentation by the grand jury of the indictment charging defendant with the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed in Marin county. If any substantial right given defendant by section 925, Penal Code, was denied him, it could amount at most simply to error, reviewable in such manner as the law provides.

[5] The only right given to an indicted defendant by this section, so far as the testimony taken before the grand jury is concerned, is, where the testimony has been taken down in shorthand on the demand of the district attorney, to have a longhand copy thereof furnished him "within five days after the discharge of the grand jury, or if the grand jury has not been discharged, at least five days before the cause is set for trial." The manifest object of this provision is to enable him to know the testimony upon which the charge against him is founded, and to enable him to make his defense. We have no doubt that, as has been held several times with relation to subdivision 5 of section 869, Penal Code, requiring the shorthand reporter at a preliminary examination within ten days after the close of such examination to transcribe into longhand his shorthand notes and certify and file the same with the county clerk, that the specification as to time is directory merely (see People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 375, 381, 77 Pac. 169, and cases there cited); and that, if the defendant is served with a copy of the testimony within a reasonable time and early enough to enable him to properly make such defense as he has to the matters shown thereby, he cannot be heard to complain of the failure to comply literally with the terms of the statute. In such event such noncompliance is absolutely without prejudice to the defendant. As we have said, it is not even suggested that a true copy of the testimony given before the grand jury was not in fact served upon defendant in ample time to enable him to make such defense as he had.

[6] There is nothing in the claim that all powers and duties of the reporter appointed by the grand jury end with the discharge of that body. The law by express provisions defines the duties of one so appointed, among which is the duty to transcribe the testimony in all cases where an indictment is returned. There is nothing in the law requiring this to be done during the life of the grand jury that appointed him; and it is manifest from the language used that it was contemplated that in some cases it would necessarily be done after that body had adjourned. The appointment of the reporter vests him with the power and makes it his duty to make and furnish this transcription, even though the body that appointed him has been finally discharged; and when he makes and certifies the transcription he does it as the officer or agent upon whom the law has devolved that duty, regardless of whether or not the grand jury has been discharged. It follows from what we have said that there was no error whatever on the part of the trial court in this matter, and that the failure to serve defendant with a copy of the testimony within five days after the adjournment of the grand jury does not warrant a reversal.

[7] 2. The indictment charged that the defendant, on the 16th day of February, 1912, at and in the county of Marin, state of California, willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and of his malice aforethought, did kill and murder one William Kaufman, a human being, contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such case made and provided and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California. That such language sufficiently charges the crime of murder for all the purposes of an indictment or information is too well settled in this state to require discussion. See People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 354, 75 Pac. 1093, and cases there cited; People v. Hyndman, 99 Cal. 1, 33 Pac. 782, and cases there cited. The trial court therefore did not err in overruling the demurrer and the motion in arrest of judgment.

[8] 3. On cross-examination of the defendant, he having testified substantially on direct examination that he did not remember anything about having attacked either Peterson or the deceased during the morning of February 16th, the district attorney asked him various questions as to his want of recollection, among others, "You don't remember laying in wait in that alley for Mr. Peterson?" This was assigned as error by counsel for defendant; the claim being that there was no evidence to show lying in wait on the part of defendant, and therefore nothing to warrant such a question. The trial court thought it was proper cross-examination, and a careful reading of the testimony theretofore given satisfies us that the court was correct in its conclusion. Nor are we able to see that the question was such as to warrant us in holding that the defendant was prejudiced by the asking thereof, even if it were not proper cross-examination. The question does not appear to have been answered.

[9] The defendant could not have been prejudiced by the asking of the question: "And then when you had stabbed him [Kaufman] and knew he was a dead one, you do not remember leaving; you do not remember that?" The only objection made on account of this question was that it improperly assumed that defendant knew that Kaufman was dead. The defendant answered substantially that he had no recollection of any of these things.

If we assume that the district attorney exceeded the bounds of legitimate argument in the few words he said regarding the defense of insanity, which we do not at all concede, it is very clear to us that it cannot be held, especially in view of the instructions of the court in regard to such defense, that the defendant was at all prejudiced thereby.

[10] 4. Two physicians, Dr. Miller and Dr. Hayden, were allowed to testify substantially that in their opinion the defendant was sane on January 30, 1909. The only objection to Dr. Miller's testimony was that his period of observation was too short to enable him to form an opinion; and the objection to Dr. Hayden's testimony was that no proper foundation had been laid. The competency of Dr. Miller as an expert on insanity was not questioned by the objection to his testimony, and such competency was fully shown by the evidence as to both witnesses. Each of these witnesses had officiated as a commissioner on an examination of defendant for insanity in Fresno county, which was had on January 30, 1909, and the knowledge of each as to defendant was acquired at that time, except that Dr. Miller also had defendant under his observation for an hour or more six days prior to such examination. We think that the evidence shows a sufficient opportunity for examination and observation on the part of the witnesses to warrant the court in allowing their opinions as to sanity or insanity of defendant on January 30, 1909, to go to the jury.

[11] 5. Warden Hoyle had the custody of defendant in the California State Prison at San Quentin for something like three years next preceding the date of the homicide, and the evidence as to his observation of him and his conversations with him during this period were such as to support the conclusion of the trial court that he was sufficiently "an intimate acquaintance" of defendant, within the meaning of that term as used in subdivision 10 of section 1870, Code of Civil Procedure, to give his opinion as to his mental sanity. No other objection was made to his testimony on this subject.

[12] 6. The question whether the deceased, Kaufman, had the reputation in the prison of being a busybody was, of course, absolutely immaterial to any issue involved on the trial of this case. No objection on this ground, however, was interposed on the trial to the question asked Warden Hoyle in this regard. In asking the question, the district attorney was undoubtedly seeking to rebut certain immaterial testimony on the part of witnesses for the defendant to the effect that deceased was both a "stool pigeon" and a trouble maker. We are of the opinion that there was no error in overruling the specific objection made, viz., that no proper foundation for the question had been laid, and that it had not been shown that the warden had any knowledge on the subject. But in any event it is clear that the whole matter was of very small importance and without prejudice to defendant's cause.

No other point is made for reversal. We have considered the whole record and find no reason to doubt that the defendant had a fair trial on the merits, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte MONTGOMERY. (Cr. 1,699.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 6, 1912.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 616*)—ORDINANCES—REGULATION OF BUSINESS—VALIDITY.

Los Angeles Ordinance No. 22,798 (New Series), which makes it unlawful to operate a lumber yard or other specified industries within the residence district described by the ordinance, is a constitutional exercise of police power.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1355, 1356; Dec. Dig. § 616.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 611*)—ORDINANCES—REGULATION OF BUSINESS—VALIDITY.

A city has a large discretion in enforcing such police measures as ordinances prohibiting the operation of industrial establishments, etc., in the residence district.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1344-1349; Dec. Dig. § 611.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 616*)—ORDINANCES—REGULATION OF BUSINESS—VALIDITY.

Los Angeles City Charter (St. 1911, p. 2064) art. 1, § 2, subd. 21, which authorizes the city to regulate or prohibit, etc., specified business enterprises, does not limit the city's general police power, under subdivision 34, or under Const. art. 11, § 11; and hence Ordinance No. 22,798 (New Series), which prohibits operation of lumber yards, etc., within the residence district, is not invalid, because lumber yards are not specified in subdivision 21.

In Bank. Application by W. F. Montgomery for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

E. J. Fleming and James S. Bennett, for petitioner. Guy Eddie, City Prosecutor, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. [1] A writ of habeas corpus was issued from this court, directed to the chief of police of the city of Los Angeles, by whom petitioner was imprisoned by virtue of a warrant issued out of the police court of that city. Petitioner was charged with misdemeanor, in that he did "erect, establish, maintain, and carry on a lumber yard at No. 132 West avenue 61 within the residence district of said city" of Los Angeles. The sole question presented therefore is the sufficiency of Ordinance No. 22,798 (New Series) of the city of Los Angeles in its application to petitioner. The contention is, first, that the ordinance is in excess of the legislative powers of the mayor and city council of the city of Los Angeles under the charter of said city; and, second, that it is in violation of private rights secured by the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the state of California.

[2] The ordinance in question was adopted instead of, and by its terms repealed, Ordinance No. 19,563 (New Series). Like that ordinance, it declared all of the city, except certain enumerated industrial districts, to be a residence district, and prohibited the conduct of certain sorts of business therein. Section 2 of the later ordinance differs in no material particular from the identically numbered section of its predecessor. By that section it is declared unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to "erect, establish, maintain or carry on within the residence district described in said section 1" of said ordinance " * * * any stone crusher, rolling mill, machine shop, planing mill, carpet-beating establishment, hay barn, wood yard, lumber yard, public laundry, or wash-house." In Ex parte Quong Wo, 118 Pac. 714, we had occasion to examine Ordinance No. 19,563 (New Series), and to determine that it was a legitimate and constitutional exercise of the police power. What was there said applies with equal force to the portion of the later ordinance now before us, and that case disposes of this petitioner's second objection regarding the constitutionality of said municipal by-law. Petitioner affirms that the ordinance is discriminatory by reason of the placing of a "business center" within the lines of the "residence district." Upon this point the evidence is conflicting. It is shown that certain wooden buildings near petitioner's lumber yard are occupied for business purposes; but the return seeks to show by affidavit and by photographic exhibits that the lumber yard is situated in the midst of a section of the city devoted almost exclusively to residences. In any view of the evidence, we cannot say that the city council violated the large discretion vested in it with reference to police measures of the kind here considered; and, unless such abuse of discretion appears, courts are never inclined to nullify ordinances on the ground of their unfairness. See Ex parte Quong Wo, supra, and cases there cited.

[3] Petitioner's most important contention is that the enumeration in the charter of Los Angeles of certain trades, callings, and occupations which may be prohibited excludes the prohibition by ordinance of others not so enumerated. The charter provides (subd. 21 of section 2 of article 1) that the city of Los Angeles, in addition to its other powers, shall have the right "to license, regulate, restrain, suppress, or prohibit any or all laundries, livery and sale stables, cattle and horse corrals, slaughterhouses, butcher shops, brick yards, dance halls or academies, public billiard or pool halls or tables, bowling and tenpin alleys, boxing contests, sparring or other exhibitions, shows, circuses, games and amusements. To license, regulate or prohibit the construction and use of billboards, signs and fences." This, petitioner contends, is a limitation upon the general police power conferred by section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution, and by a similar section of the charter (subdivision 34 of section 2 of article 1, Stats. 1911, p. 2064), which gives the city power "to make and enforce within its limits such local, police, sanitary and other regulations as are deemed expedient to maintain the public peace, protect property, promote the public morals and to preserve the health of its inhabitants." By specifying certain occupations that may be prohibited, petitioner maintains, the charter withholds from the city council the power to prohibit any others; for, he says, the legislative body of a city having a freeholders' charter may be limited in the exercise of police power by a charter provision, citing Rapp & Son v. Kiel, 159 Cal. 709, 115 Pac. 651, and In re Pfahler, 150 Cal. 81, 88 Pac. 270, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092, 11 Ann. Cas. 911. We do not think that these cited cases sustain the position of petitioner. In both of them the court was passing upon the place of lodgment of the power of a city, and not upon the limitation of the power itself. In Rapp & Son v. Kiel the court was discussing a function of the board of supervisors to impose a certain restriction which, under the limitations placed upon the said board, it, as a legislative body, was not authorized to enact. In re Pfahler also dealt with the place of lodgment of legislative function; but in neither of the opinions in those cases was it held nor implied that a charter may cut down the constitutional power of a city itself. In the Pfahler Case we find the court approving the doctrine announced in the opinion in Odd Fellows' Cemetery Ass'n v. City and County of San Francisco, 140 Cal. 226, 73 Pac. 987, and using the following language with reference to that case: "It was held that nothing contained in the charter could affect the grant made by the Constitution, and that the city, under such constitutional grant, had the right to exercise the whole police power of the state, so far as local regulations were concerned, subject only to the control of general laws." The provisions of the charter of Los Angeles, quoted above, are not in terms limitations at all, but enumerations of powers. They are expressly given to the city of Los Angeles "in addition to any other powers now held by or that may hereafter be granted to it under the Constitution and laws of the state." If, therefore, the ordinance here considered may be upheld under the general police powers of the city as exercised by its legislative body, it will not fall merely because the city has specific authority under its charter to suppress certain kinds of business. It is to be noted, also, that the ordinance is not one intended to suppress, but to regulate, specified occupations. As a regulatory measure, it comes clearly within the principle of such cases as Ex parte Quong Wo, supra; Ex parte Lacey, 108 Cal. 326, 41 Pac. 411, 38 L. R. A. 640, 49 Am. St. Rep. 93; Grumbach v. Leland, 154 Cal. 683, 98 Pac. 1059. While a lumber yard is not per se a nuisance, it takes no extended argument to convince one that in a residence district such a place may be a menace to the safety of the property in its neighborhood for various reasons, among which may be mentioned the inflammable nature of the materials kept there.

Let the writ be discharged and the petitioner remanded.

MOSSI v. FAIRBANKS. (Civ. 966.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 28, 1912. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 26, 1912.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 276*)—FORFEITURE FOR NONPAYMENT OF RENT—DEMAND FOR RENT.

The common-law rule requiring a lessor in a lease stipulating for re-entry by him, on default in the payment of rent, to demand payment of the rent due before a forfeiture of the lease can be decreed is not abrogated by Civ. Code, § 791, providing that when the right of re-entry is given the re-entry may be made, after the right has accrued, on three days' notice, as provided in Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1161, 1162, or by section 793, authorizing an action for the possession of real property, leased with a right of re-entry at any time after the accrual of the right of re-entry, without the notice prescribed in section 791; and the right of re-entry for nonpayment of rent does not accrue until a demand has been made for its payment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; George D. Murry, Judge.

Action by Chris Mossi against Marvin Fairbanks. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. W. Hill, for appellant. Pierce H. Ryan, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The only question involved is whether a demand for the payment of rent is a condition precedent to the enforcement of the forfeiture of a lease. The premises were rented for the term of seven years and four months, commencing on the 4th day of July, 1910, for the monthly rental of $7.50, payable monthly in advance on the 4th day of each month during said term. It was provided in the lease "that if any rent shall be due and unpaid, or if default shall be made in any of the covenants herein contained, then it shall be lawful for the party of the first part to re-enter said premises and to remove all persons therefrom." The action was brought to recover possession of the property in consequence of the failure of the lessee to pay the rent as agreed. In the complaint there was no allegation of demand for the rent, and for this omission the court sustained defendant's general demurrer. Plaintiff declining to amend, judgment of dismissal was entered, from which the appeal was taken.

Undoubtedly the general rule is that a demand for the rent must be made before forfeiture will be decreed. In Sauer v. Meyer, 87 Cal. 34, 25 Pac. 153, it is said: "The appellant here claims that she has the right to recover, because there has been a forfeiture of the lease for nonpayment of the rent. Forfeitures are not favored; and our Civil Code contains this provision: 'A condition involving a forfeiture must be strictly interpreted against the party for whose benefit it is created. Section 1442.' To give a landlord a right of re-entry for nonpayment of rent, a demand of the rent, upon or after the last day upon which the lessee has to pay, is essential to complete the forfeiture, and to enable him to maintain an action in ejectment. Taylor on Landlord and Tenant (8th Ed.) § 297; Wood on Landlord and Tenant (2d Ed.) § 514." This case and other authorities are cited in Ciapusci v. Clark, 12 Cal. App. 53, 106 Pac. 440, in support of the statement: "Regarding the $5 payment as rent, there could be no forfeiture under this agreement without demand by plaintiff of the rental upon or after the last day given the lessee on which to pay." The decisions in this state, as pointed out by respondent, seem to be uniform in holding that a demand for the rent is required.

In Gaskill v. Trainer, 3 Cal. 335, the right to re-enter for nonpayment of the rent was reserved in the contract; but it was declared by the Supreme Court that "the failure to pay cannot alone create a forfeiture. There was an equal necessity that a formal demand should have been made on the day it became due. Nor for the purpose of forfeiture will a waiver of demand ever be implied; but a forfeiture, from its very nature, cannot take place by consent, and it is not favored by the rules of law." It is not disputed that the common law was very strict in its requirement that the demand for rent be made upon the leased premises and at a late hour of the very day when and for the exact amount that was due; but in some respects this strictness has been relaxed, as will be observed by an examination of the cases. Indeed, a change in the statute has modified the rule. The question is fully discussed in McGlynn v. Moore, 25 Cal. 384, Gage v. Bates, 40 Cal. 384, and O'Connor v. Kelly, 41 Cal. 432; but in no decision in the state has it been held, under like conditions as those involved herein, that a request or demand for the rent is not required before a suit can be maintained for a forfeiture of the lease.

In 24 Cyc. p. 1354, the rule is stated as follows: "Ordinarily a demand of performance is necessary after the lessee's breach of a covenant to pay taxes or assessments, or a failure to pay rent, before the lessor can declare a forfeiture. However, the common-law necessity for a demand of rent may be obviated by a statute providing otherwise, by provisions in the lease dispensing with a demand, or by acts of the tenant amounting to a waiver."

It is not contended by appellant that the lease contains any provision dispensing with a demand, or that there has been any waiver on the part of the lessee; but the claim is made that the action was brought under section 793 of the Civil Code, and that this section authorizes recovery without any demand or request for the payment of the rent. The language of the section is: "An action for the possession of real property leased or granted, with a right of re-entry, may be maintained at any time, after the right to re-enter has accrued, without the notice prescribed in section seven hundred and ninety-one." We think, however, respondent is right in his contention that "appellant has fallen into the error of confusing the notice prescribed in section 791 with the demand required by law before a forfeiture can be declared. Section 791 of the Civil Code provides: 'Whenever the right of re-entry is given to a grantor or lessor in any grant or lease or otherwise, such re-entry may be made at any time after the right has accrued upon three days' notice, as provided in sections 1161 and 1162 of the Code of Civil Procedure.' Section 1161, C. C. P., provides that a tenant in default for nonpayment of rent is guilty of unlawful detainer after three days' notice to pay the same or surrender possession. Section 1162 provides the manner of service of such notice. Neither section 791 nor 793, C. C., changes the common-law rule requiring a demand for the rent before a forfeiture of the tenant's estate can be declared. Section 791, C. C., in connection with sections 1161 and 1162, C. C. P., simply gives to the landlord a new and summary remedy unknown to the common law, whereby he can in a summary proceeding recover possession from the delinquent tenant, together with treble damages or rents by way of penalty for the tenant's refusal to quit. But before such summary recovery can be had and such penalties enforced, the statute provides, for the protection of the tenant, the service of three days' notice. Simple demand shall not be sufficient; but notice in writing shall be served on him after default made, which notice must be served at least three days before the summary proceedings can be instituted or maintained. Section 793, C. C., does not dispense with the demand required by law, but merely reserves to the landlord his common-law action of ejectment, in addition to his summary remedy under section 791, C. C. Section 793, C. C., simply makes clear by statute that, if the landlord does not desire to avail himself of the summary proceeding provided by the Code, it will not be necessary for him to serve three days' written notice; but it does not relieve him from the necessity of making demand, verbal or otherwise, for the rent." In other words, the right of re-entry for nonpayment of rent does not accrue until a demand has been made for its payment, regardless of the section of the Code under which the action is brought.

It is manifest that this requirement imposes no hardship upon the landlord, and it is in keeping with the general attitude of the law towards forfeitures. It is a very simple matter to provide in the lease that no demand for rent shall be required; or, if this is not done, it should not be considered a very grievous burden to exact of the landlord a request of the tenant for the payment of the rent before depriving him of his possession. It is true that the statute does not expressly require this demand; but it is affirmed by the authorities to be a just and equitable prerequisite to the enforcement of the drastic penalty of forfeiture, and we think it should be left undisturbed until the Legislature has clearly spoken to the contrary. Appellant, speaking of his contention, admits that "we are somewhat embarrassed by a contrary ruling in Sauer v. Meyer, 87 Cal. 34 [25 Pac. 153], and in Chiapucci v. Clark, 12 Cal. App. 53 [106 Pac. 436];" but he thinks they should not be followed. The suggestion, however, is not inappropriate that appellant could easily have followed the doctrine of those cases in preparing the lease, or in making the demand before bringing suit, and thus have saved himself unnecessary trouble and expense.

We think the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

PECK v. COYLE. (Civ. 918.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, July 2, 1912.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 71*)—EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PAYMENT—CONSIDERATION.

Payments to be made under a contract to purchase land are of themselves sufficient consideration for an extension of time for payment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Charles W. Peck against B. M. Coyle. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Holl & Holl and White, Miller & McLaughlin, for appellant. De Ligne & Jones, for respondent.

HAWKINS, Special Judge. The plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract, whereby plaintiff agreed to buy and defendant agreed to sell certain real property. The purchase price, amounting to $3,870, was fair and adequate, and was to be paid as follows: $30 a few days after the execution of the agreement, and the balance in six annual installments of $640 each, on the 15th of November of each year, the first payment to be made November 15, 1905. Time was made the essence of the contract, and in case of default on the part of plaintiff all payments were to be forfeited as liquidated damages. The plaintiff had the privilege of paying the entire purchase price at any time before maturity; and upon receiving payment defendant agreed to execute a good and sufficient deed, conveying the land to the plaintiff free and clear of all incumbrance. The plaintiff entered into possession of the property and made valuable improvements. He made the first payment of $30, but failed to pay the installments at the time specified in the contract, but did make certain payments, which were accepted by the defendant. At the time fixed for the fifth payment, a dispute arose as to the amount due and to be paid; whereupon the defendant demanded the entire balance under the contract, and, it not being promptly paid, gave written notice of forfeiture and also that she would at once take possession of the property. The plaintiff thereupon tendered the balance due and demanded a deed, and, the defendant declining to take the money or execute the deed, the plaintiff brought this action to enforce specific performance of the contract. The court found that the tender was made in the time provided by the contract and as extended by defendant; and that the money was immediately deposited in the name and to the credit of defendant in a bank of good repute and decreed specific performance. The defendant appealed, and presents several points to this court for determination.

[1, 2] First. It is claimed that the evidence does not support the fifth finding of fact to the effect that the defendant waived the provision of the contract, providing that time should be the essence thereof, and extended the times of the payment thereof from time to time. The first payment was made by note on November 15, 1906, and was paid November 17, 1908. The third payment was due November 15, 1907, and $227.98 was paid thereon on November 17, 1908. At the same time defendant, in writing, extended the time for the payment of the balance of said third payment to November 15, 1909. The record is silent as to the fourth payment; but the extension of the third payment of itself operated to extend the time of the payment of the subsequent installment also to November 15, 1909. The defendant stated at the time the payments were made: "Make what payment you can. It will be all right." "I want you to have the property, and pay all you can." "Raise all the money you can, and it will be all right."

The witness Henderson, who figured the matter up for the parties, was in the best position to know, and he testified that each time she granted an extension defendant told plaintiff and witness that "she reasoned she was getting a good price for the property; that she consulted with witness, and the witness told her why she would consent to it each time." The reasonable inference, under such circumstances, is that the extension was granted to enable defendant to get what money she could, and that payment would not have been made, unless the extension had been granted. The payments themselves were a sufficient consideration for the extension.

The circumstances, coupled with the acts and declarations of the defendant above set out, were a waiver of that portion of the contract which made time of the essence thereof. Noyes v. Schlegel, 9 Cal. App. 516, 99 Pac. 726; Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 110 Pac. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126.

[3] Second. Appellant also attacks the seventh finding of fact, in so far as it finds that on November 15, 1909, plaintiff offered to pay the amount then due under the contract, and was ready and willing and able to pay it. The attack is on the ability of the plaintiff to pay. The plaintiff testified that he had at the house at that time enough money to make the balance of the third and all of the fourth payment. This would amount to $851.02, not counting interest. The fifth payment fell due that day, making a total of $1,491.02, not including interest. By agreement the further consideration of the subject was postponed until the next day. In the meantime the plaintiff saw Mr. Gerber and Mr. Henderson, and the latter, in the words of plaintiff, said: "He would see us through with this affair"; or, as expressed by Mr. Henderson: "I assured Mr. Gerber I would see these people through it financially." He also testified that on November 22d plaintiff had money in a sack; that witness did not let him have that money, but that witness let him have money afterwards. Mrs. Alice Cozzens testified that there was $2,900, more or less, in the sack; she being present when the money was thrown on the table. The plaintiff testified it was over $2,900. On November 28th, through the witness McKinney, plaintiff tendered in actual coin $2,907. We therefore conclude that the evidence justifies the finding that plaintiff was able to pay.

[4, 5] Third. Appellant claims that plaintiff cannot demand specific performance, unless he first makes tender on his part and then keeps the same good under section 1500 of the Civil Code. It is true that plaintiff was not entitled to specific performance while he was in default; but was he in default? As already seen, the plaintiff's time had been extended until November 15, 1909. In the meantime defendant had given a power of attorney to her son, and when plaintiff, on that date, met the son for the purpose of settling matters he informed plaintiff, "We came here for the whole payment on the property." After considerable argument, the son said they would meet the next day and settle up, and plaintiff said, "The money is ready for you any time." The next day the son at first said he had no time to come up, and then said he had to see his sister first. The plaintiff asked for the abstracts of the property. The son said, "We will have them." Plaintiff then said: "Let me know when you are ready, and I will be ready for you." On the 18th the son served written notice on plaintiff that the contract was forfeited, and that defendant would take possession at once. No prior demand had ever been served upon plaintiff that defendant would strictly enforce the contract; nor had notice of any time been served within which plaintiff was required to pay within a specified time. However, an appointment was then made for the next day and, at the request of the son, was postponed until the next afternoon, and this last appointment the son failed to keep. Plaintiff then immediately went to see the defendant, who sent word to her son to take the money and settle up. When the message was delivered, the son said he had to see his sister first.

The plaintiff replied he was ready to see him any time. Again the plaintiff sought the defendant, and she requested that Mr. Henderson, cashier of the bank, come out the next day, November 22d, and plaintiff took Mr. Henderson out and tendered the money by placing it on the table. The defendant said she wanted the money and did not see why she could not take it; but the son went into a rage and threatened violence, and prevented settlement. The plaintiff then again made a formal tender of the actual cash and demand for the deed; the last notice being served November 28, 1909. At no time did the defendant say that she refused the money because it was not paid in time; and she always said she wanted the plaintiff to have the place, and she wanted to take the money if her son would consent. Under such circumstances, it cannot be said that the plaintiff was ever in default; but the defendant was in default from the time that the money was tendered and she refused to take it and execute the deed.

[6] The third finding is to the effect that plaintiff deposited the amount of the tender in the name of the vendor with a bank of good repute in this state, and gave notice thereof to defendant. If this finding is supported by the evidence, it operates to extinguish the obligation of payment by plaintiff. But does the evidence support the finding? The record shows that written notice of the necessary facts was given to plaintiff. The notice alone does not prove the facts. The only other evidence in the record is the statement of the witness, Mrs. Alice Cozzens, that the entire amount of money which is now on deposit at the Sacramento Bank was thrown on the table. This is only a recital, and is not sufficient evidence to support the finding that the money was deposited in the bank in the name of the defendant.

[7] We are of the opinion, however, that the action for specific performance can be maintained where a proper tender has been made, though the tender be not kept good under section 1500 of the Civil Code. Haile v. Smith, 113 Cal. 656, 45 Pac. 872; Latta v. Tutton, 122 Cal. 279, 282, 54 Pac. 844, 68 Am. St. Rep. 30; Kerr v. Moore, 6 Cal. App. 305-308, 92 Pac. 107. The tender operated to relieve the plaintiff from default, and the defendant was thereafter in default until she executed and tendered the deed. Had plaintiff deposited the money to the credit and in the name of defendant, there would remain nothing for him to do when the deed was presented; but, as it is not shown as an affirmative fact by the testimony that the money was so deposited, the plaintiff will be required to pay the money upon delivery of the deed. The failure to make the deposit goes to the form of the judgment only. The law does not require the purchaser to deposit the money in the vendor's name, and thus place himself at the vendor's mercy before he can maintain an action for specific performance to compel the delivery of the deed. He must, however, be ready with his money when he receives his deed. The intention of the law is that the acts should be concurrent.

[8] Fourth. Appellant also contends that there is no evidence to support that part of the second finding of fact, to the effect that, in addition to the sum of payments of principal therein mentioned, there was also paid all of the interest on the deferred payments up to the 15th day of November, 1908. The witness Henderson testifies that he was present at the time and made a computation as to the amount due under the contract, and that the computation was agreed to as being correct by both plaintiff and defendant. On cross-examination he testified that the amount paid was $869.96. This must have included only a very small amount of interest. The plaintiff testified that he understood that everything was closed up to November 15, 1908. Conceding that the witnesses were mistaken, and that the whole amount paid was only $1,537 on principal, and that no interest was paid, still the amount tendered by the plaintiff to the defendant, to wit, $2,907, was an amount even larger than the total amount of interest, plus the total amount unpaid on principal; and therefore the finding, even if erroneous, becomes immaterial.

Some other points are made in appellant's brief; but, under the view we take of the entire matter, it will not be necessary to discuss them.

While the evidence, as we have held, is insufficient to sustain the finding that the plaintiff deposited the money in the name of defendant in a bank of good repute, such finding is immaterial and may be disregarded. The judgment should be modified by adding to the first paragraph of the decree, and after the order that defendant make, execute, and deliver to plaintiff a good and sufficient deed, the words, "Upon receiving from plaintiff the sum of $2,907," and, as so modified, affirmed, and it is so ordered; plaintiff to recover costs on the appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by the Western Pacific Land Company against Edgar M. Wilson. From an order granting a new trial after verdict for defendant, he appeals. Reversed.

Powell & Dow, for appellant. Humphrey & Hubbard, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal by defendant from an order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff sued defendant to recover the sum of $5,500 had and received by defendant for the use and benefit of plaintiff. Defendant answered, and, without denying the receipt of the $5,500 set up by way of counterclaim a demand for the sum of $4,145.75 as and for the reasonable value of certain services rendered by defendant to plaintiff as its attorney for a period of 3½ years, and further alleged that on the 14th day of October, 1907, he paid to plaintiff the sum of $1,404.25, which was the difference between the said sum of $5,500 and the amount alleged and claimed as the reasonable value of defendant's services to plaintiff, and prayed that plaintiff take nothing by its action. The jury rendered a verdict for the defendant.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The plaintiff in due time gave notice of its intention to move for a new trial, to be heard upon the minutes of the court, which was afterwards made and granted.

The verdict of the jury, being for the defendant, necessarily was in effect a finding that defendant rendered the services as alleged in his answer, and that the reasonable value thereof was $4,145.75, and that defendant had paid to plaintiff $1,404.25, the difference between $5,500, claimed by plaintiff, and said sum of $4,145.75 set up as a counterclaim.

In its notice of intention to move for a new trial, respondent set forth as grounds for its intended motion all the statutory grounds; but there is absolutely nothing in the record to justify the order on any one of the first six grounds specified, and no claim has been made in this court in support of any of said grounds.

The seventh ground is set forth as insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict in certain enumerated particulars. Both appellant and respondent have discussed the question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the implied finding that the reasonable value of the services rendered by defendant to plaintiff was $4,145.75; but appellant in his opening brief also makes the point that the specifications of the insufficiency lay no basis for the contention that the services rendered by defendant to plaintiff were not of the value of $4,145.75. An examination of the record convinces us that this point must be sustained.

[1] Section 659, subd. 4, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that "when the motion is to be made on the minutes of the court, and the ground of the motion is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision, the notice of motion must specify the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient. * * * If the notice does not contain the specifications here indicated, when the motion is made on the minutes of the court, the motion must be denied."

In the notice of motion, the seventh ground is stated as "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict in the following particulars: (a) In that the undisputed evidence and admissions on the part of the defendant showed that the defendant had in his possession at the time of the commencement of the action and at the time of the trial the sum of $5,500, of which sum the defendant claimed for his legal services only the sum of $4,145.75, and no more, and that under the verdict of the jury as rendered, namely, in favor of the defendant, the defendant is awarded the full $5,500."

This is in no sense an attack on the sufficiency of the evidence to support the implied finding that the services were of the value of $4,145.75. It is a statement that the defendant claimed for his services the sum of $4,145.75, and no more, which is true. It seems to be also a statement that by the verdict in favor of defendant the defendant was awarded for his services the full sum of $5,500, which is not true. By the verdict the jury in effect found the value of the services to be $4,145.75, and also found that the defendant had paid the difference between $5,500 and $4,145.75, to wit, the sum of $1,404.25, to plaintiff, as alleged in his answer.

This particular specification does not hint at any attack upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support the implied finding that the services rendered were not of the value claimed by defendant, to wit, the sum of $4,145.75. Under (b) is set forth another specification in all essentials similar to the one under (a). It does not hint at any attack on the evidence as insufficient to support a finding that the reasonable value of the services rendered by defendant was $4,145.75.

Other specifications follow under various subheads; but none of them hint or suggest that the evidence does not support the implied finding that the reasonable value of the services was the sum of $4,145.75.

These specifications, if they do anything, raise the point that the verdict for the defendant was contrary to law, in that it was contrary to an instruction given by the court to the effect that the jury should disregard all evidence as to a check for the sum of $1,404.25 drawn by defendant, payable to plaintiff, and by him claimed to have been in payment of the balance in his hands at the time the check was given.

[2] The order of the court granting the new trial cannot be justified or supported upon any claim that the evidence does not support the verdict or the finding implied therefrom as to the value of the services rendered by defendant to plaintiff, as the specifications are wholly insufficient to raise this point.

The only other point that can be, or that is, urged in support of the order is the claim that the verdict is contrary to law, in that the jury, in rendering the verdict, disregarded an instruction given by the court to disregard the evidence as to the check above referred to.

The evidence discloses that on or about the 14th day of October, 1907, defendant, who was a director of plaintiff, as well as its attorney, delivered to the secretary of plaintiff an account of services rendered by him for plaintiff, including moneys collected, and an itemized bill for such services, together with his check, drawn on the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company, and payable to plaintiff, for the balance shown to be due plaintiff, after deducting the amount of his bill from the amount of money ($5,500) in his hands belonging to plaintiff. This account, bill, and check were presented to the board of directors on the 22d day of October, 1907, but no final action was taken thereon at that time; but the matter seems to have been held for investigation. The check was not cashed, though retained in the possession of plaintiff. Subsequently, on the 30th day of October, 1907, the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company closed its doors as insolvent. At the time of drawing the check, and ever since, defendant had on deposit to his credit with said company upwards of $10,000. The evidence tends to show that subsequent to November 19, 1907, which was after the closing of the bank, plaintiff offered to return the check to defendant. Subsequently it sued for the full amount of $5,500 received by him for plaintiff.

Under this state of the evidence and the record, as hereinbefore set forth, as to the pleadings, the court instructed the jury to disregard entirely the evidence as to the check. While the instruction upon this point is not, perhaps, as clear as it might be, the instruction seems to have been intended to prevent the jury from giving or allowing defendant any credit for the amount thereof as a payment on account of the $5,500 admitted to have been received by him for plaintiff. Nevertheless the court instructed the jury that "there are two possible verdicts that you may render. One might be: 'We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find a verdict in favor of the defendant.' The other possible form is: 'We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of ———,' putting down so many dollars accordingly as may be your verdict." The court further stated that it in no way intimated which of these verdicts the jury should select, but stated "that is entirely for you."

Under these latter instructions, it is clear that the jury were authorized to find the verdict which they in fact rendered. The most that can be said is that the instructions were contradictory, and the case does not come within the reason of the rule laid down in Emerson v. Santa Clara County, 40 Cal. 543; Altoona Q. M. Co. v. Integral Q. M. Co., 114 Cal. 100, 103, 45 Pac. 1047.

[3] But if it can be said that the verdict of the jury was contrary to the instruction given by the court to disregard all evidence as to the check, it does not necessarily follow that a new trial should or could have been properly granted on account thereof. While at one time it was held that a verdict rendered in disregard of an erroneous instruction was a verdict against law, and as such entitled the defeated litigant to a new trial (Emerson v. Santa Clara Co., 40 Cal. 543), such is no longer the rule followed in this state. The rule now is that a new trial should not be awarded because of the disregard by the jury of an erroneous instruction. O'Neil v. Thomas Day Co., 152 Cal. 357, 92 Pac. 856, 14 Ann. Cas. 970.

This brings us to an examination of the instruction which, it is claimed by respondent, the jury disregarded in its verdict.

[4] This instruction in effect directed the jury to disregard all evidence concerning the check. But it was the giving of this check by defendant, and its subsequent retention by plaintiff, that defendant claimed amounted to a payment. The court determined, as a matter of law, that the giving and retention of the check, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, did not amount to a payment. In this we think that the court erred, and the instruction as given was erroneous, and not a correct charge as a matter of law. The check was given and offered as payment. The plaintiff retained the check, without expressly refusing it, for about one month, and until after the bank had closed its doors as insolvent. Under such circumstances, we think it should have been left to the jury to determine, under proper instructions from the court, whether or not the giving and retention of the check had the effect of payment.

[5] Where a check is given as payment, unless it be refused, it is the duty of the creditor to return it; and unreasonable delay in returning a check may make it equal to payment. Conde v. Dreisam Gold M. Co., 3 Cal. App. 583, 589, 86 Pac. 823. Whether or not plaintiff in this case had kept the check for an unreasonable time was a question for the jury to determine, and was not a matter that should have been determined, as a matter of law, by the court. The fact that the check was not returned, or offered to be returned, until after the failure of the bank is significant, and may account for this litigation.

No other grounds are urged, or can be urged upon the record before us, to justify the order granting a new trial.

The order cannot be sustained because of any insufficiency of evidence to support the verdict, because of want of any specification of particulars of insufficiency that even hints at the attack attempted to be made as to insufficiency of evidence; and for the reasons above set forth the verdict is not against law.

The order is reversed.

HARLAN v. LAMBERT et al.

(Civ. 925.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 28, 1912.)

1. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 165*)—ACTION FOR LEGAL SERVICES—ISSUES—PROOF.

One suing for the reasonable value of legal services rendered must allege the nonpayment thereof; and where nonpayment is put in issue by answer he must prove nonpayment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. §§ 365-367; Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 397*)—FINDINGS—ISSUES.

Where, in an action for the reasonable value of legal services, the nonpayment of the claim was put in issue by answer, and findings were not waived, the court, to support a judgment for plaintiff, must find that the services had not been paid for.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 940-945; Dec. Dig. § 397.*]

3. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 167*)—ACTION FOR COMPENSATION—FINDINGS—ISSUES.

Where, in an action for reasonable value of legal services rendered, the nonpayment of the claim was put in issue by answer, a finding that plaintiff rendered legal services for defendant, that the same were reasonably worth $650, and that $150 had been paid, was a finding that the balance had not been paid, and supported a judgment therefor, especially where the court, under the designation "conclusion of law," found that plaintiff was entitled to a judgment for $500.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by Paul C. Harlan against Leonard Lambert and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Dennie May Lambert appeals. Affirmed.

T. T. C. Gregory, for appellant. Paul C. Harlan, in pro, per.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is on the judgment roll from a judgment against Dennie May Lambert for the sum of $500. A reversal is sought upon the sole ground that the court failed to find upon the issue of payment. The action was brought to recover the reasonable value of legal services performed by plaintiff for appellant at her special instance and request. The court found that the value of the services was $650; but it is the contention of appellant that as to nonpayment the court found simply that $150 had been paid, and that there is no finding that the remainder of the sum had not been paid.

[1, 2] It will not be disputed that it was necessary to allege the nonpayment of the claim, and, since it was put in issue by the answer, that it was equally necessary to prove it. Wise v. Hogan, 77 Cal. 184, 19 Pac. 278; Richards v. Lake View Land Co., 115 Cal. 642, 47 Pac. 683; Dodge v. Kimple, 121 Cal. 580, 54 Pac. 94; Knox v. Buckman, 139

Cal. 599, 73 Pac. 428. Since findings were not waived, it would, of course, follow, in order to support the judgment, that it should be found by the court that the money had not been paid.

[3] The basis for appellant's argument is found in the asserted circumstance that the following are the only findings of fact upon the point: "That said representation of said Dennie May Lambert by said plaintiff and said legal services as attorney and counselor at law rendered, as aforesaid, by said plaintiff to said Dennie May Lambert were and are reasonably worth the sum of six hundred fifty dollars ($650). That one hundred fifty dollars ($150) of said last-mentioned sum have been paid." Appellant's claim is that the finding is totally insufficient, in that it does not exclude the inference that the balance of the $650 may have been paid also; while respondent contends that at most an uncertainty is produced, and therefore the judgment should be upheld by reason of the rule that "an uncertain finding on payment must be construed so as to support the judgment, rather than to defeat it. Warren v. Hopkins, 110 Cal. 506 [42 Pac. 986]."

In support of her contention that the said finding is not sufficient to cover the balance of $500, appellant cites the case of Barney v. Vigoreaux, 92 Cal. 631, 28 Pac. 678, wherein it is stated in the syllabus that, "in an action upon a promissory note, a failure to allege in the complaint that no part of the sum for which the note was given, except certain payments indorsed upon it, had been paid constitutes a fatal defect, for which a judgment in favor of the plaintiff will be reversed upon appeal." In that case there was a default judgment, and there was not only no allegation that any sum remained unpaid, but there was no positive averment that any definite sum had been paid; the statement being that "the defendants executed and delivered to the plaintiff their promissory note, in writing, in the words and figures following, to wit: * * * And indorsed with the following thereon, to wit." Then follow certain purported payments of interest and parts of the principal and a demand for judgment. It was not alleged that the payee had made the indorsements or received the money; and it is apparent that the complaint was exceedingly weak in the matter suggested. The gist of the opinion is found in this declaration: "The omission to allege in the complaint that some part of the said note had not been paid constituted a fatal defect, for which the judgment must be reversed. Frisch v. Caler, 21 Cal. 71; Davanay v. Eggenhoff, 43 Cal. 395; Scroufe v. Clay, 71 Cal. 123 [11 Pac. 882]."

In the Frisch Case the question was, as stated by the court, "whether a plea of payment is new matter in the sense of the statute." This question was determined, and it was said in conclusion that "this disposes of the only question raised in the case; but it is proper to suggest an objection to the complaint, which, though apparently technical, is of the essence of good pleading. The fact of nonpayment is not directly alleged, the allegation being that there is now due, etc., which is a mere conclusion of law, and would not have stood the test of a demurrer." There was an allegation of the payment of a certain sum; but the sufficiency of this allegation to negative the payment of the balance was not argued by counsel nor considered by the court. Likewise, in the Davanay Case, it was contended that it was necessary for the defendant to plead payment; but the point decided, and the only one involved, was that the general denial, the complaint being unverified, "put in issue the averment of the complaint that the promissory note remained due and unpaid." In Scroufe v. Clay, supra, it was held that an averment that the defendant "has refused and still refuses to pay the principal or interest of the note, or any part thereof, and that there is now due the sum," etc., was insufficient.

These cases are not directly in point; and it may be said also, without stopping to specify particularly, that they are not altogether in harmony with the more mature and deliberate expression of the Supreme Court embodied in the opinion of Chief Justice Beatty, in the case of Penrose v. Winter, 135 Cal. 289, 67 Pac. 772, wherein it is held that, though the allegation of nonpayment was "in the form of a legal conclusion, in which the material fact was merely implied, but in the absence of any demurrer such faults of pleading are cured by the judgment."

But the truth is that we have here a reasonably clear and unequivocal finding of fact that the $500 had not been paid. It is plain that the court in its decision had in view three questions of fact, viz.: Were the services performed? If so, how much were they reasonably worth, and how much had been paid for them? The court found, as we have seen, that the services were performed, that they were reasonably worth the sum of $650, and that $150 had been paid. This last is equivalent to a finding that $500 had not been paid, for the simple reason that it clearly implies that $150 was all that was paid. No one fairly familiar with reputable usage of the English language, unless obsessed by his veneration for ancient forms and ceremonies relating to legal proceedings, so as to obscure his understanding of the paramount importance of the practical administration of justice, would fail to reach the conclusion that B still owed A $500, if a court should find that the latter had performed for the former services that were worth the sum of $650, and that "$150 of the last-mentioned sum have been paid." If the action were by A against B for the recovery of horses, and the court should find that B had received 650 horses which belonged to A, and that he had returned 150 of them, it would be readily understood that the others had not been returned. In truth, our use of the language in every transaction of life is based upon the assumption that such statements as the one here in controversy involve and imply what the logicians call "a universal affirmative." In other words, the affirmation that the defendant paid $150 is equivalent to a statement that $150 is all that he paid. Jevons, in his work on Logic, simply expresses the common understanding when he declares that "whenever a term is used alone it ought to be interpreted as meaning the whole of its class." It is also true, as he says further, that "the mark of universality usually consists of some adjective of quantity, such as 'all,' 'every,' 'each,' 'any,' 'the whole'; but whenever the predicate is clearly intended to apply to the whole of the subject one may treat the proposition as universal." If appellant is right in her contention as to said finding, then, of course, respondent would have reason to complain that the court failed to find that his services were not worth more than $650. The point, however, has not been urged that the finding that the services were worth the sum of $650 does not mean that they were worth $650, and no more.

But aside from the foregoing, under the authority of Jessen v. Peterson, Nelson & Co., 123 Pac. 219, there can be no doubt that the findings here are sufficient to support the judgment. In that case, in which a rehearing was denied by the Supreme Court, plaintiff had sued for damages for personal injuries, and she recovered judgment for $1,000. There was a finding that she had expended $122.50 for medical attendance, but the court omitted to designate the specific amount in which the plaintiff was damaged on account of personal injuries; but it was declared, as a conclusion of law, "that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the defendant in the sum of $1,000." The Court of Appeal of the First district held that this should be treated as a finding of fact, and, when so considered and read in conjunction with the other probative facts found by the trial court, it was sufficient to support the judgment upon the issue of damages. See, also, McCray v. Burr, 125 Cal. 636, 58 Pac. 203. Here, also, under the designation of "Conclusion of law," we have the finding "that plaintiff is entitled to a judgment herein for the sum of five hundred dollars." But whether regarded or not as a finding of fact, in connection with the findings already recited, it should be held sufficient to support the judgment, in harmony with the spirit of Penrose v. Winter, supra.

It is believed that the contention of appellant is entirely without substantial merit.

It is undoubtedly true, as said by the Supreme Court in Millard v. Legion of Honor, 81 Cal. 342, 22 Pac. 865, through Mr. Justice McFarland, that "one main object of the provision [in reference to the court's 'decision'] seems to have been to prevent a court from summarily ordering judgment without giving any reasons for it—without stating any facts or legal conclusions upon which it is based. There was also, no doubt, some intent to facilitate the review of a judgment on appeal. But surely the main object was not to afford a cover under which a losing party might successfully set a trap to capture a just judgment. The findings come after the case has been tried, considered, and determined, and after the character of the judgment—whether it is right or wrong—has been fixed. They are merely incidental to the main thing—the judgment; and to test their sufficiency by a standard which exacts the extreme of accurate statement and minute detail is to put the incident in the place of the principal. Of course, there ought to be findings on the material issues raised by the pleadings and evidence; but, if it appears that there are in substance such findings, it is not necessary that they should be in the exact language of the pleadings, or in any particular form."

The case here measures up to all the just requirements of legal procedure, and the judgment is affirmed.

LARCENY (§ 14*)—FALSE PRETENSES (§ 16*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT TO LARCENY—ACQUISITION OF POSSESSION BY TRICK.

Where prosecutor intrusted his money to a confederate of accused, under the agreement that accused and the confederate should each contribute a like sum to a common fund for the benefit of all, but did not intend to vest title in the confederate, and it was the fraudulent purpose of accused and his confederate to obtain possession of the money by a trick and appropriate the same to their own use, and neither accused nor his confederate put any money in the common fund, and had no intention of doing so, the money remained the property of prosecutor, and was the subject of larceny; and accused and his confederate, appropriating the money to their own use, were guilty of larceny.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Norton, Judge.

Frank Ballo was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Webster & Webster and S. N. Blewett, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny, and from the judgment of conviction and the order denying him a new trial he prosecutes this appeal.

The assault upon the judgment and order is founded principally upon alleged errors of the trial court in the statement of the law to the jury.

The facts are briefly these: The complaining witness, one G. Saloni, an Italian laborer, went to the city of Stockton with an acquaintance of his in the month of December, 1911. They registered at the Roma Hotel, which was conducted by one of their countrymen. Saloni had for some time prior to his arrival at Stockton worked as a laborer for the Feather River Lumber Company, near Portola, in Plumas county, and when he reached Stockton had approximately $200, a portion of which he carried in two checks, one for $57 and another for $54.80. These checks he deposited, for safe-keeping, with the proprietor of the Roma Hotel. It appears that, shortly after his arrival at Stockton, he began drinking rather heavily, and remained more or less in a state of intoxication for several days. While thus conducting himself, he made the acquaintance of the defendant, with whom thereafter he had conversations and drank several times. On the morning of the Thursday following the date of his arrival at Stockton, upon going out on the sidewalk in front of the Roma Hotel, he again met the defendant. Ballo invited Saloni to join him in a drink, and the two, with a third party, went to the Gem Saloon for that purpose. After securing a drink, the defendant and Saloni returned to the sidewalk, when the former declared that he expected some mail, and that he thought he had better go to the post office and ascertain whether any was awaiting him. Accordingly, accompanied by Saloni, he left the place at which they were standing for the ostensible purpose of going to the post office. He took Saloni through various streets and over a devious route until they reached the corner of two streets, at which was located a feed stable. There they met one Manuel Schenone. It appears that, as the defendant and Saloni were in the act of passing Schenone, the latter accosted them by the inquiry: "You are Italian boys, too, aren't you?" The defendant and Saloni, in reply, said that they were; whereupon Schenone exhibited to them what purported to be a bill of the denomination of $100 and began crying—evidently simulated, judging from subsequent events—and proceeded to explain that he had given a bill of like denomination to a friend, with a request that he take it to the Imperial Hotel, pay his (Schenone's) board bill, and return to him with the change. Schenone said that his alleged friend had been gone a long time, and that he was satisfied he would never again see him or his money. Schenone then proceeded to unfold to the defendant and Saloni a tale of how, through his father, he had acquired a small fortune, amounting to $30,000. He declared that, being without education and business judgment, he was ignorant of how he should handle his wealth. He then suggested that he would like to have the benefit of the business companionship of some of his countrymen who were honest and could be trusted to treat him squarely, and further suggested that the defendant and Saloni join him, and that the three in the future remain together and act and be as brothers to each other. Saloni assured Schenone that he and Ballo were in sympathy with his suggestion, and that he and Ballo would deal squarely with him, and thereupon an association between the three, for the purposes of business and mutual protection, was established. Schenone inquired whether Ballo and Saloni had any money, and was informed that they had; Ballo claiming to have $300, and Saloni saying that he also had some money. Schenone then suggested that the three pool their money in one common fund, from which each could draw such sums from time to time as his necessities required. Saloni and the defendant readily acceded to this proposition, and Saloni, to carry out his part of the agreement, secured his checks, cashed them, and delivered the money, with some other cash, amounting in all to the sum of $137, to Schenone. Ballo pretended to deliver to Schenone his share of the pool. Schenone, upon receiving the money of the complaining witness, gave him a handkerchief, saying that it contained some paper money which Saloni could use for present purposes or convenience. Immediately after this transaction, Schenone complained that he had suddenly been attacked by gripings in the stomach and pretended to be suffering intense pain. Several remedies were suggested, when it was finally agreed that, perhaps, peppermint candy might have the effect of allaying the pain. Saloni was dispatched for the candy; Schenone and Ballo remaining together to "await his return." But, upon returning to the place where he had left his "associates," the latter were not to be found, and were not again seen by Saloni until he saw them at the police station; they having been arrested on his complaint.

Schenone, having been separately tried on an information charging him with grand larceny, said charge growing out of the same transaction as that of which the charge against the appellant here is the outgrowth, was convicted of said crime and thereupon appealed to this court from the judgment and the order denying him a new trial, and said judgment and order were affirmed; the opinion in said cause having been filed on the 17th day of June, 1912. People v. Schenone, 125 Pac. 758.

The instructions given in the case at bar were substantially the same as those given in the Schenone Case; and the objections registered against the court's charge in the present case are precisely the same as those urged against the charge given at the trial of the former case.

Counsel for the appellant claim, as they did in the Schenone appeal, that, if the defendant here was, under the evidence, guilty of any crime at all, it was of that of obtaining money by false and fraudulent pretenses, and not of that of grand larceny; and they therefore particularly complain of the refusal of the court to take that view of the evidence.

But the circumstances (some of which are embodied in the statement above given), as disclosed by the evidence, were sufficient to convince any fair-minded body of men that the defendants were acquaintances prior to the time at which Ballo first met Saloni; that the meeting of Schenone by Ballo and Saloni was no adventitious circumstance, so far as Ballo was concerned; and that the taking of Saloni's money was only the consummation of a preconceived and premeditated scheme or trick hatched by the defendants to effect a criminal design, of which they hoped to make some one a victim, and which they finally worked out on Saloni.

The court, in its charge to the jury, pointed out with clearness and accuracy the distinction between the crime of larceny and that of obtaining property by false pretenses, and, moreover, instructed the jury that, if the evidence was of a character to convince them that the defendant had committed some offense other than that charged in the information, it would be their duty to acquit.

But in the Schenone Case Justice Burnett treats this contention fully and satisfactorily; and there is therefore no necessity for further consideration of it here. But it may here not inappropriately be repeated, as it was declared in that case, that it is very clear that the jury were justified in the case at bar in concluding from the evidence that the prosecuting witness did not intend, when parting with his money under the circumstances shown, to vest in the defendant the title to said money, and that "it was the defendant's purpose at all times to obtain possession of the money by trick and device and afterwards appropriate it to his own use." All the circumstances go to show that neither Ballo nor Schenone put any money in the common pool, and had no intention of doing so, and, as said in the Schenone Case, "until they did so the title to the money remained in the prosecuting witness, and was the subject of larceny." The general charge of the court was full and fair and correctly stated the law pertinent to the evidence, and the evidence amply justifies the verdict.

No other objections to the record are particularly pointed out or urged.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 27*) — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to support a finding that plaintiff in ejectment to recover a strip adjacent to his lot had never been in possession of the strip, and could not acquire title by adverse possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 121, 122, 652, 664, 684; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by P. Marsicano against Oscar T. Luning. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. Freidenrich, for appellant. Bourdette & Bacon, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial in an action in ejectment to recover possession of a strip of land 6¾ inches in width with a uniform depth of 57 feet 6 inches.

Plaintiff alleges in his complaint that on the 1st day of May, 1906, and for more than 30 years next prior thereto, he had been the owner and seised in fee and entitled to the possession of the 6¾ inches described in his amended complaint; that on said date the defendant unlawfully ejected him therefrom, and has ever since withheld and still wrongfully withholds possession thereof from him, to his injury and damage in the sum of $1,000, for which sum, together with the alleged value of the rents, issues, and profits, he prays judgment. The defendant filed an answer, the cause was tried, and the court held against plaintiff, and decided that he was never in possession of said strip of land. Defendant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings.

Ever since the year 1864, plaintiff has been the owner and has held the record title to a certain 20-foot lot on the east line of Stockton street, north of Vallejo street, in San Francisco. The defendant and his predecessors in interest have owned and held the record title to the land adjoining both sides of plaintiff's lot since 1853. At the time plaintiff purchased his lot, there was a building on it. Subsequently he put a brick foundation under the building on the northerly and southerly side thereof. The building remained on the ground until the great conflagration in April, 1906, when it was destroyed by that fire. In the month following the defendant commenced to erect a building on his lot just north of plaintiff's property. Plaintiff, evidently believing that defendant's building overlapped his lot, wrote him to that effect, and informed him that he would resist any encroachment upon his property. Thereupon the defendant had a survey made of the properties, which showed that his building was within his lines, and he so notified the plaintiff. It was doubtless after this that plaintiff became convinced that his building, which had been destroyed, had encroached upon defendant's lot, and, being unable to induce defendant to accede to his demands, instituted this suit for the purpose of establishing title to the strip of land involved by adverse possession.

If the plaintiff ever had possession of the 6¾ inches, it was by mutual mistake, which was not discovered until just before the commencement of this action, and, perhaps, title by prescription cannot be acquired under such circumstances. Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586, 49 Am. Rep. 100; American Co. v. Bradford, 27 Cal. 360; Alta v. Hancock, 85 Cal. 219, 24 Pac. 645, 20 Am. St. Rep. 217; Faulkner v. Rondini, 104 Cal. 140, 37 Pac. 883; Smith v. Roberts, 9 Pac. 1041. But the findings are so drawn that this proposition is not involved; and the only question we are called upon to decide is whether or not the findings are supported by the evidence.

We think they are. The building having been destroyed, the only reason the plaintiff had for believing that his house had stood partly on the strip of land in question was the presence after the fire of a brick foundation, which he testified he had caused to be constructed under the northerly side of his home. That foundation, he said, was now under defendant's new building. Defendant, on the other hand, testified that the brick foundation wall referred to by plaintiff was a new foundation built by his contractor. Defendant testified: "I built a building on the line of the survey as shown on the map introduced in evidence, and followed the line shown there as the exterior line of the property, the deeds of which have been read. My building is within those lines. On the northerly line of the 20 feet owned by Mr. Marsicano, and north of the 20 feet as described in his deed, there is a wall under that building; it is a new wall, built by C.

* Reported in full in the Pacific Reporter; reported as a memorandum decision without opinion in 68 Cal. xx.

P. Moore Building Company. It is a part of a new wall under my entire building. There is no old wall there. * * * I had this property surveyed before I built my building. I had it surveyed, and cleaned the lot up and built there. I know, as a matter of fact, that that is a new brick wall, and was built by myself; there is no old wall there."

It is true that counsel for the defendant at one time during the trial made an admission that strongly tended to sustain plaintiff's view; but later, after a few days' adjournment, and after an amended complaint was filed and the parties were more familiar with the situation, the admission was in effect withdrawn by defendant's counsel, and the cause was submitted on the evidence introduced by the parties.

Under the findings of the court, plaintiff has the 20 feet covered by his deed, and the defendant has the adjoining land, to which the record shows he is entitled. Each has exactly what he thought himself entitled to for over 40 years, and on which during all of that time he has paid taxes.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by the City of Vernon against the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals from an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Gesner Williams, for appellant. Wm. A. Cheney and Le Roy M. Edwards, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. Plaintiff by its action sought to enjoin the defendant from making excavations in the public streets of the city of Vernon, or laying gas pipes therein, as well as for a mandatory injunction requiring defendant to remove certain pipes already laid.

It is conceded that defendant is a corporation engaged in supplying gas; that the city of Vernon owns and controls no public works for such purpose; that the city of Vernon had an officer performing the duties of street superintendent during all of the times mentioned in the proceedings; that, prior to the 6th day of June, 1910, the defendant entered upon the streets and commenced laying gas mains therein for the purpose of distributing gas from its works at Los Angeles—the two cities being contiguous. This entry and the work of excavation and the laying of pipes were known by the street superintendent, who interposed no objection to the character of the work or the manner in which the same was being done. The city at that time had passed no ordinance regulating such work, or for the damages or indemnity for damages occasioned thereby. After having laid in the streets certain pipes of lesser diameter, on the 23d day of May, 1910, defendant commenced the laying of pipes having a diameter of 12 inches, and continued to lay pipes of such character for a considerable time. On the 6th day of June, 1910, the city passed an ordinance providing that all excavation should be done under the supervision of the street superintendent of said city of Vernon, and that a deposit of 10 cents per square foot of proposed excavation in unimproved streets should be made with the street superintendent as indemnity for damages before any excavation should be made. Thereupon, after the passage of such ordinance, the defendant tendered to the street superintendent the sum of $750 as indemnity, being the amount required by said ordinance for work thereafter to be done, which sum the street superintendent refused to accept; no objection, however, being made as to the amount tendered. Upon the hearing of the action, the court found that $1,200 was a sufficient indemnity for damages occasioned by the laying of pipe before the passage of the ordinance, which amount it directed the defendant to pay to the street superintendent, who refused to receive such sum, and the same was deposited in the treasury of the court for the use and benefit of plaintiff. The court finds that the laying of this 12-inch main was necessary to supply the inhabitants of the city of Vernon with illuminating gas, and, as a conclusion of law, determined that under section 19, art. 11, Constitution of the state, the defendant had a right to enter upon the streets and lay its pipes, and that the plaintiff should be enjoined from interfering with such work. Judgment was accordingly entered, and from an order denying a new trial plaintiff appeals.

[1] It is appellant's contention that the constitutional grant of franchises to gas and water companies is restricted to instances where a necessity is shown to exist for supplying an existing demand of either the city or its inhabitants, and that it does not appear that the 12-inch main was necessary in order to supply such demand as then existed in the city. As we construe this constitutional grant, neither gas nor water companies are required to work up or show or have any contracts or existing demands for their commodity in the city, either upon the part of the city or its inhabitants, in order to entitle them to enter upon the streets and lay their pipes. Either of said companies possess the right, having a commodity for sale, to enter upon the streets, lay their pipes, and put themselves in position to supply any demand made upon them, regardless of any existing demand. In section 19, referred to, the right to lay down pipes is given "so far as may be necessary for introducing into and supplying such city and its inhabitants either with gaslight or other illuminating light." The most that can be said of this restriction with reference to the necessity which must exist is that they may not excavate the streets and lay down pipes therein in a manner other than that necessary to a complete and practical system for supplying gas or water to the entire city and its inhabitants. It is probably true that, were a company of this character to undertake to make excavations and lay pipes, and it could be shown to the court that a complete and practical system, necessary and proper for the distribution of its gas to all the inhabitants of the city, did not require certain streets to be used for that purpose, such court might, by an appropriate order, prevent excavations therein.

[2] But in the case at bar the court finds a necessity for all of the pipes for the purposes intended; that the same is not a commercial pipe line, as claimed by plaintiff, which is being laid only for the purpose of conveying gas to points beyond the city, and we find evidence in the record to sustain this finding. This being true, we can see no reason why defendant was not, as to the pipe laid after the enactment of the ordinance, acting within the clear letter of the law; and, while we do not find any support for the finding that the street superintendent had knowledge of the laying of 12-inch pipe at the time it was commenced and during its continuance until the passage of the ordinance, nevertheless we think this finding is of no particular materiality. The street superintendent did have knowledge of the excavation and laying of pipes for the purpose of introducing gas into the city; he made no objection thereto. He had no authority, in the absence of an ordinance, to require any indemnity. The most that could be said was that his authority existed to the extent only of seeing that the constitutional grant of franchise was not exceeded, and that the work being done was done in a proper, safe, and expeditious manner. Having the right to enter for this purpose, and the street superintendent having knowledge of that fact, it was not necessary that he should have notice of any change in the size of pipe lines, or other matters pertaining merely to the proper and correct manner of laying such pipe. We think all the other findings of the court have some support from the evidence, in so far as they were material in the action, and that, the city having been, by the action of the defendant and through the order of the court, fully indemnified on account of damages, the court was warranted in denying plaintiff any relief and in granting relief to defendant. The material findings, as before said, having support, the motion for a new trial was properly denied; the action of the court in reference thereto being the only question before this court.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

We concur: JAMES, J.; SHAW, J.

PEOPLE v. ROGERS. (Cr. 1,737.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1023*)—APPEALABLE ORDERS—DENIAL OF MOTION IN ARREST.

No appeal lies from an order denying a motion in arrest of judgment, which is always reviewable on an appeal from the final judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2583-2598; Dec. Dig. § 1023.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 234*)—MURDER—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to sustain a conviction of murder.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 482-493; Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 438*)—EVIDENCE—PHOTOGRAPHS—ADMISSIBILITY.

In a murder trial, where accused's identity as the assailant was in issue, it was proper to admit in evidence a photograph of decedent's head, showing the nature of the wound, which was claimed to have been inflicted by a hatchet similar to those used by the company which employed accused, under the general rule that photographs may be used to exhibit particular locations or objects, to give the jury a clear idea thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 893; Dec. Dig. § 438.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1037*)—REVIEW—OBJECTIONS NOT MADE BELOW.

Objections to the district attorney's argument, not made at the trial, are not reviewable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1691, 2645, Dec. Dig. § 1037.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1137*)—CONTINUANCE—WAIVER OF MOTION.

Accused is not entitled to complain of an order refusing a continuance, when the case was called for trial March 1st, where the trial was subsequently postponed to March 4th, when motion for continuance was not renewed, and no objection to going to trial was made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3007-3010; Dec. Dig. § 1137.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 665*)—EXCLUSION OF WITNESSES FROM COURTROOM—JUDICIAL DISCRETION.

A request that witnesses for the prosecution be excluded from the courtroom while they were not testifying, respectively, was addressed largely to the trial court's discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1549-1566½; Dec. Dig. § 665.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 656*)—TRIAL—REMARKS OF TRIAL JUDGE.

A statement by the trial judge that testimony called for by questions asked by accused's counsel on cross-examination was not material, and direction to counsel to desist from that line of questions, was not erroneous, as tending to prejudice accused before the jury, it not appearing that the matter to which the question related was important, or that exclusion of the question was error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1524-1533; Dec. Dig. § 656.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 720½*)—ARGUMENT OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY—PROPRIETY.

In a murder trial, it was not improper for the prosecuting attorney in his argument to say, "What was" accused "doing at that time? Where was he? The greater portion of that time he was in the basement of the S., murdering" decedent, "and taking from his possession the jewelry"—it being clear that the attorney was merely drawing his conclusion from the evidence, and not some fact outside the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1677; Dec. Dig. § 720½.*]

9. HOMICIDE (§ 307*)—INSTRUCTIONS—LESSER DEGREES OF OFFENSE.

In a murder case, it was proper to omit to instruct on murder in the second degree or on manslaughter, where under the evidence accused was either guilty of murder in the first degree or innocent of any offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 638-641; Dec. Dig. § 307.*]

10. HOMICIDE (§ 311*)—INSTRUCTIONS—NATURE OF PUNISHMENT.

Under Pen. Code, § 190, which provides that one guilty of murder in the first degree shall suffer death or imprisonment for life at the jury's discretion, it is not error to instruct that the discretion is not an arbitrary one, and should be employed only when the jury is satisfied that the lighter penalty should be imposed, and that, if the evidence shows accused's guilt in the first degree, but not any extenuating fact or circumstance, the jury should find a simple verdict, and leave with the law the responsibility of fixing the punishment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 662, 663; Dec. Dig. § 311.*]

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 824*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUEST—NECESSITY.

In a trial for murder in connection with robbery, accused is not entitled to complain of a failure to instruct as to what constitutes robbery, or attempted robbery, nor omission to instruct that his neglect to testify could not be used against him, in the absence of a request for such instructions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1996–2004; Dec. Dig. § 824.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

John S. Rogers was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. D. Cardwell, Eugene G. Strickler, and D. F. Conway, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., C. M. Fickert, Dist. Atty., and James F. Brennan, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The defendant was charged, by information filed in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco on January 4, 1912, with the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed on November 18, 1911, in willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and with malice aforethought killing one Benjamin A. Goodman, a human being. Having entered a plea of not guilty, his trial resulted in a verdict of the jury finding him guilty of murder in the first degree, without recommendation. On March 16, 1912, judgment of death was pronounced.

[1] This is an appeal by defendant from such judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. There is also an appeal from the order denying his motion in arrest of judgment; but no appeal lies from such an order, which is always reviewable on an appeal from the judgment, and there was absolutely no merit in the motion.

[2] It is suggested that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict. The evidence was such as to force the conclusion that the deceased, who was a salesman for a jewelry company, was murdered in the basement of the place of business of the San Francisco Produce Company at the corner of Oregon and Front streets, San Francisco, late in the afternoon of November 18, 1911, and that the murder was committed in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, a robbery. Deceased then had in his possession 14 or 15 watches, several chains, and some valuable rings, all of which were taken from his body by the person or persons who killed him. The only real question in the case was as to the identity of the murderer or murderers. While the evidence connecting this defendant, who was an employé of the Produce Company, with the matter, was entirely circumstantial, it was of such a character as to leave little, if any, room for doubt in the mind of any one reading the record as to his guilt. It certainly was amply sufficient to support the verdict of the jury.

[3] The claim most seriously urged by counsel for defendant is that the trial court erred in overruling his objection to the introduction in evidence of a photograph of the right side of the head and face of the deceased, taken by Police Officer Blum, who had been police photographer for 8 years. This photograph was taken on November 21, 1911, a few hours after the body was found. There was evidence sufficient to warrant a conclusion that nothing had been done to the head, after the discovery of the body and prior to the taking of the photograph, except to wash the blood from the face and out of the hair, and also that the photograph was an exact photograph of the portion shown of the head and face of the deceased as they appeared on November 21, 1911, which was the day upon which the body was discovered, after the blood had been washed from the hair and face. The photograph showed a wound in the neighborhood of the right temple, where there was a fracture of the skull. There were three other fractures of the skull; but this, in the opinion of Dr. Magnus, was the most serious, and undoubtedly sufficient to cause death. The testimony showed that this wound had been made with some blunt instrument, and from the marks on the face apparently with an instrument that had grooves in it which were impressed on the face, leaving the skin corrugated.

One object of the prosecution in introducing the photograph was to give to the jury a better idea of the actual appearance of the skin of the face in this regard; it being the theory that the wound was inflicted with a hatchet similar to those used by the employes of the Produce Company, which had heads grooved in such a way as to be capable of leaving such an impression. We have no doubt that a photograph was admissible for the purpose mentioned, under the general rule that photographs may be used "to exhibit particular locations or objects, where it is important that the jury should have a clear idea thereof, and the situation may thus be better indicated than by the testimony of witnesses, or where they will conduce to a better or clearer understanding of such testimony" (State v. Miller, 43 Or. 325, 328, 74 Pac. 659), and we are satisfied that the preliminary proof was sufficient to warrant the court in admitting in evidence the photograph in question. The action of the trial court in overruling the objection to the photograph of incompetency, irrelevancy, and immateriality, and lack of a proper foundation, cannot, therefore, be held to have been erroneous.

[4] Some complaint is made in the closing brief of defendant and in the oral argument that an improper use was made of this photograph by the district attorney in his argument, by calling attention to the fact that the head of defendant's hatchet, which it was claimed was larger than those used by other employes of the Produce Company, "fits to a nicety" the impressions found on the face of deceased as shown by the photograph. Without discussing the merits of defendant's objection to this line of argument, it is sufficient to say that no objection whatever was made by him thereto at the trial.

[5] Complaint is made that the trial court erred in denying a motion of counsel for defendant for a continuance when the case was called for trial on March 1, 1912. But it appears that the court did subsequently postpone the commencement of the trial to March 4, 1912, and that when the case was called on the day last mentioned no request for a further continuance was made, and defendant, through his counsel, "answered ready for trial." The motion for a continuance on March 1st was based on the claim that defendant had not been able to make necessary preparations to proceed with the trial, because the shorthand reporter officiating at the preliminary examination had not filed his longhand transcript of the proceedings at such examination with the county clerk. No objection on that score being made when the case was called on March 4th, and defendant expressing his readiness to then proceed with the trial, presumably the transcript had been filed, and defendant was, as he said, ready for trial.

[6] Complaint is made that the trial court refused to exclude the witnesses for the people from the courtroom during the taking of testimony. This, of course, is a matter largely within the discretion of the trial court. We find no error in the action of the court in this regard. The record shows that what defendant specially desired and asked for was that all the police officers except the one actually being examined should be excluded, and the court ruled that it would "exclude the police officers not on the witness stand during the time the testimony of the other police officers is being taken."

[7] At a certain stage in the cross-examination of one of the police officers, the court remarked, as to a question asked by counsel, "I do not think this is material at all," and directed counsel to desist from that line of questions. No claim is made that the matter as to which the question was asked was at all important, or that the court erred in refusing to allow further questions on that line to be put, and there is nothing in the record to warrant any such claim. The point appears to be that the language of the court was such as to injure defendant's cause with the jury, but we can see no force in any such claim.

The briefs do not specify any instance wherein the testimony of admissions made by the defendant to police officers was improperly admitted on the trial, but simply states generally that such admissions were made under such circumstances as to require their exclusion. We have carefully examined the record in this regard, and find no foundation for the claim.

[8] In his argument to the jury the assistant district attorney, after saying that the defendant was missing at the store from 4:30 p. m. to 5:50 p. m. on November 18th, said: "What was he doing at that time? Where was he? The greater portion of that time he was in the basement of the San Francisco Produce Company, murdering young Goodman, and taking from his possession the jewelry." Defendant's counsel excepted to these remarks and assigned them as misconduct, saying there was nothing in the evidence to warrant the statement. As substantially suggested by the trial court in response to the objection and exception, the assistant district attorney was apparently stating, not some fact of which he pretended to have any knowledge outside of the evidence given on the trial, but his deduction or conclusion from the evidence so given. The statement was entirely within the domain of legitimate argument.

[9] The effect of the instructions given to the jury was to confine the jury to one of three verdicts, viz., murder in the first degree, murder in the first degree with the penalty of life imprisonment, and not guilty. The jury were not instructed that they might find a verdict of murder in the second degree, or one of manslaughter. In this action of the trial court there was no error. The evidence was such that the defendant was necessarily either guilty of murder in the first degree or not guilty at all. Section 189 of the Penal Code provides that "all murder * * * which is committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate * * * robbery * * * is murder of the first degree." It is thoroughly established in this state that it is proper to refuse to instruct a jury as to a lesser offense or degree included within the offense charged, where the evidence is of such a nature as to warrant, in the event that the defendant is guilty at all, only a verdict for the higher offense or degree. See People v. Swist, 136 Cal. 520, 69 Pac. 223; People v. Keith, 141 Cal. 689, 75 Pac. 304; People v. Lopez, 135 Cal. 23, 66 Pac. 965; People v. Chaves, 122 Cal. 140, 54

Pac. 596; People v. Chaves, 103 Cal. 407, 37 Pac. 389; People v. Lee Gam, 69 Cal. 552, 11 Pac. 183; People v. Turley, 50 Cal. 469. This rule is clearly applicable in a case like this, where the murder was committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate the crime of robbery, and the statute in terms makes such a killing murder of the first degree.

[10] The court instructed the jury as follows: "The court instructs you that if the jury in this case should find the defendant, John S. Rogers, guilty of murder in the first degree, and they also shall find the further fact that there is some extenuating fact or circumstance in the case, it is within their discretion to pronounce such a sentence as will relieve the defendant, John S. Rogers, from the extreme penalty of the law. The Penal Code invests a jury in a criminal case for murder with the discretion, but the discretion is not an arbitrary one, and is limited to determining which of two punishments shall be inflicted, and is to be employed only when the jury is satisfied that the lighter penalty should be imposed. If the evidence shows the defendant to be guilty of murder in the first degree, but does not show some extenuating fact or circumstance, it is the duty of the jury to find a simple verdict of murder in the first degree, and leave with the law the responsibility of affixing the punishment."

Section 190 of the Penal Code has provided, ever since 1874, that "every person guilty of murder in the first degree shall suffer death, or confinement in the state prison for life, at the discretion of the jury trying the same." It is substantially urged that the discretion of the jury here referred to is one to be exercised without any instruction from the court as to the grounds or reasons for the mode in which they shall exercise it. As was said in People v. Bawden, 90 Cal. 195, 27 Pac. 204, if the question here presented were a new one, there would be strong reasons for holding in accord with defendant's claim. In that case a similar instruction was given to the jury, and this court upheld the action of the trial court in view of previous decisions on the same question. People v. Brick, 68 Cal. 190, 8 Pac. 858, was one of these decisions, and in that case the instruction approved was word for word the instruction here given. See, also, People v. Jones, 63 Cal. 168; People v. Murback, 64 Cal. 369, 30 Pac. 608; People v. Olsen, 80 Cal. 122, 128, 22 Pac. 125. The law of this state thus appears to be thoroughly settled to the effect that the instruction in question is not erroneous.

[11] The court failed to instruct the jury as to what constituted robbery or attempted robbery, and also that the neglect of defendant (who did not take the stand as a witness) to be a witness cannot in any manner prejudice him or be used against him on the trial or proceeding. Pen. Code, § 1323. No request for an instruction as to either of these matters was made by defendant. So far as the failure to instruct as to what constituted robbery or attempted robbery is concerned, we are quite satisfied that the general rule obtains to the effect that, where a party in a criminal case fails to ask the court to give instructions to the jury upon a particular point, he cannot complain of error on the part of the court in not giving the instructions. See People v. Gray, 66 Cal. 271, 5 Pac. 240; People v. Christensen, 85 Cal. 568, 571, 24 Pac. 888; People v. Ahern, 93 Cal. 518, 29 Pac. 49.

Nor can we see how any possible prejudice could have resulted to defendant because of the absence of an instruction on that point. The same rule has been applied by this court where, under the same circumstances that existed here, the trial court neglected to instruct the jury in reference to the failure of the defendant to take the stand as a witness in his own behalf. The court said that, in the absence of a request for such an instruction, defendant could not be heard to complain. People v. Flynn, 73 Cal. 511, 15 Pac. 102. This appears to be the conclusion reached in other states where the question has been presented, except in Washington, where a statute in terms provided that "it shall be the duty of the court to instruct the jury that no inference of guilt shall arise against the accused if he fail or refuse to testify as a witness in his own behalf." See State v. Myers, 8 Wash. 183, 35 Pac. 582. We have no statute here that specifically requires any instruction on this subject. No reason appears why the decision in People v. Flynn, supra, on this point, is not correct, and we adhere to the views there expressed.

No other point is made for reversal, and after a careful consideration of the whole record we fail to find any substantial error in the proceedings.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

MARSHALL v. VALLEJO COMMERCIAL BANK et al. (Sac. 1,941.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1912.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 111*) — SUBCONTRACTORS — PAYMENTS TO CONTRACTOR — ABANDONMENT OF WORK.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1200, which provided that, where a building contractor failed to complete his contract, the amount available for liens of persons other than the contractor shall be fixed by deducting the payments then due and actually paid from the value of the work and materials already done and furnished, estimated by the standard of the whole contract price, such estimated value was such proportion of the actual value of the work already completed as the total contract price bore to the actual total reasonable cost of the complete improvement; the last-mentioned figure being reached by adding to the actual value of the work done and materials furnished at the time of abandonment the reasonable cost of completing the building.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 144-146; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

2. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 290*)—FORECLOSURE—FINDINGS—ULTIMATE FACTS.

In an action to enforce subcontractors' liens after abandonment of the work by the principal contractors, it was unnecessary to specifically find the reasonable cost of completed work; the ultimate fact to be found being the value of the work done and materials furnished when the work ceased, estimated as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1200, upon which the cost of completion was merely evidentiary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 591-597; Dec. Dig. § 290.*]

3. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 115*)—SUBCONTRACTORS' LIENS—ALLOWANCE FOR PAYMENTS TO CONTRACTOR.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, which provides that premature payment to a contractor shall not affect subcontractors' liens, and under section 1200, which provides for the apportionment of the contract price on the contractor failing to fully perform, the owner, in a suit to foreclose a subcontractor's lien, is not entitled to allowance for payments made to the original contractor before they were due under the contract, though, under agreement between the owner and the principal contractor, the payments were made directly to subcontractors, materialmen, and laborers; and where a portion of such payments were made to plaintiff, without notice to him that they involved a premature payment under the original contract, he could retain the amount of such payments, and claim the benefit of the statute as to the balance due him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 150-159; Dec. Dig. § 115.*]

4. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 115*)—SUBCONTRACTORS' LIENS—PREMATURE PAYMENT BY OWNER.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, which makes a premature payment to an original contractor invalid as against liens of subcontractors, an owner cannot excuse such payment, because it was made pursuant to architect's certificates, and the specifications provided that payments would be made on such certificates "as per agreement in contract," which contained nothing on the subject.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 150-159; Dec. Dig. § 115.*]

5. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 111*)—SUBCONTRACTORS' LIENS—DEDUCTIONS—DAMAGES FOR CONTRACTOR'S DELAY.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1200, which fixes the amount applicable to the payment of liens, where a principal contractor leaves work unfinished, in a suit to foreclose subcontractors' liens, the owner is not entitled to deduct the amount of damages sustained through the contractor's failure to complete the building within the stipulated time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 144-146; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge. Action by E. E. Marshall against the Vallejo Commercial Bank and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant bank appeals. Reversed.

Frederick W. Hall, for appellant. Jordan, Rowe & Brann and E. S. Page, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff in his own right, and as assignee of the Coast Electric Company and of J. W. Mitchell, brought this action to foreclose three mechanics' liens upon the property of defendant, Vallejo Commercial Bank, in the city of Vallejo.

On the 19th day of August, 1907, the Vallejo Commercial Bank, as owner, entered into a written contract with Newton-Sandford Construction Company, as contractor, for the making of certain alterations and additions to a brick building owned by the bank. The contract price was $13,800. The validity of the contract, although questioned by the complaint, was declared by the findings and is not now disputed.

The plaintiff and his assignors were subcontractors of the Newton-Sandford Company, and filed claims of lien for the following amounts: The plaintiff, $2,950; J. N. Mitchell, $393.77; Coast Electric Company, $223.50. The propriety of these demands, as against the contractor, and the regularity of the steps to claim liens therefor, are not questioned. The only controversy is over the amount due from the owner, Vallejo Commercial Bank, and applicable to the satisfaction of these liens.

It appears that the contractor commenced performance of the contract, and continued until on or about January 28, 1908, when it ceased work. Notice of cessation of labor was duly filed by the owner, which proceeded to complete the work itself. The rule for ascertaining the amount available for liens of persons other than the contractor was, under this state of facts, to be fixed according to the provisions of section 1200 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which though repealed in 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 1319), was still in force at the time of the accrual of the rights asserted in this action.

The court found that at the time of the cessation of labor upon the building by the contractor the value of the work done and materials furnished by the said contractor was the sum of $10,767.34, "estimated according to the standard of the said contract price," and that at said time there had been paid by the Vallejo Commercial Bank on account of said contract the sum of $8,800.51. Of said amount $892.86 was paid before the dates fixed by the contract for payment, and $67.03 of this was paid in excess of progress payments; but all of said $892.86 was paid to subcontractors, materialmen, and laborers having contracts with the Newton-Sandford Construction Company, "and for that reason should now be allowed as a credit to defendant, the Vallejo Commercial Bank." Deducting the sum of $8,800.51 from the sum of $10,767.34, the amount fixed as the value of the materials and labor furnished, estimated according to the contract price, the court found the balance of $1,966.83 to be the amount owing from the bank. From this it deducted $560, the damage found to have been sustained by the bank through the failure of the contractor to complete the building within the agreed time. This left the sum of $1,406.83 which the court, in its conclusions of law, found to be due from the bank, and applicable to the discharge of plaintiff's liens. A decree of foreclosure was entered accordingly. Thereafter, upon motion of the plaintiff, the court amended its conclusions of law and entered a new judgment. The second judgment was based upon the view that, in ascertaining the amount due from the bank, the premature payments of $892.86, and the damages claimed for delay, amounting to $560, should not have been deducted from the value of the materials furnished and labor done at the time when work on the building ceased. The result was to make the balance due from the appellant and applicable to the payment of liens $2,859.69; and the conclusions of law and the decree so declare.

The bank moved for a new trial, which was denied. It appeals from the order denying its said motion, and from the parts of the decree adjudging that the sum of $2,859.69, with interest and costs, is a lien upon its property, and ordering a sale to realize such sum.

[1] The first point urged by the appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding that at the time of the cessation of labor the value of the work done and materials furnished "was the sum of $10,767.34, estimated according to the standard of the said contract price." This contention must be upheld. There is virtually no dispute in the evidence regarding the items which must be taken into account in computing the amount in question. The contract price was $13,800. The actual value of the labor done and materials furnished up to the time of cessation of labor was $10,767.34. The amount reasonably and necessarily expended in completing the building was $3,703.06. This made the total cost of the completed building $14,470.40. To this must be added the reasonable cost that would have been incurred in completing, according to the contract, two items of construction, one of which was altered by the substitution of a cheaper material and the other omitted from the building. Accordingly, the value of the work done and materials furnished, "estimated as near as may be by the standard of the whole contract price," as provided by section 1200, was to be fixed by taking such proportion of the actual value of the work and materials done and furnished at the time of abandonment as the total contract price bore to the actual, total reasonable cost of the complete improvement; the last-mentioned figure being reached by "adding to the actual value of the work done and materials furnished at the time of the abandonment the reasonable cost of completing the building." Hoffman-Marks Co. v. Spires, 154 Cal. 111, 97 Pac. 152. Such computation would have resulted in the ascertainment of an amount considerably less than $10,767.34, which was the sum found by the court. This sum was the actual value of the labor and materials, and not the value estimated according to the standard of the contract price.

The alteration above referred to consisted in the substitution of metal for Spanish tile, reducing the actual cost by $225. A heating plant, called for by the contract, was not installed. The appellant claims that the reasonable value of installing this item would have been $375; but the respondent contends, and we think correctly, that there is no sufficient evidence to show this. But whether the cost of the heater be taken into account or not, the finding under discussion cannot stand. If we accept appellant's view on this point, a calculation, under the rule above stated, shows the value of labor done and materials furnished, estimated according to the standard of the contract price, to be $9,859.45, or $907.89 less than the amount found by the court. Omitting any consideration of the heater, the value of the labor and materials, thus estimated, would be $10,110.53, or $656.81 less than the amount found. The error cannot be rectified by modifying the judgment, as suggested in respondent's brief; for the reduction thus proposed is only $499.61, which is not sufficient to meet the requirements of the case. Upon a new trial there can be little difficulty in ascertaining the correct figure, and the court may then have before it sufficient data from which to determine and to take into account the reasonable cost which would have been incurred in installing the heating plant according to the plans and specifications.

As a guide to the court below in its further proceedings, the other points raised by appellant may be briefly discussed.

[2] There was no occasion to make a specific finding of the reasonable cost of completing the work after the cessation of labor by the contractor. The ultimate fact was the value of work done and materials furnished at the time of cessation, estimated as required by section 1200. This was found. The cost of completion was a factor to be considered in finding the ultimate fact, but it was evidentiary merely.

[3] The other points raised go, in the main, to the right of the owner to have allowance for payments made before they were due under the contract. We think the court rightly held, in its modified conclusions of law and second decree, that such payments were not to be considered. In cases where the contractor has failed to complete his contract, section 1200 supplies, or, rather, supplied, the rule for ascertaining the amount applicable to the payment of liens of persons other than the contractor. From the value of the work done and materials furnished is to be deducted "the payments then due and actually paid, according to the terms of the contract and the provisions of sections 1183 and 1184." Section 1184 provides that "no payment made prior to the time when the same is due, under the terms and conditions of the contract, shall be valid for the purpose of defeating, diminishing or discharging any lien in favor of any person, except the contractor, but as to such liens, such payment shall be deemed as if not made, and shall be applicable to such liens, notwithstanding that the contractor to whom it was paid may thereafter abandon his contract. * * *" This language is plain, and leaves no room for a construction which would permit the owner to deduct from the balance applicable to the payment of liens under section 1200 the amount of payments prematurely made. What he is entitled to deduct is the sum of the payments then due, and actually paid according to the terms of the contract. The statute made a special rule for ascertaining, in cases of abandonment, the amount applicable to payment of liens. It fixed a standard for estimating the value of the work done and materials furnished; and the value, so measured, might be, as in this case it was, considerably less than the actual value. If the owner is to have the benefit of the contract in fixing the sum which shall represent the value to him of the improvement, there is manifest justice in holding him to the terms of the contract when he seeks deductions for payments made to or for the contractor. And such is the express provision of the Code.

The question is not affected by the fact that, under an agreement between the owner and the contractor, these payments were made directly to subcontractors, materialmen, and laborers. It is argued that these persons had a right, equal or superior to that of plaintiff, to share in the fund, and that payment to them could not have injured the plaintiff. But the validity of the claims so paid was not a subject of adjudication in this action; and, in any event, the plaintiff is entitled to stand upon the rights given him by the statute. Nor are these rights lessened by the fact that a part of the premature payments came to his own hands. He had no knowledge that the sums so paid were not yet payable as between the owner and the contractor, and he received no more than was due him. We see nothing inequitable in his retaining these amounts, and still insisting that, for the rest of his claim, he may look to the fund created for his benefit by section 1200. If the owner has to pay more than it contracted to pay, the result is due to its own failure to comply with its contract.

[4] There is no merit in the contention that the payments under discussion are not to be regarded as premature, because made pursuant to architects' certificates. The specifications provide that "payments will be made only on the certificate of the architect as per agreement in contract." The contract contains nothing upon the subject. This provision does not purport to make the certificate of the architect conclusive in favor of the owner or against lienors. It was for the protection of the owner alone (McLaughlin v. Perkins, 102 Cal. 502, 36 Pac. 839), and did not enable him to bind third parties by the act of his agent. Furthermore, the finding that $892.86 was paid before it became due under the contract is not assailed by the specifications of insufficiency of evidence.

[5] It is contended that the bank was entitled to deduct from the balance applicable to liens the damages ($560) suffered by it through the failure of the contractor to complete the building within the stipulated time. The foregoing discussion with reference to the right to deduct premature payments in effect answers this point. Where the work is unfinished, the method of fixing the amount applicable to the payment of liens is fixed by section 1200; and a deduction for damages caused by delay is neither permitted by the section, nor is it appropriate to the special scheme thereby provided to meet a special contingency.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

BRIDGE et al. v. KEDON. (S. F. 5,796.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 9, 1912.)

Rehearing Denied Sept. 7, 1912.)

1. ASSIGNMENTS (§ 3*)—EXPECTANCIES—STATUTES.

The provisions of Civ. Code, § 700, that a mere possibility, such as the expectancy of an heir, is not to be deemed an interest of any kind, of section 703, that no future interest in property is recognized by the law, except such as is defined in this division, and of section 1045, that a mere possibility, not coupled with an interest, cannot be transferred, do not change the pre-existing rules of equity on the subject, but merely declare the pre-existing rules of law relating thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. ASSIGNMENTS (§ 8*)—EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT—EXPECTANCIES.

An assignment of a mere possibility, such as that of an heir in the estate of his living ancestor, is good in equity, as is one of a vested interest in property to come into existence in the future.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

3. ASSIGNMENTS (§ 88*)—EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT—ENFORCEMENT.

Where an assignment, good only in equity, is to secure a loan, it will be enforced only to the extent of the sum actually advanced and reasonable interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. §§ 135, 136; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

4. BANKRUPTCY (§ 433*)—DISCHARGE—"LIEN"—EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT.

The right created by the assignment, as security, of one's expectancy in the estate of his living ancestor, being a present equitable charge, which, when the descent is cast, at once ripens into a "lien" on the property, is within Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 67, 30 Stat. 564 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3449), exempting from its operation and preserving all liens created by the bankrupt, and therefore enforceable against the bankrupt after his discharge, especially where the property did not come into the possession of the assignee in bankruptcy, because not then acquired by the bankrupt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy, Cent. Dig. §§ 808-823; Dec. Dig. § 433.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4144-4153; vol. 8, p. 7707.]

5. ASSIGNMENTS (§ 88*)—EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT—ENFORCEMENT.

It is not the making of a new contract, but merely the enforcing, so far as just and reasonable, of an assignment to secure a loan at exorbitant interest, to adjudge the amount of the loan and interest at a fair rate a charge on the assigned right.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. §§ 135, 136; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

6. ASSIGNMENTS (§ 8*)—ASSIGNMENT OF EXPECTANCY—CONSENT OF ANCESTOR.

An assignment of the expectancy of an heir in the estate of his living ancestor does not have to be with the approval or consent of the ancestor to be enforceable in equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

7. ASSIGNMENTS (§ 8*)—ASSIGNMENT OF EXPECTANCY—ASSIGNEE.

An assignment of the expectancy of an heir in the estate of his living ancestor, to be enforceable in equity, does not have to be made to one already having some interest, or some possibility of an interest, in the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Henry S. Bridge and another against Martin Kedon, Jr. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cushing & Cushing and Wm. S. McKnight, for appellant. Thomas E. Haven, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff sued to enforce a grant or assignment of the expectant interest of the appellant in the state of his mother, who was then living, to Henry S. Bridge as trustee. Apparently he was trustee for Carrie E. Bridge, and for that reason she is made a party plaintiff, although she was not named in the assignment. It was made as security for the payment of certain sums of money loaned by Bridge to the appellant, for which he executed four notes, amounting to $1,400. Prior to the death of his mother, Kedon was duly adjudged a bankrupt, under the United States Bankrupt Act of 1898, and was in said proceeding duly released and discharged from all debts and claims provable in bankruptcy, including the debts arising from said loans of Bridge to him and the notes given in consideration thereof. Three of the notes bore interest at the rate of 2½ per cent. per month, the other at the rate of 3 per cent. per month, in each case payable in advance and compounded monthly. Kedon's mother died on April 29, 1908, and a decree has been made distributing to Kedon, as one of her heirs, a share of her estate. It is against this share that the plaintiff seeks to enforce the assignment. At the specified rates of interest, there would have been due on these notes, at the time of the judgment below, something over $11,000. The court below found that the rates of interest were exorbitant, and that the contracts were to that extent unfair and unconscionable, and that simple interest of 12 per cent. per annum would be a reasonable and fair amount to be allowed. This reduced the amount owing to Bridge to $2,905.95, which was adjudged to be a charge upon Kedon's share of his mother's estate. Kedon appeals.

[1] The Civil Code provides that "a mere possibility, such as the expectancy of an heir apparent, is not to be deemed an interest of any kind." Section 700. Also: "No future interest in property is recognized by the law except such as is defined in this division." Section 703. And further: "A mere possibility, not coupled with an interest, cannot be transferred." Section 1045. Notwithstanding these provisions, the courts of this state have recognized and applied the doctrine of equity that a conveyance or release by an heir of his expectancy in the estate of his ancestor will, under some circumstances, be enforced against his share of such estate, after it has devolved upon him by the death of the ancestor. In Pierce v. Robinson, 13 Cal. 123, the court, referring to proceeds of future crops, said that equity will uphold assignments of things which have no present existence, but rest in possibility, and that "an agreement for such interests will take effect as such assignment when the subjects to which they refer have ceased to rest in possibility and have ripened into reality," if fairly made and not against the policy of the law. Similar statements regarding assignments of things not yet existing are made in Bibend v. Insurance Co., 30 Cal. 86, and Bergson v. Insurance Co., 38 Cal. 544, in which the right to the money due upon a fire insurance policy assigned as collateral security before the loss occurred was involved.

In Estate of Garcelon, 104 Cal. 570, 38 Pac. 414, 32 L. R. A. 595, 43 Am. St. Rep. 134, Merritt, a nephew of the deceased, Catherine Garcelon, had, for an adequate consideration and with full knowledge of all the facts, made an agreement with his aunt, whose heir apparent he then was, that he would not assert any right or interest as heir in or to certain of her property, except such as she might give him by her will, and that he would not dispute or question any disposition thereof which she might make by her deed or will. This was said to be, in effect, a release by him to her of his expectancy in that part of her estate to which it related. It was held that the agreement was not contrary to public policy, that it was valid, and that Merritt was thereby estopped from maintaining a contest of his aunt's will. The case involved only the effect of the agreement that he would not contest the will. But the court said that the release of his expectancy was valid, and that the sections aforesaid, 700 and 1045 of the Civil Code, merely declare the rule of law, and did not affect or change the doctrine of equity on the subject of equitable assignments of expectant estates. The question was carefully considered, and the conclusion clearly announced. In Estate of Wickersham, 138 Cal. 362, 70 Pac. 1076, 71 Pac. 437, the court stated the doctrine that such a contract, made on adequate consideration and otherwise unobjectionable, would be enforced in equity "as an agreement to convey, or by way of estoppel or otherwise"; but this, the court said, was not material to the case. The Garcelon Case was cited with apparent approval. In Estate of Ryder, 141 Cal. 370, 74 Pac. 993, it was held that a conveyance of his expectancy by an heir apparent is not such a conveyance of the legal title as will enable the grantee therein to obtain distribution as grantee of the heir under section 1678 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Again the Garcelon Case was cited with apparent approval. It was not necessary in the Ryder Case to determine further the effect of such conveyance, or the rights of the parties thereto between themselves.

The Garcelon Case must be taken as establishing the proposition that the Civil Code does not change the pre-existing rules of equity on the subject, but merely declares the pre-existing rules of law relating thereto. Specifically, the case decides that an heir may, by contract with his ancestor, if not with others, bind himself to refrain from contesting the will of such ancestor. The specific question of the effect of an assignment of an expectant interest by an heir has not been actually involved in any other California case. We must therefore look to general principles, established by the decisions which gave rise to the equity doctrines on the subject, for a guide to our decision.

[2, 3] There is sometimes mentioned a distinction between assignments of property or rights not existing at the time, but which will or may issue as the result of the performance of an existing contractual relation or of an existing executory contract, as, for example, future crops under an existing tenancy, wages not earned under an existing employment, or money payable on an insurance policy in case of a loss, these being of the class considered in the California cases first above cited; that is, possibilities coupled with a present interest, and a grant or assignment by an heir apparent of his expectancy, in which he has no present estate or interest. Mr. Pomeroy mentions this in his work on Equity Jurisprudence. Volume 3, § 1286. The California cases relating to contingent results of existing contracts do not refer to such distinction, and they state the rule as a general one that equity will uphold assignments, not valid at law, of any future interest, as a rule applying alike to those which are vested, but relate to property to come into existence in the future, and those which rest only in possibility, provided they are fairly made and not against public policy.

The general rule in equity is well established. Mr. Tudor, the author of Notes to White & Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity, says: "A mere expectancy, as that of an heir at law to the estate of his ancestor (Hobson v. Trevor, 2 P. Wms. 191; Wethered v. Wethered, 2 Sim. 183, 192; Smith v. Baker, 1 Y. & C. C. C. 229), or the interest which a person may take under the will of another then living (Beckley v. Newland, 2 P. Wms. 182; Bennett v. Cooper, 9 Beav. 252; Flower v. Butler, 15 Ch. D. 665), or the share to which such person may become entitled under an appointment (Musprat v. Gordon, 1 Anst. 34), or in personal estate as presumptive next of kin of a person then living (Hinde v. Blake, 3 Beav. 235; Meek v. Kettlewell, 1 Ph. 347), is assignable in equity for a valuable consideration; and when the expectancy has fallen into possession, the assignment will be enforced." Part 2, vol. 2, p. 839. The cases cited support the text. The numerous cases cited in the extensive note show that the validity of such assignments may be presented either in a suit by the assignor to set aside the assignment, or in a suit by the assignee to enforce it, but that in whichever way it may come before the court, if it is founded upon a valuable consideration and is not contrary to public policy, it will be upheld and enforced to the extent that it is fair and reasonable.

The cases referred to as contrary to public policy are those involving champerty, assignments of salaries, pensions, and the like. Nothing of the kind is presented in this case, and this qualification need not be considered. In regard to the consideration, the decisions are to the effect that where it is a loan, and the interest is exorbitant, or the terms unconscionable, the courts will compel each party to do equity. The assignee, on the one hand, will be allowed to enforce the equitable charge on the property only to the extent of the sums actually advanced and reasonable interest; and the heir, on the other hand, will be given a decree setting aside the assignment only upon the condition that he shall repay the sums advanced, with interest and costs. Id. pt. 2, vol. 1, pp. 678, 692. It is said that the doctrine "was independent of the laws of usury, and it was in force before the statutes relating to usury came into existence." Id. pt. 2, vol. 1, p. 687. Mr. Pomeroy says that "possibilities not coupled with an interest, mere possibilities or expectancies, * * * are, according to the general course of decisions, assignable in equity for a valuable consideration; and equity will enforce the assignment when the possibility or expectancy is changed into a vested interest or possession." 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1287. See, also, 2 Story's Eq. Jur. (13th Ed.) § 1040a. We do not find in any of the decisions or in any of the authorities any difference between the rule as applied to the assignment of property not existing, but which will be the produce or result of an existing contract or contractual relation, and assignments of a mere possibility, such as that of an heir in the estate of his living ancestor, at least so far as the right in either case to enforce such an assignment in equity is concerned.

Under these authorities, there can be no doubt that the grant or assignment of Kedon to Bridge of his expectancy as security for the loan was valid to the extent of the sum loaned and reasonable interest thereon, and that it may be enforced against the part of his mother's estate which on her death descended to Kedon, unless it is barred by the discharge in bankruptcy.

[4] When we look to the reasoning by which the rule is upheld, it is obvious that a discharge in bankruptcy does not invalidate the charge or lien which equity imposes upon the property. Mr. Pomeroy, in explaining the general doctrine on the subject and referring to assignments of expectancies, as well as other interests, says: "The assignee of an expectancy, possibility, or contingency acquired at once a present equitable right over the future proceeds of the expectancy, possibility, or contingency which was of such a certain and fixed nature that it was sure to ripen into an ordinary equitable property right over those proceeds as soon as they came into existence by a transformation of the possibility or contingency into an interest in possession. There was an equitable ownership of property in abeyance, so to speak, which finally changed into an absolute property upon the happening of the future event." 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1271. And with regard to bankruptcy in section 1291 he says: "According to the general doctrine of equity, established beyond any doubt by the highest judicial authority, the equitable assignment or the equitable lien upon the property to be acquired in the future is valid and enforceable, not only against the contracting party himself, but also against subsequent judgment creditors, assignees in bankruptcy, and all other volunteers holding or claiming under him, and against subsequent purchasers from him with notice of the assignment of lien." As we understand the theory, as stated in section 1271 aforesaid, it is that as soon as the assignment is executed the assignee becomes vested of an equitable right to receive the property ultimately, a right which, by the rules of equity, is sure to become an ordinary vested property right when the event occurs by which the possibility is realized as a certainty. He does not mean to say that the possibility by which the estate becomes an estate of the heir in possession is sure to happen, but that, if it does happen, the equitable right is then sure to ripen into an ordinary property right. The language has been criticised in some cases which attribute to this passage the contrary meaning, that it was the possibility which was sure to ripen into an ordinary property right in the assignee. McCall v. Hampton, 98 Ky. 166, 32 S. W. 406, 33 L. R. A. 266, 56 Am. St. Rep. 335. In the case of a loan, according to these principles, there is created by the assignment a present equitable charge on the property, which equity recognizes as vested, although it is neither vested nor valid at law, and which, when the descent is cast, at once ripens into a lien upon the property for the security of the money loaned.
